Oral Answers to Questions

WALES

Unemployment

1. Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Wales what action he proposes to take on the current unemployment figures for Wales.

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Nicholas Edwards): The Government will continue the policies which have created low inflation and improved growth, established a wide range of employment and training measures, produced a steady improvement in infrastructure and the industrial environment in Wales, and have achieved success in attracting inward investment and stimulating the growth of small businesses. We intend to develop the important initiatives that we have announced to achieve urban renewal and to encourage the adoption of new technologies, adaptability and the response to market needs that are required if jobs are to be created.

Mrs. Clwyd: Is the Secretary of State aware that male unemployment in Britain is now nearly twice as high as it is in France, Germany, Italy and the United States and that in my constituency, month after month, male unemployment continues to be the highest in Wales? Can the right hon. Gentleman tell my constituents when they can expect an end to their misery, apart from there being a change of Government?

Mr. Edwards: We have created more new jobs in this country than have been created in the rest of the European Community countries put together. Because I understand the particular problems in the hon. Lady's constituency, we have pressed on with the construction of the important new road giving access to her constituency and launched the valleys initiative, which I am sure will play a major role in the Cynon Valley.

Sir Raymond Gower: Has my right hon. Friend noted that his colleagues in the Cabinet have prophesied that a large number of jobs will emerge from the spectacular Channel crossing enterprise? In the Welsh setting, does he agree that many new jobs would emerge from a similarly spectacular undertaking, such as a second crossing of the Bristol channel, with or without a Severn barrage, and that that would form a valuable part of the infrastructure to which he referred?

Mr. Edwards: My hon. Friend will be aware that guidance has been given on the opportunities to be gained in Wales from the Channel crossing. We are pressing on with the consultants' study on the possibility of a second Severn crossing, and we have received the consultants' report on a possible Severn barrage, which the Government are considering. My hon. Friend will know that this Government have already launched major initiatives in south Cardiff and elsewhere, which will provide considerable opportunities.

Mr. Foot: The right hon. Gentleman talks about the valleys initiative making a major contribution to the creation of jobs. What figure does he have in mind? How soon will the improved figures operate and how do they compare with the figures for jobs still being lost to the valleys?

Mr. Edwards: We have announced the valleys initiative and are now waiting for the first bids and proposals from the local authorities. This is just the start of that initiative. We shall want to reinforce it if successful bids are made. This is just one of a number of initiatives to help job creation in the valleys.

Mr. Raffan: Following the recent great good news that 650 new jobs are to be created in the Delyn enterprise zone, will my right hon. Friend congratulate Delyn borough council and its chief executive, John Packer, and his officials on their tremendous achievement in bringing about such a significant turnaround so soon after the closure of Courtaulds, Greenfield? Will he also pass on my sincere thanks, and those of the borough, to his extremely hardworking officials for their contribution? Will he join me in reminding the people of Delyn that those new jobs will be safe only as long as this Government remain in power, because of the Labour party's outright opposition to enterprise zones?

Mr. Edwards: I specifically congratulated the Delyn borough council in the speech that I delivered at the opening of the new Shotton coating plant on Friday. The leadership which that local authority has shown in its management of the enterprise zone has been outstanding — and I said so. I also detailed the long list of major new investment decisions that have been announced in Clwyd in recent months.

Mr. Geraint Howells: How many people will be made redundant in the Agricultural Advisory Service in Wales? How many will be made redundant by amalgamating Pwllpeiran Hill experimental farm with Trawscoed? For what reason is the right hon. Gentleman pursuing such a policy?

Mr. Edwards: I shall write to the hon. Gentleman in more detail. Speaking from memory, 10 jobs will be lost in the Agricultural Advisory Service. I shall write to the hon. Gentleman about the farm question.

Mr. Best: Does my right hon. Friend accept that the key to greater job prospects is improved communications and, to that end, that the dualling of the A55 along the north Wales coast will have a greater impact on job prospects for my constituency than any other measure? Will my right hon. Friend say a little more about the new initiative that he has just announced — the rural enterprise scheme — which I understand will appeal to the whole of my constituency?

Mr. Edwards: My hon. Friend is quite right. The Conway crossing, which will be the largest single road scheme ever undertaken in this country, will add to the list of major projects to which I referred earlier. We have just launched the rural enterprise scheme with the new grants scheme — DRIVE — and shortly we shall launch the Agrifood initiative. Those are important aids to the difficult and changing situation in the countryside.

Mr. John Morris: Does the Secretary of State expect Welsh unemployment figures to be up, or down, a year from now?

Mr. Edwards: I follow the right hon. and learned Gentleman's practice of never making forecasts about unemployment figures.

Mr. D. E. Thomas: Will the Secretary of State address himself to the issue of unemployment in Gwynedd in the context of the heavy reliance of that county on employment in the electricity generation industry? In view of the fact that neither this nor any other Government are likely to commission a further nuclear power station in Trawsfynydd, will the Welsh Office take an initiative to ensure alternative employment in that area on a long-term planning cycle?

Mr. Edwards: I note what the hon. Gentleman said. I note also that in recent weeks and months he has been extremely careful in his choice of words about the possibility of a replacement for the nuclear power station. As he knows, the CEGB is involved in consultations on proposals for a replacement. It would be foolish to close the door to those options at this stage.

Dr. Marek: Can the Secretary of State say how many of the jobs that have been created are part-time and how many are full-time?

Mr. Edwards: I could not specify that immediately. I have not listed the number of jobs. Certainly quite a number of part-time jobs have been created. It is one of the changing patterns of employment and of occupation that we must recognise. Many people welcome the opportunity to do part-time work, as I am sure the hon. Gentleman recognises.

Mr. Barry Jones: I remind the right hon. Gentleman that in Wales nine travel-to-work areas suffer unemployment in excess of 20 per cent. and a further four areas, at 19 per cent., are bordering on 20 per cent. So far as the Cabinet split is concerned, does the right hon. Gentleman agree with the Home Secretary that tax cuts are not everything? Can the people of Wales have a change of economic policy? If the right hon. Gentleman will not listen to the people of Wales, will be take note of election results and opinion polls, which suggest that the Conservatives, without a change in policy, will be wiped out in Wales?

Mr. Edwards: Of course tax cuts are not everything. Tax incentives are required to get the maximum productive capacity out of this country. The Government are devoting record resources to the National Health Service. We have built 90 per cent. of the factories that are being built in Wales by the Welsh Development Agency. We are carrying out the largest road building programme ever undertaken in the Principality. We have built more modern hospitals and provided more medical facilities than any previous Government.

Cyngor Dosbarth Dwyfor

2. Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales when he next plans to meet the officers or members of Cyngor Dosbarth Dwyfor about the housing priorities for the area.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Mark Robinson): I have no present plans to do so. However, the head of my Department's housing division met the chairman and members of the authority together with the chief executive and other officers last week.

Mr. Wigley: When the head of the Department's housing division met the officers and members of the Cyngor Dosbarth Dwyfor last week, did he understand that it was not Dwyfor's priority to build 700 second homes at Morfa Bychan on land that is designated as a site of special scientific interest by the Welsh Office? That scheme is contrary to the local plan approved by the Welsh Office and to the wishes of the local people. What will the Welsh Office do to safeguard the local community from the ravages of those property speculators?

Mr. Robinson: The hon. Gentleman will be aware from our correspondence that that is a matter for the local planning authority, Dwyfor district council. Under section 45 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1971 the authority can make an order to revoke the outline planning permission granted in 1964.

Welsh Water Authority

3. Mr. Rogers asked the Secretary of State for Wales when he next proposes to meet the chairman of the Welsh water authority to discuss privatisation of the industry.

8. Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales when he next proposes to meet the chairman of the Welsh water authority to discuss the privatisation of the industry.

Mr. Mark Robinson: My right hon. Friend and I met the chairman of the Welsh water authority on 25 March and I met him again on 20 May. We will continue to keep in close touch on water privatisation matters.

Mr. Rogers: As the Government have abolished the water equalisation grant and as there are now wide differences in water charges between England and Wales, what proposals does the Secretary of State have to alleviate the problems facing the Welsh people, or is he going to let them down, as he usually does?

Mr. Robinson: Charges for 1987 and 1988 will be set in the same way as for the current year, with the financial target order subject to parliamentary approval. In subsequent years, under privatisation, the licence charges will fall to the control of the independent regulator, known as the Director General of Water Services.

Mr. Jones: The water industry should not be the source of profit. Does the hon. Gentleman accept that, following the Chernobyl disaster, when north Wales was contaminated, we need water under public ownership so that immediate and cohesive action can be taken in response to any emergency? What is the likelihood of the Secretary of State for the Enrvironment hurrying through privatisation of water so that the Chancellor has the means to make tax cuts? Does the Minister agree that, before these measures go forward, they should be put to the people of Wales at a general election, when the hon. Gentleman will find that there is no mandate for these proposals?

Mr. Robinson: It comes as no surprise to me that the hon. Gentleman should try at the Dispatch Box to claim that profit is a bad thing and not to be commended. We believe that the water industry, like any industry, should be managed so that it can produce a profitable return, which of course helps investment.

Sir Anthony Meyer: What can my hon. Friend say to reassure those of my constituents who are worried that privatisation may mean that tariffs for the very large users will be reduced and tariffs for the small users will be correspondingly raised?

Mr. Robinson: Those matters can be controlled when the licence for the new water companies is drawn up. Those aspects will come under the protection of the Director General of Water Services.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: What consideration has been given to the water authorities' charging system after denationalisation in the light of the Green Paper on reform of rates?

Mr. Robinson: We are, of course, looking at that matter. We are considering also the question of a wider extension of metering. Recently, we issued a consultation paper on that aspect.

Mr. Gareth Wardell: When the hon. Gentleman next meets the chairman of the Welsh water authority, will he be able to give him an assurance that tidal, drinking and river water will be considerably improved in quality as a result of privatisation? Will the hon. Gentleman accept the recommendation of the Royal Commission on environmental pollution and the result of the confidential review of environmental policy by the central policy unit of the Department of the Environment, that the current polution control functions of the water authorities should be transferred and monitored by a new environmental inspectorate?

Mr. Robinson: We believe that under these proposals the water environment regime will be strengthened. For that reason, we recently issued "The Water Environment: the Next Steps", which is open to consultation. There is no question of environmental standards being changed under privatisation. They will be maintained, and, indeed, strengthened.

Mr. Grist: Is my hon. Friend able to say how my constituents, particularly my poorer constituents, will benefit from the denationalisation of water?

Mr. Robinson: By allowing the water authorities to go to the capital market, denationalisation will enable them to raise more funds for capital development. It will also encourage a more efficient water regime, which should lead to lower costs and charges.

Powys (Mental Health Care)

4. Mr. Livsey asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the reorganisation of mental health care in Powys.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Planning the reorganisation of mental health care in Powys is primarily the responsibility of Powys healh authority, in consultation with Powys county council where care in the community is involved.

Mr. Livsey: I accept that care in the community is extremely important for the elderly, but does the Minister not accept that increasing numbers of elderly people will be living in Powys in the future and that they will require greater resource funding? The proposals contained in the recently published health report for Powys show that beds for the long-term and acutely mentally ill at the Mid-Wales hospital, Talgarth will probably amount to 80. We believe that this is far too low a number for expert treatment of the acutely mentally ill and that the level should be held at 200, because in that hospital there is a 95 per cent. discharge rate of those patients within 12 months.

Mr. Robinson: The hon. Gentleman has asked two questions. It was precisely for that reason that my right hon. Friend announced an initiative for the elderly, during the proceedings on this subject in the Welsh Grand Committee, that amounts to additional resources of between £1 million and £5 million over the next three years, and Powys will be a beneficiary.

As for the mental illness services and the mental handicap strategy in Powys, the Government have introduced a comprehensive 10-year policy and extra resources are being made available. For Powys, they amount to £215,000 in the current year.

Mr. Rogers: In any reorganisation of mental health care in Powys, will the Minister ensure that any clinical trials of drugs are carried out strictly in accordance with the protocol that has been arrived at between the BMA, the medical profession and the DHSS? In ensuring that these trials are properly carried out in hospitals, perhaps he will apply better standards there than he seems to care about for trials that take place outside hospitals.

Mr. Robinson: Drug trials are a matter for the medical profession and the BMA.

Mr. Wigley: In relation to the substantial pressure on the community in Powys, if people are moved, as they should be, from long-stay hospitals into the community, will the Minister give an assurance that additional resources will be provided, over and above those that have been earmarked for mental handicap services, for mental illness services in Powys?

Mr. Robinson: Once again, in terms of our mental illness strategy, we are prepared to look at projects that are put to us by health authorities, and funding can be made available.

Roads

5. Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Wales when he expects to make a statement on responses to the consultation paper, "Roads for Wales — the 1990s and Beyond"; how many responses he has received; what has been their nature; and how many responses he has received about roads on Ynys Môn.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Wyn Roberts): I have received over 150 responses covering a wide range of issues affecting both trunk and county roads. About 30 concern roads on Ynys Môn. I am still considering the responses.

Mr. Best: My hon. Friend will know of my efforts to try to secure bypasses around the five villages on the A5 on Ynys Môn and also my thanks to him for his welcome statement during the last Welsh Question Time that he would look at the possibility of a bypass around Holyhead, bearing in mind the massive increase in traffic that that town is likely to encounter during the next few years. Is my hon. Friend able to say when he will be in a position to appoint consultants?

Mr. Roberts: No one has pressed harder for improvements to the A5 on Anglesey than my hon. Friend. He will be aware that the consultants' report covers the five villages of Pentre Berw, Gaerwen, Gwalchmai, Bryngwran, Caergeiliog and Valley. However, I do not believe that it is possible to look at the A5 in Anglesey without considering Holyhead, and that we shall do.

Mr. Raffan: Will my hon. Friend tell the House what representations he has received on the urgent need to create an effective link between the A55 and the A548 to ensure that future industrial growth in Delyn will not be hampered? Will he also tell the House whether the Government would be willing to contribute towards the cost of the evaluation study of the proposed link, which Clwyd county council has promised to undertake?

Mr. Roberts: Among the 150 responses that I have received, I do not recall receiving the one that my hon. Friend mentions. Many of the people who responded are anxious to improve our communications infrastructure in order to assist industry. Of course, we pay special attention to the requirements for industrial developments, including those in my hon. Friend's constituency.

Welsh Water Authority

6. Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Secretary of State for Wales when he now expects the Welsh water authority to be privatised.

Mr. Robinson: It is expected that all water authorities will change their status to water supply plcs on the same day in 1987 following passage of the necessary legislation.

Mr. Howells: Can the Minister give an assurance to the people of Wales that if, and when, the Welsh water authority and the assets of the Severn-Trent water authority in Wales are privatised, the people of Wales will have the first opportunity to buy the shares, or will part of the assets be handed back to the city of Birmingham council?

Mr. Robinson: There will be every opportunity for the people of Wales and for those who work for the Welsh water authority to buy shares in the company when it comes to flotation.

Mr. Ray Powell: When the Minister talks to the chairman of the Welsh water authority about privatisation, will he also discuss security? Is he aware that last week in my constituency a boy of eight called Leighton Jenkins was found at the bottom of a sewage tank after 10 days of a massive search by police and residents in the Bettws area? Will the Minister see that an inquiry is conducted to ensure that in future all sewage and water works are properly secured against young children? Will he also ensure that there is an inquiry into the death of this constituent of mine, Leighton Jenkins?

Mr. Robinson: I cannot comment on the case of Leighton Jenkins, because I understand that it is still the subject of a coroner's inquiry. Security at Welsh water authority facilities — indeed, at all water authority facilities — is important, but it is a matter for the authorities themselves.

Mr. Best: Can my hon. Friend assure the people of Wales that after privatisation the interests of the consumer will be better protected by the Director General of Water Services than they are at present?

Mr. Robinson: I can tell my hon. Friend that the consumer will be better protected by the Director General of Water Services, and also by the procedures that we are instituting for consumer protection. It is intended to retain a simplified version of the present system, with a regional committee supported by three divisional committees in Wales.

Mr. D. E. Thomas: I am sure that the Minister will extend the sympathy of the House to the family of Leighton Jenkins, who was the victim of this appalling tragedy. Does the Minister accept that the section of the water authority land and reservoir facilities at Llyn Celyn in the Meirionnydd Nant Conwy constituency has long been the subject of contention in Wales? Does he also accept that that reservoir was built by Liverpool corporation against the express wishes of the majority of the Welsh population and Welsh Members of Parliament? Finally, does he accept that there are people in the community who will not accept the re-privatisation of that structure and will want it to remain within Welsh public ownership?

Mr. Robinson: I extend deepest sympathy to the parents of the child. The security of children at any water authority installation is a matter of great concern, and I know that the water authorities do their best to try to ensure that children are protected. When problems occur the authorities will, of course, take the necessary action to try to improve the situation.

I do not accept that the privatisation of the water industry will be disadvantageous to the people of Wales. It will be a positive measure and will not only improve the water service throughout the Principality, but will lead to improved investment and progressively lower charges in terms of inflation.

Mrs. Clwyd: How can the Minister square his remarks about water privatisation with the document recently presented by Arthur Collins and Company about the privatisation of water services? That document is an independent financial appraisal of privatisation, and its authors have come to the conclusion that a private monopoly of water will lead to higher prices or poorer services, or probably both.

Mr. Robinson: All sorts of bodies can reach conclusions of that nature, but the Government have reached the conclusion that the water industry will be better off in the private sector and that it will open up great opportunities for the water industry. That is why we are pursuing that course.

Welsh Development Agency

7. Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Wales what has been the total expenditure of the Welsh Development Agency since May 1979.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: From 1 April 1979 to 31 March 1986 gross expenditure by the Welsh Development Agency totalled some £520 million.

Mr. Knox: What has been the average spent by the authority each year since the Government came into office and how does that compare with the average spent each year under the Labour Government?

Mr. Edwards: From April 1979 to March 1986 expenditure was at an average of £74·2 million a year, which compares with an average of £34·8 million a year under the previous Labour Government.

Dr. Roger Thomas: Will the Minister help us decide which are the correct figures for the numbers of unoccupied WDA factories in the borough of Dinefwr? Is it seven out of 27 post-1979, as the Welsh Grand Committee was told by the Under-Secretary, or 14 out of 24, the figure given to me by the chief executive of Dinefwr borough council and as counted by myself the other afternoon?

Mr. Edwards: If we are asked a specific question about that particular point, we shall provide an answer.

Mr. Barry Jones: Why, since 1979, has the right hon. Gentleman reimposed real terms cuts on the agency's budget while, at the same time, we have seen unemployment soar by 130 per cent.? Will he now sanction urgently more cash for the valleys' initiative, for the advance factory programme and for venture capital?

Mr. Edward: It is simply not true, as I told the hon. Gentleman in the Welsh Grand Committee, to say that there have been real terms cuts. He has made comparisons with the period when we had made substantial allocations to deal with the steel closure areas. As I have already told the House, we have built 90 per cent. of the advance factories built by the WDA. The WDA continues to have an important role, but we debated those matters at great length in the Welsh Grand Committee only the other day.

Mr. Wigley: As only £500,000 of the £25 million for factory building in the WDA's current programme will go to Gwynedd, will the Secretary of State have a word with the chairman of the WDA to make sure that the unemployed in Gwynedd get a fair crack of the whip?

Mr. Edwards: One feature of the WDA'S management of the factory programme is to keep the programme under continual review and to respond to need as it arises. In the Welsh Grand Committee debate I announced some additional factory provision in response to represenations that had previously been made and I shall draw the agency's attention to the representations now made by the hon. Gentleman.

Griffiths Report

10. Mr. Coleman asked the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has received concerning the implementations of the Griffiths report in the National Health Service in Wales.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Since June 1984, when the circular setting out the arrangements for implementation of the recommendations of the Griffiths report in Wales was issued, my right hon. Friend has received some 46 representations about various aspects of the matter, from a variety of sources.

Mr. Coleman: Is the Minister aware that hon. Members have received considerably more representations than that from members of the professions in the NHS, such as nurses, medical authorities, scientists and physiotherapists, all of whom are expressing their anxieties at the manner in which the creeping bureaucracy is impinging upon their professional expertise in the NHS? What can that bureaucracy gain by sending people on expensive trips to the United States to find out how to run a national health service? What does that country know about it?

Mr. Robinson: On the creeping bureaucracy point, it is worth noting that management costs in the NHS in Wales have fallen from 5·2 to 4·3 per cent., even after the implementation of the Griffiths proposals. We have great confidence in the management procedures that are being put into practice in Wales. It is right for organisations to express their fears, but it is easy to leap to conclusions before the benefits of the implementation of such a management system are fully felt.

Sir Raymond Gower: Is it not a fact that when the management proposals in the Griffiths report were first promulgated there was a good deal of misunderstanding about them and that many in the medical and nursing professions felt that they would be excluded, but that that has not been the case?

Mr. Robinson: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. We have heard that nurses are feeling upset, but a chief administrative nursing officer has been appointed in every health authority in Wales, director of nursing services posts are being established and no fewer than four nurses have been appointed to unit general manager posts in Wales.

Education Provision

11. Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales when his Department expects to receive the report of Her Majesty's Inspectors' latest investigation into the effects of local education authority expenditure policy on education provision in Wales.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: My right hon. Friend has received the latest report "The Effects on the Education Service in Wales of Recent Local Authority Expenditure Policies: An Assessment by Her Majesty's Inspectorate" for the academic year 1984-85. It was published on 5 June and I have placed a copy in the Library.

Mr. Thomas: I congratulate the Welsh Office on publishing the report on the Friday before I asked my question in the House. Will the Minister ensure in future that the Welsh report is published in the current academic year or at least in the following year? We have the English report for 1985-86, but we are still awaiting the Welsh report for that period. Will the Minister accept that the latest Welsh report is a devastating critique of the Government's policies and that it shows how the fabric of Welsh education the buildings and the available resources are crumbling during his tenure?

Mr. Roberts: I think that the hon. Gentleman is wrong about the report. Our report corresponds to the English report that was published a short while ago. Incidentally, it is in our discretion whether we publish the report and when it is published.

I fear that the hon. Gentleman has clearly misunderstood the report, because its emphasis is on the fact that the quality of the provision is decided not just by the level of financial resources but, crucially, on how effectively available resources are managed. [Interruption.] I am interested to see the hon. Gentleman showing us a grotesque newspaper report of the document. I hope that he will read the document itself.

Mr. Rowlands: Is the Minister aware that, because of the lack of resources, schools are ill-prepared for the new examination? Many schools, including all those in my area, have not even seen the syllabuses, the teachers have not been trained, and above all, the parents have been left in the dark about the character and nature of the new examination system. Does the hon. Gentleman think that that is the best way to produce a major educational reform?

Mr. Roberts: It is important for the House to realise that record high resources are being devoted to the education service in Wales. We are giving £659·5 million in rate support grant in the current year and pupil numbers have been falling. As for preparations for the GCSE, I know that 36 of the 47 syllabuses have gone out to local education authorities, and the remainder will be going out very shortly. There have been more preparations and more expenditure for this examination than for any previous examination.

Sir John Stradling Thomas: Will my hon. Friend confirm that the opposition and other critics are as muddled as usual about the great problem of resource management facing local education authorities? I do not underestimate that problem, but will my hon. Friend confirm that he has discussed the matter with every local education authority in Wales and that on their own figures not on Welsh Office figures there has been no cut in resources? However, the problem of resource management remains to be resolved.

Mr. Roberts: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. In real terms we were spending £100 more per secondary school pupil in 1984 than in 1979-80. My hon. Friend is right to say that the problem is not the size of the resources, but managing them and getting value for money in education.

Mr. Barry Jones: The Minister's replies are unconvincing. Is he not ashamed of the fact that, after seven years, we now have worried parents, disadvantaged pupils and very, very shabby schools? In our county the school service is decaying while, under this Minister, the private sector has obtained enhanced grants. That is a disgrace.

Mr. Roberts: We have at least had the courage to publish such reports. Indeed, it is the fourth report to be published by the Government. The Labour Government did not have the courage even to commisssion a report. The report contains some very valuable issues for the consideration of local education authorities. Given that report, and the report of the Audit Commission, I repeat that sufficient resources are being devoted to education. The problem is getting proper value for the money spent.

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

Redundant Churches (Southwark)

19. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the hon. Member for Wokingham, as representing the Church Commissioners, how many redundant churches there are within the diocese of Southwark.

Sir William van Straubenzee (The Second Church Estates Commissioner, Representing Church Commissioners): There are currently five redundant churches in the diocess of Southwark where the future of the church still has to be settled.

Mr. Bruinvels: Although I am pleased that there are only five redundant churches in the diocese of Southwark, may I ask whether my hon. Friend read an article in the Church Times of 9 May, which said that the incumbent of St. Swithin's church, Lewisham, the Rev. Barry Naylor,celebrated a holy communion service with the Rev. Kate Merriman? That is contrary to canon law and, in my submission, also contrary to the Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction Measure. Does my hon. Friend agree that should more——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Did that take place in a redundant church?

Mr. Bruinvels: Does my hon. Friend agree that if more such cases occur, many more churches may become redundant, and that the Church of England will be placed very much in jeopardy if more women are ordained?

Sir William van Straubenzee: I must make it clear that the Church Commissioners have no responsibility whatever for what takes place ecclesiastically in the diocese of Southwark or in any other diocese.

Mr. Simon Hughes: When it seems that churches may become redundant in any diocese, will the Church Commissioners contemplate allowing them to be used by other Christian denominations before they consider their use for totally secular purposes? Often, a multi-denominational use would allow a church building to retain its Christian purpose while not necessarily incurring a sole liability on the part of the Church of England.

Sir William van Straubenzee: Yes, Sir. I have often said in the House that using a church for another Christian purpose is the most favoured use of all. The hon. Gentleman may be glad to know that of the 38 churches in the diocese of Southwark to be declared redundant since 1 April 1969, 12 are now being used for worship by other Christian communities, one forms part of a new Church of England place of worship, and one is being used as a private chapel. In other words, almost half of them are being used for Christian purposes.

Building Conservation

20. Mr. Chapman asked the hon. Member for Wokingham, as representing the Church Commissioners, if the Church Commissioners have made any assessment of the state of conservation of those buildings under their control which enjoy exemption from listed buildings control.

Sir William van Straubenzee: The Church of England's statutory systems for the care and control of its churches include the regular quinquennial inspection of every church by an architect and ensures that neither the fabric nor contents can be altered without authority. Further, the Pastoral Measure contains statutory procedures for dealing with redundant churches. A listed Church of England church thus has a three times better chance of avoiding demolition than does a secular listed building.

Mr. Chapman: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that information. It confirms that the Church of England's record on protecting its ecclesiastical architectural heritage is much more successful than that of the country in protecting its listed buildings. Does my hon. Friend agree that any attempt by the House to get rid of the ecclesiastical exemption would be a bad thing and would be — to use a perhaps not inappropriate phrase — tempting providence?

Sir William van Straubenzee: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for paying tribute to the Church of England's strict discipline in relation to its great heritage of ancient buildings. I share his view that that is a better form of protection than that provided by the state.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: Will the Church Commissioners take steps to ensure that the visitation by archdeacons is used, as it is intended to be, as a means of ensuring that there are not continuing defects that will lead eventually to expensive disrepair?

Sir William van Straubenzee: When I reply that I believe so, it is because the Church Commissioners as such—as I know the right hon. Gentleman appreciates—have no direct responsibility for the work of the archdeacons. However, the right hon. Gentleman draws attention to one of the safeguards to which I referred in my main answer.

Equal Pay

21. Mr. Greenway asked the hon. Member for Wokingham, as representing the Church Commissioners, what progress has been made with the implementation of equal pay policies for employees of the Church Commissioners; and if he will make a statement.

Sir William van Straubenzee: The Church Commissioner's employees are paid in accordance with Civil Service scales. The implementation of an equal pay policy was completed in 1961.

Mr. Greenway: Do any open or clandestine plans exist to pay women priests and bishops equally with existing priests and bishops? Does my hon. Friend expect that to happen within his lifetime?

Sir William van Straubenzee: As to my lifetime, I am afraid that I can give no forecast whatever, but at the present rate of questions to the Church Commissioners I do not think that it will be very long. On the more serious topic, there is nothing clandestine about the activities of the Church Commissioners. They deal with the law as it is, and at present there are no female priests or bishops.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Refreshment Department

22. Mr. Wigley asked the hon. Member for Berwick upon Tweed, as representing the House of Commons Commission, how many of the supervisory posts in the Refreshment Department are currently held by women and how many by men; and, of those appointed to such posts since 1979, how many were women and how many men.

Mr. A. J. Beith (On behalf of the House of Commons Commission): Of the 47 supervisory posts in the Refreshment Department, 10 are currently held by women and 37 by men. No figures are available for 1979, which was before the Refreshment Department became a Department of the House. Since 1980, 22 men and nine women have been appointed to supervisory posts.

Mr. Wigley: Within the figures that the hon. Gentleman has just given, how many positions as head waiter within the restaurants of the House are held by women? If, as I suspect, the answer is very few indeed, does that not show discrimination against women? Is he satisfied with that position?

Mr. Beith: I cannot give the hon. Gentleman the precise figure without notice. However, the larger part of the imbalance between women and men is accounted for not by head waiters but by the staff of chefs, where traditionally the largest number of people applying for those supervisory posts are men, and there are few women applicants. However, I shall look at the points made by the hon. Gentleman.

WALES

Water (Privatisation)

13. Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales what assessment he has made of the implications for job creation of the proposed privatisation of water in Wales.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The future development of the water industry will be a matter for the new water companies. The Government believe, however, that there will be opportunities to create new jobs through enterprise in such areas as tourism, leisure and a range of water appliances.

Mr. Wardell: As the Under-Secretary said in the House on 7 February 1985 that the water authorities were not state-owned but publicly owned, does he think that there would be better opportunities to create jobs if the shares in the new privatised companies were distributed as public wealth to the majority of householders who drink, bathe, fish and flush?

Mr. Robinson: That is an interesting proposal from the Opposition Benches. It is, I suppose, a new variation of give-away through state control. The Government believe that the way forward is to give the people of Wales an opportunity to own shares in the water industry. Currently, under the Water Act 1973 the Welsh water authority – indeed, all water authorities – is in the ownership of the Government.

General Certificate of Secondary Education

14. Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is Her Majesty's Government's policy towards voluntary donations by parents towards the cost of introducing the general certificate of secondary education.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: It is the statutory duty of local education authorities to provide suitable education for their pupils. If voluntary contributions are invited it should be made clear that no child will suffer any detriment because his or her parents are unable to make those contributions.

Dr. Thomas: Is it not the position that headmasters in Wales have reached the stage where they are perhaps panicking and demanding of parents between £5 and £10 per pupil? If these payments are not made, there is no guarantee that the new examination will be introduced successfully.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: I disagree with what the hon. Gentleman has said about the introduction of the new examination. We are now getting the will and the commitment of the teachers. I have already said that the syllabuses are out. Thirty six out of 47 have been issued and the remainder will be out shortly. I stand by what I have said about parental contributions. There may be parental contributions, but that does not mean that children whose parents are unable to contribute should suffer.

Young People (Job Vacancies)

15. Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many job vacancies for young people presently exist in Wales.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: There are approximately 11,000 current job vacancies registered at jobcentres and careers offices and these are believed to represent only about a third of the total number of vacancies available. Information held centrally does not specify whether there are age restrictions on particular vacancies.

Mr. Davies: Does the Minister accept that if he were to take the trouble to find the exact figures he would realise that there are virtually no job opportunities for young people, especially in south Wales? Does he understand that this is in stark contrast to the propaganda that he and his colleagues in the Welsh Office keep trotting out week after week?

Mr. Wyn Roberts: I think that it is the hon. Gentleman who is trotting out propaganda. There are jobs available for young people in south Wales. It is estimated that about 49 per cent. of young people who go on the YTS are found to have jobs three months after leaving the scheme. There has been an extension of the YTS and a number of relevant announcements were made in the Budget statement, including the extension of the enterprise allowance scheme and the introduction of the new workers scheme, both of which will be helpful to young people.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Sitting Days

24. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Lord Privy Seal if he has any plans to seek to reduce the number of sitting days per Session.

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): No, Sir.

Mr. Bruinvels: I was one of the hon. Members who successfully reduced the number of days that the House sat last week, and I deeply regret that there is to be no change in the number of days that the House sits each year, bearing in mind that it sits for more days than any other Parliament in western Europe. On average, the House sits 170 days a year. Will my right hon. Friend give serious consideration at least to reducing some of the business that is brought before the House and thus reducing the number of days that we sit each year?

Mr. Biffen: If my hon. Friend's contribution to shortening the number of days on which the House sits was to speak at 8.28 in the morning for one minute, I must say that that was a well-judged achievement. I must tell him that I do not think that the House would wish its arrangements to be seriously disturbed unless there was an entirely different understanding about how we process legislation. That is not something that is merely in the keep of the Government or supporters of the Government. The number of days on which the House has sat has remained broadly the same over the past decade, but my hon. Friend has raised an issue that can always be considered by the Procedure Committee.

Mr. Foot: As the Leader of the House has followed with such obvious care the detail of what was said throughout that night of squalor and disgrace last Thursday, will he tell us why he did not at some stage in the proceedings step in to try to prevent what was happening? None of us can believe that he wanted the House to demean itself in such a way. We have been told that the Prime Minister was in favour of the course that was taken, but we cannot believe that the right hon. Gentleman was. Why did he not intervene to stop what was happening when he knew that he had the power to do so?

Mr. Biffen: The right hon. Gentleman is overplaying that point. I took care to note the contribution of my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) because he is a persistent questioner. I thought it only courteous to acquaint myself with his recent contribution to reducing the number of days on which the House sits. Unlike the right hon. Gentleman, probably, I was in the House throughtout Thursday evening. I noted that no attempt was ever made to move the closure of any of the debates. That is the answer to those who believe that there was a filibuster.

Sir John Biggs-Davison: Will my right hon. Friend — a Tory and a churchman — seek to ensure that once again Whit Monday shall not be a sitting day?

Mr. Biffen: I must confess that, of all the supplementary answers that have been prepared for me on this subject, doubtless because some of my advisers have doubts about my being either a Tory or a churchman, they had not anticipated that, but I shall certainly consider it.

Mr. Shore: The hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) has brazenly confessed his own role in the proceedings last Thursday night, which resulted in the loss of one day's sitting. The Lord Privy Seal has been much more coy, but will he now take this opportunity to express his regret and condemnation of what was a disgraceful manoeuvre, and for the part played in it by his right hon. Friend the Chief Whip, and, indeed, the Prime Minister? Will he assure the House that, if he has any plans to reduce the number of sitting days, they will not include the west Lancashire solution — the organised filibuster to wipe out a private Members' day?

Mr. Biffen: No, I shall give none of those undertakings or signs of contrition which have been sought by the right hon. Gentleman. Indeed, if we are to give the matter any degree of seriousness, I should say that the House would be well served by referring to the Crossman diaries, and to Friday 26 March, when they elaborated a stratagem——

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Two wrongs do not make a right.

Mr. Biffen: No. It is a little too sensitive. It involved a stratagem which I think redounds with very little credit upon those who took it.

Mr. Simon Hughes: On the same subject, I hope that, none the less, the Leader of the House will accept that there is a difference between using parliamentary tactics to lose public or Government business, and using Government party tactics to obliterate private Members' business, from whichever party the private Member comes. Is the right hon. Gentleman prepared at least to look at the mechanisms so that the limited part of our time given to private Members is protected in future against any mechanism of contrived extension of Government or other official business?

Mr. Biffen: I repeat that I stand here with no sense of contrition about what happened last week. Those who want to engage in any historical analysis could well profit from looking at what happened on the famous occasion on 26 March 1965. If the hon. Gentleman believes that this is a point of substance, he has his own remedy, by turning to the Procedure Committee.

Sir David Price: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the best way to achieve what my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) requires would be for the House to concentrate more upon the quality rather than the quantity of legislation? With that aim in mind, will my right hon. Friend explain to my right hon. Friends on the Front Bench and to the parliamentary draftsmen that the Almighty, in his legislation, was rather more precise and succinct than the Government are today, and that the Almighty did it all in 10 Commandments — 10 clauses — and did not need to go to schedules or statutory instruments?

Mr. Biffen: I note what my hon. Friend says. I am sure he will realise that those words have echoed down the centuries. Meanwhile I suggest that in the usual channels we have the slogan, "Nearer my God to Thee."

New Parliamentary Building

25. Mr. Greenway asked the Lord Privy Seal if he will make a statement on progress with plans for the new parliamentary building; and if he will provide an estimate of its costs; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Biffen: Detailed plans for the redevelopment of the area between Parliament Street and Cannon Row are now well advanced. Construction work is expected to start next year for completion in 1990. The overall cost is estimated at £31·5 million at cash prices. Plans for the second phase, comprising the area between Cannon Row and the river, are still at an early stage. It would be premature to give a figure of the likely cost.

Mr. Harry Greenway: Can my right hon. Friend tell the House what facilities will be transferred from this building to the new parliamentary building? In considering the further use of the vacated space in these buildings, will he take account of the fact that many meetings cannot take place in the House because there is so much pressure on Committee Rooms from party Committees and all-party Committees? Will he further consider the need for facilities for interviews between hon. Members and their constituents, particularly because now, on days when there are big lobbies, people have to see constituents in corridors, in quite impossible circumstances?

Mr. Biffen: The accommodation that will be made available by the new building should offer offices for 60 hon. Members and for 100 secretaries. The Services Committee has been considering space being made available by people leaving the Palace of Westminster for the new building. I believe that it will intend that, as far as possible, priority will be given to Members' accommodation rather than additional Committee rooms.

Mr. Boyes: May I offer my usual greetings to the Lord Privy Seal from my dark, damp, dingy desk in the dump known as the Cloisters? Before he gives me his usual answer, which is that he spent many happy hours there, may I offer him a swap for a fortnight so that he can remember how happy were his hours down in the Cloisters, while I work in his office? On a more serious note, is he aware that in Strasbourg, when the new, directly elected Members of the European Parliament arrived, they did not have any offices, but that within nine months offices were provided for 500 Members? Why is it taking so long to build these offices, or is this just another Government filibuster?

Mr. Biffen: The construction time for the premises is going broadly to forecast. As for the hon. Gentleman's first question, I only hope that, when the time comes, he will appreciate the considerable expansion of offices which are implicit in the Bridge street site and that perhaps he will be able to have happier accommodation, although I have to say that his present accommodation was perfectly happy in my day.

Oral Questions

26. Mr. Winnick asked the Lord Privy Seal if Her Majesty's Government plan to bring forward any changes in the arrangements for Ministers to answer questions in the House.

Mr. Biffen: No, Sir.

Mr. Winnick: Would it not be appropriate for the Government Chief Whip to be able to answer questions so that he can try to explain and justify the disgraceful way in which Tory Members acted last Thursday night? Is it not the case that the Government Chief Whip has been requested to appear before the 1922 Committee? Quite a number of Conservative Members have publicly denounced the antics of their colleagues. How can the Conservative party declare itself in favour of free speech and the rest when it gags free speech in the House of Commons?

Mr. Biffen: I have already dealt with this matter at some considerable length on the first question that was put to me this afternoon. There are no plans to have the Chief Whip on the question roster. That would require the agreement of the usual channels and, at the moment, I have no indication that that will be forthcoming.

Mr. Stokes: Will my right hon. Friend make no changes whatever in the way in which Ministers answer questions in the House as, surely, it is the most distinctive contribution which this House makes, which is very much better than many other Houses of Parliament in other countries?

Mr. Biffen: That is an extremely helpful supplementary question and I shall try to reciprocate by giving rather better answers.

Private Members' Business

3.32 pm

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will recollect, as it has been commented on today, that on Friday we lost one of our few debates in private Members' time as a result of the devious machinations of the Government Chief Whip, with the furtive endorsement of the Prime Minister as far as we can gather. I have read the rulings that you gave on Friday and would in no way challenge them. I wish to raise a completely new point, on which I would welcome your ruling.

I submit that the House is entitled — we are not asking for a discretionary concession — to a replacement Back-Bench day in lieu of Friday.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): Absolute nonsense.

Mr. Williams: The hon. Gentleman says, "Absolute nonsense", but I remind him that he, as a Back Bencher, has every bit as much interest as the rest of us in protecting Back-Bench time.

At column 1336, Mr. Speaker, you ruled that at 9.31 am, we were still discussing Thursday's business. According to a convention that we well understand, because we had gone beyond 9.30 am, Friday did not exist. Friday did not exist as a parliamentary day, as is shown by the Official Report. Further down the column you said:

"The House itself decides how many days should be set aside for Back-Bench motions and Back-Bench time generally. It is not a matter for the Chair." [Official Report, 5 June 1986; Vol. 98, c. 1336.]

I accept entirely that it is not a matter for the Chair. The House has passed a resolution specifying the number of parliamentary days that there must be for Back Benchers, and it is a matter for the Chair to ensure that the House has the number of days that have been allocated. As Friday did not exist as a parliamentary day, it cannot count as one in terms of the resolution specifying the number of days available to Back Benchers. Therefore, Back Benchers are entitled to have that day restored to them.

If I am correct in my interpretation that Back Benchers are owed a day — I would appreciate a ruling, although I am happy not to have it immediately — would the ballot that has already taken place for that day stand, and would my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell), who won the ballot, have a right to his day?

Sir David Price (Eastleigh): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. A supplementary point to the events to which the right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) referred also relates to defending private Members' time. You and the House will recall that a number of hon. Members on both sides of the House drew attention to the difficulty about the Friday that never was during the Adjournment debate of my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Chope). I rose to speak, but was interrupted perfectly fairly on points of order. That cut into my hon. Friend's time. Is there any "injury time" if during an Adjournment debate a substantial number of points of order are made perfectly properly which interfere with the half hour dedicated to that debate? That should also be taken into consideration.

Mr. Michael Foot (Blaenau Gwent): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wish to submit a further consideration on this matter, especially as the Leader of the House has said today that he has no sense of contrition about what has happened and, presumably, would not be willing to intervene in the event of similar circumstances occurring. If this precedent is to be followed, private Members' time will constantly be under threat by a resort to similar methods. When you consider the matter and advise the House, will you also take that into account, because it would be easy to wreck almost every Friday, and soon the House would have to take steps to reconstitute private Members' rights? Some of us think that the Leader of the House and the majority party could have taken those steps already. If they will not take them, the House certainly will.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Back-Bench days are precious to Back-Bench Members because the amount of time that we have compared with that of the Executive is, understandably, little. It is well known, and has not in any way been disputed, that the Prime Minister found the motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) offensive. Indeed, the Leader of the House used that expression last week. Obviously, the Prime Minister was involved in denying my hon. Friend his debate. I do not think that that is in dispute, and I accept that that is not a matter for you.

To return to the important point raised by my right hon. Friends the Members for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) and for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot), if next time a Labour Member wins the ballot and the same words are used in the motion — that is a possibility, because this is Parliament and when we are denied the right to put our case we find other ways and means — and the motion is seen as censuring the Prime Minister and her conduct over the three important matters in my hon. Friend's motion, which was not debated, are we to have a repeat and

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is going into the merits of the case. That is not a point of order for me.

Mr. Winnick: We believe that you should help us in your role as Speaker if the Executive goes out of its way to deny a Back-Bench Member his debate when he is lucky in the ballot, which is rare. What protection can we have? If the Prime Minister, the Executive and all the Government forces deny us that opportunity, surely at the end of the day all that we can do is ask you for your protection.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will recall, because you were in the Chair at the time, that I was one of the Back-Bench Members who were seeking to participate in the Channel tunnel debate on Thursday night. You will also recall that such was the interest shown in the debate by Back-Bench Members that I had to curtail my remarks at 9 am on Friday, in deference to the wish of the House to proceed with the business. I hope you will take into account the fact that such was the legitimate interest in the debate on the Channel tunnel and its importance that the debate carried on through the night and I had to curtail my remarks at 9 o'clock the following morning.

Mrs. Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. If you are to consider this matter, will you also reflect on the fact that not just one but many hon. Members attended the Chamber to debate the Unborn Children (Protection) Bill, and that Labour Members insisted on spending the entire time moving a by-election?

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. If Friday last does not exist in parliamentary terms, would it be true to say that the ballot does not exist? I say this as one who does not mind whether or not the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) speaks, as long as I do not have to listen to him.

Mr. Jerry Hayes (Harlow): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. If the Opposition feel so terribly upset at being denied an opportunity to debate a motion of censure on the Prime Minister, is not the remedy in their own hands? They must ask for a debate.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I was elected in 1979. One night, when an agreement had been made through the usual channels between the Whips, I exceeded by five minutes the agreement that had been reached, which was that I should speak for only five minutes. Following that debate the then Chief Whip came to me and privately deprecated what I had done. I always remember what he said, as he was most bitter in his criticism. He said, "This place lives by agreements." As I understand it, a resolution of the House provides for the allocation of time. That resolution was born out of discussions through the usual channels, and so is subject to the principle which I believe in the usual channels is referred to as "best endeavours".

Last week, within the orbit of the best endeavours agreement, the Government broke that agreement by inciting Back Benchers to filibuster. In doing so they undermined the agreement which they had put to the House and which became a resolution when it was carried by a majority of hon. Members. I ask you to deprecate any action by any Whip that leads to undermining an agreement made through the usual channels.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. The hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Forth) — I think that that is the area that suffers from his overlordship — made the comment that he had had to curtail his speech at 9 am on Friday. I had left the House by then. If that is the case, he is about the only hon. Member in the whole of the filibuster who did so. I sat here until the wee small hours of Friday morning — the morning that does not exist in parliamentary terms — and not a single honourable filibusterer curtailed his remarks. There was a repetition and regurgitation of rubbish hour after hour. It was quite clear that some Conservative Members, and even some right hon. Members, were taking part in an exercise to defend the Prime Minister, who obviously has something to hide.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have allowed this matter to run because I have sympathy with the hon. Member who lost his place on Friday. It is true that Friday 6 June was a designated day under the resolution of the House on 7 November. However, the House well knows that if a debate runs over, as it did on Thursday night and Friday beyond 9.30 am, the day's business is lost. I have no authority to do as some hon. Members would wish. It would require a resolution of the House to nominate another specific day, and that is best discussed through the usual channels.

Mr. Williams: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I invite the Leader of the House to respond sympathetically to any such representations from this side of the House?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I cannot add any more.

Later

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney): Further to the point of order about the lost Friday, Mr. Speaker, about which we have heard a great deal. We are grateful to you for your clear ruling and guidance. It is now plain that it is open to the House to restore the lost rights of private Members by a resolution of the House. As you rightly said, this matter should be considered by the usual channels. I think that it is appropriate, in the presence of the Leader of the House, who has a key involvement in the matter, for you to ask him to respond positively to our invitation and to take the lead in restoring the rights of Back Benchers.

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): I can add nothing helpful in answer to the questions. If the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) wants to use the offices of the usual channels, that is a matter for him.

Official Report

3.45 pm

Mr. Brian Sedgemore (Hackney, South and Shoreditch): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. During the economic debate last week there were a number of interruptions on points of order, when I was speaking, by Conservatives Members who wanted to stop me from criticising a man called Mohammed Fayed, the anti-Semitic fraudster who runs Harrods. When that happened you intervened and made a number of rulings, and there came a point when I was standing on my feet in this particular position. I had the Floor of the House and I said quite clearly, so that everyone could hear — I have checked it with the radio — that I felt, rightly or wrongly, that I was being denied the right to free speech, that I was not going to continue my speech and that I was going to walk out. I then walked out. I do not want to go over the merits of that, Mr. Speaker, but in fact I have had a look at Hansard and none of that is referred to at all. The whole incident has effectively been wiped out. I have been to see the Editor of Hansard, and he said that that was a mistake.

I have another point, Mr. Speaker, which is that, without knowing that, when I corresponded with you — I do not want to go into what is in the correspondence — you replied to me on the basis of what was in Hansard and not what I said. You also quoted something that I said as an accurate quotation from Hansard, but which is not an accurate quotation of what I said because that was wrong. Hansard told me that it deliberately changed that in order to improve what I said. The combination of the omission and of the so-called improvement was actually calculated, although possibly not designed, to make me look very silly. I do not mind that because that is a fairly usual state for me. But what I say is that if we are moving into an era when there are to be allegations that Conservatives are turning this Parliament into a denial of free speech we do not want Hansard associated with that. I ask that a corrigendum be put in.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that if the hon. Gentleman looks at Hansard of 5 June he will find that that did happen. The hon. Gentleman should look in column 1194. None of us in this place should ever destroy our speeches. I am sure that his admirable remarks can adequately be made on Friday of this week and will be in order — [Interruption.] Well, I do not know whether everyone will agree they are admirable!

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, &c.

Ordered

That the draft Pool Competitions Act 1971 (Continuance) Order 1986 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.—[Mr. Biffen.]

Orders of the Day

National Health Service (Amendment) Bill

Not amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

LIFTING OF ALL CROWN IMMUNITY

'For all purposes:—

(a) a health authority shall not be regarded as a servant or agent of the Crown or as enjoying any status, immunity or privilege of the Crown; and

(b) premises used by a health authority or provided by a health authority for use by health authority staff shall not be regarded as property of or property held on behalf of the Crown.'. [Mr. Dobson.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

3.49 pm

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take the following:

New clause 2—Application of Rent Acts to health authority—

'For the purpose of the Rent Acts:—

(a) a health authority shall not be regarded as a servant or agent of the Crown or as enjoying any status, immunity or privilege of the Crown.'.

(b) premises used by a health authority or provided by a health authority for use by health authority staff shall be regarded as property of or property held on behalf of the Crown.'.

New clause 3—Application of health and safety legislation to health authorities—

'1.—(1) for the purposes of the health and safety legislation:

(a) a health authority shall not be regarded as the servant or agent of the Crown, or as enjoying any status, immunity or privilege of the Crown; and

(b) premises used by a health authority shall not be regarded as property of or property held on behalf of the Crown.

(2) The appropriate authority may by regulations provide who is to be treatd as the user, occupier or owner of any such premises for any of those purposes; and

(3) The powers to make regulations altered by subsection (2) above shall be exercisable by statutory instrument.

(4) A statutory instrument containing regulations made in the exercise of the power conferred by that subsection shall not be made unless a draft of the instrument has been laid before Parliament and approved by a resolution of each House.

(5) Section 125 of the 1977 Act and section 101 of the 1979 Act shall have no effect in relation to any action, liability, claim or demand arising out of the health and safety legislation.'.

New clause 5—Health Authority Premises—

'No. premises, owned or used by health authorities, including residential accommodation used by or tenanted by health authority employees, shall be regarded as the property of or property held on behalf of the Crown.'.

Amendment No. 62, in title, line 2, after 'food', insert 'and health and safety.'.

Mr. Dobson: When one looks at any of the learned tomes, one finds that the concept of Crown immunity comes to us, as it is described, from time immemorial. An explanation is offered that laws that were the King's own laws could have no jurisdiction over the King. It is on that basis that Crown immunity still exists. At the time that that concept was formulated we lived in a primitive society. Under this Government many people are reverting to living in a primitive society, but not in the sense that I am talking about.

At the time that the concept of Crown immunity came into operation and became hallowed by use, it was a simple state, which had few functions. Since then the state has taken on a multiplicity of functions, there are a multiplicity of laws, and there are a multiplicity of Government agencies responsible for enforcing those laws. In the more complex and, some would claim, more sophisticated society that we now have, Labour Members claim that the concept of Crown immunity is time expired. It has no place in our current society.

Crown immunity was first substantially undermined —if that is the right word—by the Crown Proceedings Act introduced by the Labour Government in 1947. It was felt necessary to move with the times and at least give individuals the opportunity and right to sue the Crown for damages. However, the Crown Proceedings Act does not permit criminal proceedings against the Crown or any of the agencies presently covered by Crown immunity. As a result, many laws do not apply to Crown property or to Crown institutions.

We find ourselves in the strange position that a health authority can be sued by an injured individual in the civil courts, possibly over being poisoned as a result of something going wrong in a kitchen, but the health authority cannot be prosecuted under the criminal aspects of the food hygiene regulations that the authority was breaking. It is not simply the food hygiene regulations that do not apply to hospitals and Health Service property. The general health and safety legislation does not apply. Recently, the Secretary of State for Social Services made it clear that the Rent Acts do not apply to Crown property, at least as far as the National Health Service is concerned. Who benefits from the existence of Crown immunity? The answer seems to be literally no one, because the existence of Crown immunity leaves hospital more dangerous than they could be and should be for both patients and staff.

If Crown immunity has lasted since time immemorial, should it be kept for that reason alone? We might argue for that in relation to the armed forces or for one or two aspects of Crown activity that have gone on since time immemorial, but in the case of the National Health Service and hospitals, Crown immunity arrived with time immemorialness on 5 July 1948. When hospitals were owned by private charities or municipalities, Crown immunity did not apply. Crown immunity is not even hallowed by time. It is certainly not hallowed by any sense of justice, logic or common sense.

The position is exactly the reverse in the Post Office, which used to be a Government department but became a nationalised industry. On vesting day, when the Post Office became a nationalised industry and ceased to be a Government department, Crown immunity disappeared in a trice. Apparently no one thought that that would be harmful, damaging, expensive or likely to undermine the state.

We believe that there is no justification in logic for the maintenance of the concept of Crown immunity in its application to Health Service properties. This Government have rejected that idea time and time again and, to be fair to them, previous Governments had done so as well, but a combination of extremely bad publicity about the conditions prevailing in NHS kitchens and long-term campaigns by the Institution of Environmental Health Officers and by a considerable number of trade unions, supported by the Royal College of Nursing and the British Medical Association, forced the Government to reconsider the position.

The campaigns were strongly supported by the new media, which found that they gained attention for their programmes and papers if they displayed vast piles of rotting refuse in a kitchen or to use the example of a hospital that is outside my constituency but serves it made the Royal Free cockroach probably more famous than the Royal Free hospital itself. It reached the stage at which someone wrote in my local newspaper that he or she did not mind the Royal part but would really like it to be the Cockroach Free hospital. Such publicity gradually drove the Government into at least considering abandoning the concept of Crown immunity in relation to hospital kitchens.

The final blow that forced the Government to give way altogether was the incident and then the report of the inquiry into the severe outbreak of food poisoning that led to more than 20 deaths at Stanley Royd hospital in the Wakefield health district. It is worth repeating that the Stanley Royd hospital—in which in the fourth quarter of the 20th century people were attempting to provide a decent service and decent care and meals for patients—was built when Napoleon was alive in 1818 as the West Riding Paupers Lunatic Asylum. It would be useful for the House to bear that fact in mind when discussing this series of new clauses and the other amendments relating to the lifting of Crown immunity. From 1818 to 1948 Stanley Royd hospital was not protected in any way by Crown immunity. That protection has been needed only since 1948, when it became part of the NHS.

As a result of all the publicity, the Government decided —we welcome their decision—to end Crown immunity in so far as it applied to the food regulations. We believe that we should get rid of Crown immunity altogether in relation to all NHS premises, and there are a large number of reasons for advocating that course. In that part of the economy that is outside the Crown, if there are serious offences relating to health and safety, the appropriate people from the Health and Safety Executive issue enforcement notices. If a Crown property is involved— in this case an NHS property — they issue Crown notices. If it is non-Crown property, they can institute legal proceedings against those responsible for health and safety offences being committed. If, having issued a notice, it is not complied with by the deadline set down in the notice, the Health and Safety Executive can prosecute, even if it had not decided to do so at the outset.

A health authority cannot, however, be prosecuted either at the outset or if it fails to take action within the period of time laid down in the Crown notice. It follows, as night follows day, that without that threat there will be less outside regulation by the HSE and its staff and that the people working within the Health Service will not take the concept of health and safety at work as seriously as it is taken by those outside the Health Service and as seriously as they would take it if the notices and investigations could be followed up by court proceedings.

Substantial delays occur in the implementation of Crown notices. Health authorities are slower than those who are not covered by Crown immunity to do what the HSE thinks is necessary. Again that follows from the fact that health authorities cannot be prosecuted if they do not do it or, or if they are slow to do it. That is damaging. It means that for an HSE inspector to take action over Health Service premises is much more of a bind, much more troublesome and much less immediately productive than his work on premises where the HSE has the necessary statutory powers.

All hon. Members recognise that each human being responds to either incentives or difficulties. If we permit to continue a system that leads to frustration for HSE inspectors when they try to do something about NHS premises, we should not be surprised if they are not so enthusiastic about that work as about their other work.

It is usual for the HSE to make surprise visits to premises that are not covered by Crown immunity. The forewarned visit to premises is a useful technique for getting premises tidied up temporarily, but if premises are to be made permanently safer and healthier the threat of a visit that has not been forewarned is very important. However, the HSE may not make surprise visits to health authority premises without the prior consent of the health authority. That may sound as though the surprise visit is no surprise at all. I do not suggest that the HSE needs to obtain consent on every occasion when it intends to make a surprise visit, but it needs in advance a blanket agreement from the health authority that surprise visits will be permitted. I am told by the staff involved that that consent is not always as readily forthcoming as we might expect from public bodies that are supposed to obey the laws that have been passed by this House.

There is also clear evidence that Crown notices are used less frequently than the notices that are issued to employers who are running other premises. Again the reason is that it is not worthwhile from the point of view of hard-worked HSE inspectors, whose numbers have already been reduced. However, there is an anomaly. Although a health authority which may have failed to provide funds to make a kitchen safe, clean and decent cannot be prosecuted, the individual managers can be prosecuted. If I were a manager, that would be most offensive to me. I should find it most offensive that my gaffers, who had made my life impossible, could get away with it but that I could be gaoled. That is completely unreasonable.

It has another effect. Faced with the possibility of individual prosecution, in the absence of the ability to prosecute the authority as a whole, managers have been observed to try to spread the responsibility among several of them so that none of them is individually responsible for the prevailing circumstances. It is understandable that they should try to camouflage their activities and render themselves less liable to individual prosecution. It is a normal human response, even if we do not welcome it.

If individuals can be held responsible but not the organisation that employs them and fails to supply them with the necessary resources to do their job, it amounts to statutory hypocrisy and we ought to get rid of it. Therefore, the concept of Crown immunity ought to disappear altogether. The Government intend to get rid of it in hospital kitchens, but the Opposition see no reason for getting rid of Crown immunity relating to the food regulations but keeping it for other parts of hospital premises and for other hospital functions. In particular, we are very doubtful about its continued application to health and safety.

Some Conservative Members who served on the Standing Committee will have heard me say, but it is worth emphasising it by saying it again, that hospitals are extremely dangerous places. They are more dangerous than most industrial and commercial premises. Most hospital patients are full of germs, and most hospitals carry out dangerous processes. On the premises of most hospitals there are large amounts of dangerous drugs and substances which, if used carefully, may be beneficial, but which can cause trouble if they are not properly handled, or if there is slack control over what goes on.

Furthermore, most hospitals are full of extremely dangerous and horrible refuse. I refer to clinical waste and to things cut from people, sucked from people or dragged from people. Hospitals are also full of what hospital employees call "sharps" — that is, implements that can cut people. They, too, are very dangerous. There are few premises in this country, including nuclear installations, which in a day-to-day sense, are so intrinsically dangerous to the people who work in them as hospitals. This is a threat to the health and safety of both patients and staff.

When patients go into hospital they assume that they will be made better, that their lives will be saved and that their pain will be eased. Patients are entrusted to the National Health Service on those grounds, but many of our hospitals are breaching that trust. There is a great deal of cross-infection. For example, post-operative infection has increased in the National Health Service since this Government came to power, but it is not listed among the Government's achievements when the Secretary of State for Social Services or the Prime Minister refers on television to the National Health Service. There has been a 14 per cent. increase in post-operative infection since 1979. We all know from what happened at the Stanley Royd hospital that salmonella poisoning is a fairly commonplace complaint in our hospitals. We also know from the incident on which a report was made last week that legionnaire's disease has killed a number of people in our hospitals.

Many hospital buildings are of poor design and many are in a poor state of repair. There are poor standards of cleanliness and hospitals are full of dangers to staff and patients. People can suffer from falls, and heaps of rubbish lying about can lead to fires. Society and Parliament are asking people to do things for us and our constituents, and we owe it to the patients, staff and visitors to make hospitals as safe as possible. We are simply not doing that. One reason for that is that, compared with the need for health and safety at work in other premises, and because of how the law stands, officialdom sees hospitals as different. I am talking about officialdom in the hospitals and officialdom outside. Inspectors see the hospital premises as different, and so do the inspected.

There is an assumption, which history suggests is wholly false, that people running hospitals know about health and safety and about how to keep people in hospitals healthy and safe. All the evidence suggests that outside the specialist fields in which they operate few people in hospitals know how to do that. I can give an example by citing something that occurred in my constituency a year or two ago.

Someone was unfortunate enough to die of smallpox as a result of work carried out at the London School of Hygiene and Tropical Medicine in my constituency. In the course of the inquiry into that outbreak the staff of the environmental health department, or, as the outbreak may have occurred before local government reorganisation it may have been the health department of the London borough of Camden, was closely questioned about why it had permitted certain practices at the London School of Hygiene and Tropical Medicine in dealing with smallpox. The answer given by the staff was that it would have needed official advice on how to advise others. The QC conducting the inquiry asked where the advice would have been sought. The staff replied that it would have been sought from the London School of Hygiene and Tropical Medicine because it was reasonable for the staff to assume that the people at that school knew better than anyone else in Britain how to deal with smallpox. They manifestly did not, because they were not even keeping to their own rules. That is an example of what can happen.

The Rent Acts do not apply to Health Service premises or to premises owned by, or, as far as I can make out, leased by, or run by the health authorities. Crown immunity intervenes in a civil court relationship, and not just in relation to criminal proceedings. The non-application of the Rent Acts to hospital residential premises has become more important because of the Rayner review, which the Government have accepted and which suggests that the Government should get on with disposing of nurses' homes as quickly as they can in order to raise money.

I think that it was on 24 March that the Secretary of State gave me an undertaking that no health authority would take court action to turn a nurse out of accommodation in which the nurse wanted to remain. No caveats or reservations were expressed when that undertaking was given. It was later discovered that in the West Surrey and North-East Hampshire health authority a nurse was being put out of the premises in which she lived and that the health authority was resorting to the county court to get her out. That appeared to be in breach of the undertaking given by the Secretary of State. To add insult to injury, the Secretary of State joined his name to that of the health authority in the court action that the authority was taking against the nurse.

The right hon. Gentleman has since arranged for the Minister to explain to me rather belatedly that what he said in the House related only to property owned by the health authority. He did not say that at the time, and in any case large numbers of health authorities do not own the freehold of nurses homes, especially in central London and in other big cities, where hospitals tend to have long leaseholds.

Are we to understand that the plain undertaking given by the Secretary of State to the House does not apply unless by a quirk of fate the health authority happens to own the freehold of the property in which the nurses are living? That strikes me as a bit odd, because the next stage in the case in West Surrey and North-East Hampshire was that although the health authority did not own the premises from which the nurse was being chucked out, the Secretary of State's plea in the court was to be that the Rent Act did not apply to him because he had Crown immunity. He cannot have it both ways. He cannot say that he will not apply his undertaking to leasehold property and at the same time say that if it comes to a fight in the courts over leasehold property he will plead Crown immunity. There is no need for the Secretary of State or for health authorities to have Crown immunity for nurses' residential homes or for residential property provided by hospitals or health authorities. The Rent Acts, feeble as they are in some ways, should apply to those properties, and that is why we have tabled new clause 2.

There seems to be no one, other than the Secretary of State and a few of his hon. Friends and a few civil servants who are paid to agree with him, who is in favour of retaining Crown immunity. Trade unions and other staff bodies within the National Health Service have campaigned for years for Crown immunity to be lifted from National Health Service properties. Bodies and organisations representing patients also believe that it would be in the interests of patients for Crown immunity to be lifted. The National Association of Health Authorities in England and Wales, the representative of the authorities that would become liable to prosecution, thinks that Crown immunity should be lifted. Perhaps the case for lifting it is best summarised by the British Medical Association, which said:

"We believe the arguments for retaining Crown immunity are no longer tenable. The National Health Service is the largest employer in the country and as such it should not be outside the legislation. Moreover, the passage of time should have given experience of meeting legal requirements in health and safety. The recent introduction of the recommendations of the Griffith inquiry into the management of the National Health Service has clarified management responsibility."

No doubt the Minister will tell us wondrous things about the introduction of general managers. The BMA went on to say:

"A visit to almost any hospital would provide examples of the disregard for the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974, laboratory conditions, storage of materials, collection and disposal of rubbish, fire hazard and ventilation. Whilst these breaches of the Act may be pointed out by the health and safety executive inspectors, there is no compulsion upon health authorities to rectify the conditions."

It is a bit disturbing to hear the BMA saying something like that.

The BMA compares that situation with the circumstances of general practitioners in the NHS who, if they employ more than five people, are not covered by Crown immunity and are subject to the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act. The bag of sharps or clinical waste in a GP's surgery—extremely unlikely to be as horrible as some of the clinical waste from a hospital—is covered by the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act. Hospitals in the private sector, which I should like to see disappear entirely, are covered. Local authorities are covered. The BMA and, as far as I know, all my hon. Friends believe that it would be right for the NHS to be covered.

Why will the Government not lift Crown immunity altogether? It is right that it should be lifted. The case for doing so is supported by everyone involved, and it has been conceded on food hygiene. There is clearly no principle involved. The question whether some premises, functions or organisations are or are not covered by Crown immunity is just a lottery. It could well be that Parliament decided when the NHS was set up that it did not count as Crown property. It did not make a ha'porth of difference when the Post Office went out of the Crown area and became a nationalised industry.

Labour Members believe that Crown immunity is an idea whose time has passed. It serves no useful purpose. We are convinced that it is positively harmful to patients and staff and that it should go. What explanation Ministers can give for not getting rid of it, I cannot imagine. They will not be able to say that they do not care any more because, following the Tory party conference in Perth, we know that even the Prime Minister apparently cares about things such as the NHS and the patients in it. They may say that it will cost money, but I should not need to tell a Tory that most worthwhile things cost money.

If it is right to have clean hospitals and to spend money to make sure that the operating theatres of a hospital are spotlessly clean, not full of infection, and as a patient who has been in the operating theatre has to go on to a ward and be fed with food produced in a kitchen, to be wheeled about and have tests done on him in pathology laboratories, it follows, as night follows day, that anybody who is serious about cleanliness, standards of hygiene and the care of patients must support the abolition of Crown immunity altogether. That is what Labour Members believe and that is why we are putting forward the four new clauses. I commend them to the House and I defy the Minister to come up with any sensible reason for not accepting them.

Mr. Jack Ashley (Stoke-on-Trent, South): I want to begin by recommending support for new clause 1 and the associated new clauses and complimenting my hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson). In Committee he has argued these basic points with the Minister and on any reading of those debates it is obvious, even to the most prejudiced reader on one side or the other, that my hon. Friend won the argument hands down. Moreover, I commend him on the speech that he has just made.

It is disgraceful that we need to put these new clauses forward at all. It is the Government's responsibility to ensure that hospitals are clean and safeguarded, but they are not doing so. All the evidence at our disposal shows clearly that patients and staff are suffering dangerous conditions. It beats me how the Minister can stand up in the House and say that there is a powerful case for abolishing Crown immunity in one part of a hospital—the kitchen—but not elsewhere.

By removing Crown immunity from the kitchens the Government have admitted that Crown immunity is protective of negligent health authorities, but those same health authorities can be just as negligent in other parts of a hospital. Having admitted the principle that Crown immunity is wrong because it prevents the prosecution of negligent health authorities, the Minister should go much further and ensure that health authorities are not protected in their work in other parts of hospitals, particularly with regard to health and safety, as is specified in the new clauses.

The Government are dodging and fudging on this vital issue. It is axiomatic that health and safety legislation is good and necessary. No one seriously disputes that. But the health and safety provisions should apply in the NHS as they apply outside. The Minister for Health is on record as saying that compliance, rather than punishment, should be the objective. Of course, we want compliance, but we shall not get compliance without the threat of punishment. All the evidence shows that the Crown notices, which are the alternative to the abolition of Crown immunity, simply do not work.

In 1984 there were only 32 Crown notices to health authorities, although there were 1,891 hospitals. In that same year there were 15,816 Crown notices in non-Crown premises. The difference is twentyfold. Crown notices in non-NHS premises were meaningful because the right to prosecution was there. The threat of prosecution could be made where there was negligence. Only one twentieth of Crown notices were issued in NHS hospitals simply because they could not be enforced.

The lack of power to prosecute can be seen in the views of environmental health officers, especially those mentioned by my hon. Friend in relation to the Stanley Royd hospital. They see themselves not as enforcement officers but as visitors and that is scandalous. Those people are specially selected, trained and appointed to enforce the law, yet they are unable to do so and they simply see themselves as visitors. Just fancy any policeman seeking to be invited in as a visitor with no right to take action. That is the position for environmental health officers in NHS hospitals. It really is ludicrous.

The consequences of the lack of enforcement should be known to the House of Commons, but nobody knows what the consequences are. I asked the Minister, in a series of parliamentary questions, for a comparison of the figures on industrial disease and accidents in NHS hospitals and those in non-Crown premises. The Minister's answer was that those figures were not available. He does not know what goes on in the hospitals for which he is responsible. He prefers a blindfold and a lack of knowledge. He prefers the House not to know the facts. If he wanted the House to know the facts he would find the figures, but he is simply telling me, and therefore the House, that the Government do not know that, and that is inexcusable. Ministers should acquaint themselves with the facts and not simply say that they do not know the answer.

4.30 pm

My hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras rightly paid tribute to various organisations. The General, Municipal, Boilermakers and Allied Trades Union started the campaign, along with the environmental health officers, and managed to get some action from the Minister. Now the British Medical Association has added its considerable weight. The BMA speaks authoritatively and tells the Minister that he must remove Crown immunity because of the dangers to patients and staff. The Minister should take those views very seriously.

Some hospitals are full of bacteria and viruses and daily pose a risk to the health of patients and staff. We need to ensure hygiene of the highest order and the safe disposal of rubbish and powerful drugs.

The 1981 survey by the pest control unit showed that 11·6 per cent. of English hospitals were infested with pharoah's ants, which carry disease and 20 organisms. The ants are tiny and move around our hospitals, from germ-infested sluices to wards, beds, operating theatres and even to sterile dressings and hypodermic needles.

What do the Government do about these dangerous conditions? They have a pest advisory service, which consists of two people working part-time on pest control. Pharoah's ants are crawling all over our hospitals and infesting sterile dressings, but the Government have only two part-time workers dealing with pest infestation. It is the merest nod towards the control of disease caused by pests. It is simply not good enough, especially as only 73 of the 1,891 hospitals in England have been surveyed in the past 10 years.

Removing Crown immunity in this area and others would make health authorities far more vigilant and active, because of the fear of prosecution. That fear applies everywhere else and there is no reason why it should not operate in our NHS hospitals. I hope that the Minister will think again and will ensure that patients and staff in our hospitals have the same protection as everyone else.

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton (Fife, Central): My hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) was right to emphasise how extremely dangerous hospitals can be. They are places to be avoided if possible, but, because entrance to them by patients, visitors and staff is unavoidable, it behoves hon. Members, health authorities and everyone else to make the premises as safe as possible.

The new clauses emphasise the fact that "premises" should include all premises and not just kitchens and the places where food is provided. The Bill is unacceptably narrow in the view of Labour Members and every interested body.

My hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras made perhaps the most significant point in the debate when he said that the Government go out of their way to say that the Bill will cost nothing. Not a single organisation or individual believes that for an instant. If we are to have safe kitchens, rid of the infestation that we have read about and seen on television, it will cost a lot of money.

If the Minister asks, "Where will the money come from?" I shall remind him, as I have reminded the House, that at the time of the Falklands expedition the Prime Minister said, "We shall see this through, no matter what the cost." She has maintained that view throughout and we have spent, and will continue to spend, thousands of millions of pounds of taxpayers' money on the Falkland islands. However, when we ask for some millions to be spent on hospital services to make hospitals safe for patients, visitors and staff, we are told that the Government cannot find the money or, if they can, that it must come out of another part of hospital authorities' budgets.

I tabled an amendment to extend the Bill to residential accommodation. It has been said many times in the House and outside that the Bill presumes that all the filth that we know about—all the rats, the mice, the cockroaches, the ants, the flies and the other infestations in NHS hospitals — are due to mismanagement. Indeed, the Minister made that point about the recent scandal involving food poisoning at Wakefield. It is suggested that all the problems can be eliminated within existing budgets.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley) has referred to some aspects of the matter and I did not realise how much disgusting filth and danger exist in our hospitals. The smaller the insect, the filthier it seems to be. I have a document from the British Pest Control Association entitled "Hospitals can damage your health". It says of the common house fly, which infests not only kitchens, but often wards and certain residential accommodation.

> "This is what happens when a fly lands on your food. Flies can't eat solid food, so to soften it up they vomit on it. Then they stamp the vomit in until it is a liquid, usually stamping in a few germs for good measure. Then when it's good and runny they suck it all back again, probably dropping some excrement at the same time. And then, when they've finished eating, it's your turn."

That is happening in our hospitals where people go to get their health improved. While these wretched flies are busy, the bugs, the cockroaches and the ants are all at it as well. The Government say that they will tackle them if these pests happen to be in the kitchen. But cockroaches and flies do not know the difference between kitchens, wards and residential accommodation.

It was said that the nuclear accident at Chernobyl knew no national boundaries, but flies, ants and cockroaches do not know national boundaries either. In that regard, the Bill is nonsense. It pretends that if only the problems in the kitchens were solved, everything would be all right. My hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras referred to the activities, over the years, of the trade unions. I am sponsored in the House by the Confederation of Health Service Employees, which has taken a long-standing interest in these matters. Moreover, the General, Municipal, Boilermakers and Allied Trades Union (GMBATU for short) has also taken a long-standing interest in them. The union's report, published in 1985, estimated that one in four of all hospital kitchens would be closed on grounds of hygiene if the NHS did not have immunity from prosecution. I suspect that the same applies to residential accommodation.

For years, hospital doctors and nurses have complained about the state of NHS residential accommodation. My sponsoring union, COHSE, has been in the forefront of that campaign for a long time. In 1985, at the TUC conference, Mr. Hector MacKenzie, the assistant general secretary of that union, said:

> "It is scandalous that hospital kitchens can become breeding grounds for infection and be equipped with dangerous machinery — and that Crown Immunity allows standards which would lead to the immediate closure of a fast food restaurant in Bloomsbury or Blackpool and the prosecution of its owner."

A report of that conference states:

> "COHSE's successful motion stressed that the 'Crown employee' status of one million NHS employees and many other public sector workers means that they are excluded from the laws designed to protect employees at work."

Indeed, my hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras referred to the fact that the health and safety legislation does not apply. The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland knows full well the great difficulties that followed the fire some years ago in the nurses' home at Kirkcaldy's Victoria hospital, partly as a consequence of Crown immunity. But, Mr. MacKenzie continued:

> "Hospital staff live in hospital accommodation which is falling into an incredibly disgraceful state of repair. Because of Crown Immunity the NHS can (and sometimes does) behave like the most unscrupulous of private landlords — and get away with it."

The report of the conference then adds:

> "Crown status deprived them of rights of security of tenure and repairs afforded to most private and council tenants."

That is the situation in an area to which everyone pays lip service. The Prime Minister says that she cares very much about it, but she does her best to destroy it, and not least in this regard. In 1983, the Nursing Mirror launched a "Homes Fit for Nurses" campaign which excited great national interest and sympathy. Thousands of letters poured in from all over the United Kingdom, describing the disgusting and intolerable living conditions of thousands of the most dedicated workers in our NHS. A lot of the letters came from doctors and nurses, many of whom have no choice but to live in that accommodation which is protected by Crown immunity. After that campaign had reached its crescendo, the Government's response was to introduce this Bill. They did not introduce it immediately after the Nursing Mirror's campaign of 1983. Only now, after the scandal of Wakefield, have the Government decided on this miserable little Bill.

The Government's response to the problem of accommodation was merely to get rid of it altogether and to sell it off. They decided to tell many of the nurses that they should seek their own accommodation in the private sector as best they could. Successive Ministers have argued in the House that not all of the accommodation is used. I think that the Government quote a figure of about 20 per cent. for the amount of accommodation that is not used, and they argue that it should be disposed of in the interest of value for money. But it is a Catch 22 situation. If the property is neglected and allowed to fall into decay so that nurses and doctors avoid it, it will become untenanted. The Government then use that as an excuse for getting rid of it altogether.

When my hon. Friend the Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) raised these issues a few weeks ago in an Adjournment debate on 23 May, he referred to the Rayner report of August 1984, which specifically dealt with the problem of NHS residential accommodation. In that report, Rayner recommended — and the Government accepted — that 73,000 units of accommodation, including houses, flats and bedsits, should be disposed of out of a total of about 112,000 units. I am not sure whether that includes the figures for Scotland, but perhaps the Under-Secretary of State can tell me. However, that would mean getting rid of 65 out of every 100 residential units occupied by NHS doctors and nurses, and the nurses certainly would have to seek accommodation where they could. The Government are now implementing those proposals, and are causing great anxiety and anger in the process.

In his reply to that debate, the Minister played down the issue and implied that my hon. Friend was scaremongering and inaccurate. But there can be no doubt that the Government have gone ahead with that policy without giving much thought to its consequences. In his reply to that debate, the Minister spoke in his bland and soporific way about the more efficient use of public money. Indeed, he is an expert at that sort of thing. He also spoke about the need to cut out waste. We all know the shibboleths that the Government bring out when they are slashing public expenditure on services that they do not much like. He spoke about saving public money, cutting out waste, and becoming more efficient in order to project the image of a caring Government and a tear-jerking Prime Minister. But we all know her, and what she has done to the Health Service, housing and so on.

In column 695 of Hansard, even the Minister had to concede that the health authorities would investigate how the policy would be implemented. I think that he said that a circular would be issued very shortly. Has that circular been published? He must be able to tell me by now whether it has been published and also whether it applies to residential accommodation in Scotland.

A number of questions remain unanswered and I hope that the Minister will reply to them today. A few of them have been asked by myself and my hon. Friends during recent exchanges in the House. On 23 May the Minister said:

> "Nobody will be required to move from his or her present accommodation without being offered a suitable alternative place to live." [Official Report, 23 May 1986, Vol. 98, c. 694.]

I say nothing about the grammar; I am simply reading Hansard.

I have asked the question — and we deserve an answer: who will seek out that accommodation? Will the onus be on the health authority or the nurse? Who will decide what is suitable accommodation — the NHS manager on a salary of £40,000 to £50,000 a year or the nurse on a salary of £5,000? Who will decide what is a reasonable rent? Who will decide whether accommodation is suitable in terms of its rent, its facilities or its proximity to the hospital? A hospital manager in a rural area might decide that accommodation is convenient even though it might be 10 miles away — but the poor nurse probably does not have a bike and certainly not a car, and the Government have destroyed the bus services. It is no use providing accommodation that is 10 miles away from the hospital in a rural area where there are no buses at weekends. There is a multiplicity of questions that the Government have not even attempted to answer.

This is a mean little Bill that is designed to deceive. It is designed not to solve the problems but to allay a little anxiety within a limited area of the NHS. It does not get to the root of the problem because the Government fear the enormous cost that might be involved in tackling the problems with the seriousness that they deserve.

The Labour party has tabled these amendments to reveal the shortcomings — indeed, the irresponsibility — of the Government in trying to deceive the people into believing that the Bill will solve anything. It will not solve very much because the Government will not spend the money to achieve that.

Mrs. Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): I can assume only that the Bill's proposals are so limited because Conservative Members know so little about kitchens. They obviously do not realise that kitchens are not surrounded by Berlin walls — they may prefer to think of them in that way, as they do not wish to venture inside them. Certainly, cockroaches know no bounds in kitchens or any other area of public buildings. They use the lifts, fire escapes, drainpipes and even escalators, as do many other nasty creatures that can be found in public buildings which are protected by Crown immunity. If Conservative Members think that the nasty vermin will somehow be contained within an area called a kitchen, they are in for a bit of a shock.

Perhaps Conservative Members have not had my experiences. For four years I served on the Welsh regional hospital board — a body that was abolished in 1974, much to the dismay of people in Wales where there is now a less democratic Health Service than obtains in other parts of Britain. Responsibility for the Health Service now lies with the Welsh Office, and I am sorry that no one from that Department is present for the debate.

[Mrs. Ann Clwyd]

I was a member of the catering committee of the Welsh regional hospital board, and one of its interesting tasks was to visit hospitals throughout Wales to inspect kitchens and menus. Some of the things that we saw would beat many of the horror stories that were spelt out in the reports referred to by my hon. Friends. The kitchens, especially those in long-stay hospitals, were dank, damp and dirty. Some of the items on the menus were not fit to feed to the cat. One hospital had coley fish on the menu — something that is rather more acceptable today than it was in the early 1970s. One of my colleagues pointed out that coley fish was food for cats, not for patients, and it disappeared from the menu.

Unfortunately, our visits to those hospitals were, of necessity, fleeting. We could not make the detailed inspections that many of those who prepared the reports were able to carry out. Had we been able to spend some time at the hospitals, I do not doubt that we, too, would have found the pests that were mentioned during the inquiry into the food poisoning outbreak at the Stanley Royd hospital.

The 1977 circular stressed the need to be constantly on the alert to the dangers of food poisoning. It laid down certain basic requirements with which hospitals should comply and it also dealt with inspection. It suggested that health authorities should invite inspection by environmental health authorities to report on all areas within their premises where food was stored, processed or consumed.

One section in the report deserves repeating because I am sure that it applies to many establishments. The report of the Charing Cross environmental health officer shows that bird droppings were found in the jelly, rice coated with bacteria, infestations of mice and cockroaches, sparrows flying around kitchens, dead cockroaches in a food store and slicing machines coated with thick grease. The newly appointed general manager was quoted as saying that conditions were absolutely disgraceful and indefensible.

Another example is the Royal Free hospital, which environmental health officers said would have been prosecuted had it not been for Crown immunity. Chicken and cockroach chasseur was reportedly served to two patients and a nurse. Other named hospitals that have beeen criticised included——

Mr. Dobson: Is my hon. Friend aware that no one was reassured by the reassurances given by an official of the Royal Free hospital that, provided the cockroach had dropped in the mixture at the beginning of the cooking process, it would have been all right?

Mrs. Clwyd: I thank my hon. Friend for that information. If a cockroach is well cooked, that will not make it more palatable to patients nor to anyone else. The fact that cockroaches might be in our food without our knowledge would cause most of us great concern and considerable revulsion.

Three organisations have recently produced reports on this issue. The report of the British Pest Control Association, entitled "Hospitals Can Damage Your Health", contains details of the sort of pests which can cause problems and gives many specific examples of failings as well as making several good recommendations. The association recommends that Crown immunity should be lifted or abolished, which would ensure that hospitals are legally obliged to implement the requirements of environmental health officers. It makes many other recommendations.

The General, Municipal, Boilermakers and Allied Trades Union published the case against Crown immunity in April 1985. Much of that publication was concerned with hospital kitchens, and it contained many proposals for action. It suggested that Crown immunity should be removed from the premises covered by the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974. I am sure that all hon. Members would like to see that happen here. The GMBATU paper said that Crown immunity should be removed from the food hygiene regulations and that food hygiene laws should be amended to include the recommendations presented by the Institution of Environmental Officers in a review of food legislation. It said that EHOs should be given the power to issue enforcement notices under food hygiene legislation — a power which they already have under the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act. It recommends that food hygiene laws should be amended so that employees' representatives receive the same information from enforcement officers as they do under section 28 of the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act.

The Government have always expected health authorities to provide resources for health and safety and hygiene improvements from their existing budgets for patient care. When there are such great demands upon their budgets it is not surprising that they have difficulty in finding the necessary resources. No extra resources have been provided by the Government to help the NHS to meet its new obligations under the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act. The Government must make sufficient resources available to enable the NHS to meet the new burdens imposed upon it by that Act and the food hygiene laws.

I ask the Minister to bear in mind that in 1978 the Health and Safety Commission gave inspectors the power to issue a new form of notice against Crown immunity. Those Crown notices, as they are called, are much the same as the improved prohibition notices, except that they have no force in law. In practice, health authorities ignore the notices because they have no force in law. Their stock answer, when they have failed to comply with the law, is lack of funds. The Health and Safety Executive, and its inspectorate, cannot possibly meet burdens placed upon it without an increase in staff.

We rehearsed this argument during the debate on the privatisation of British Gas when we discussed the burdens that were to be put on the inspectorate. The number of health and safety inspectors has diminished every year since the Government came to office, at both head office executive level and field work level. Does the Minister consider it feasible for the present number of inspectors to carry out the duties that he expects them to undertake? I shall be interested to hear his answer.

Mrs. Anna McCurley (Renfrew, West and Inverclyde): The hon. Lady is condemning hospitals universally, but the majority of hospitals have been responsible. They have employed proper pest control associations, and their standard of cleanliness has been acceptable. Does she accept that additional resources are not necessarily required, given the infernal sloppiness of some hospital staff?

Mrs. Clwyd: If the hon. Lady is addressing that remark to some of the privatised services working within our hospitals, I am sure that she and I would not disagree. I would not say that her comment applies to NHS staff, who, with few resources, have been able to carry out a proper programme of hygiene within hospitals over the years. I think that the hon. Lady is condemning privatisation within the Health Service. A number of contractors have been dismissed because of their failure to observe proper hygiene standards and to carry out the high standard of work that the Health Service has normally been able to perform.

Mr. Dobson: Does my hon. Friend agree that rather more private contractors would have been dismissed had not the Government intervened to say that, even where the health authority was entirely dissatisfied with the standard of service, the contract could not be terminated without prior discussion and the consent of Ministers, partly as result of representations made by Tory Members who had a financial interest in the companies under threat?

Mrs. Clwyd: That is an extremely relevant intervention. Where private interests are concerned, it seems that the same standards do not apply.

Mrs. McCurley: That is pathetic.

Mrs. Clwyd: The British Pest Control Association, which has called for the abolition of Crown immunity, which prevents hospitals and other public buildings from being prosecuted, is not exaggerating when it talks about cockroaches, rats, mice and other disease-carrying pests taking over hospitals and putting patients' health and lives at risk.

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): The hon. Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde (Mrs. McCurley) described some of the arguments of my hon. Friend the Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) as pathetic. Does my hon. Friend agree that the primary duty of private contractors, as they see it, is to make profits for their shareholders and not to uphold standards of care or cleanliness within the Health Service?

Mrs. McCurley: They will not make profits if they do not do their job properly.

Dr. Marek: I am grateful for the interjection. There is enormous discontent with private contractors in the Health Service. Does my hon. Friend agree that profits is one of the important differences between the attitudes of private contractors in the Health Service and those of NHS staff who look after the health and welfare of patients?

Mrs. Clwyd: That point is well made by my hon. Friend. If we are being entirely objective, which the Opposition are seeking to be, it is clear that standards of hygiene and patient care have been severely diminished since 1979.

The British Pest Control Association believes that part of the problem lies with priorities. Only one fifth of 1 per cent. of funds, or about £800,000, is spent on pest control. If the Government are serious about wanting to get rid of pests, they must give additional resources to the NHS to enable it to do the job properly.

The British Pest Control Association, in its report, asks:

"Would anyone with any sense serve a sick patient food that has already been contammated with organisms that cause food poisoning, boils, abscesses, typhoid, pneumonia, dysentery, worms or jaundice?

Would that sensible person bandage a wound with material exposed to contamination from the contents of drains, sinks and sewers? Sensible or not, this is what is happening in hospitals up and down the country."

The association also drew attention to a survey of 360 nurses conducted by Nursing Mirror last year,

"which showed that 88 per cent. had seen cockroaches in their hospitals, 53 per cent. had seen rats or dead mice, and 51 per cent. considered their hospital unclean."

That is the evidence of people working in those hospitals. It is clear that hundreds of NHS hospitals fail to meet accepted hygiene standards, and pose serious hazards to patients and staff.

The Institution of Environmental Health Officers, in a recent report, found 97 hospitals with hygiene standards "sufficiently serious to warrant prosecution" and 159 hospitals with "significant pest infestations."

The Minister thinks that the pests are confined to the kitchens. I should be interested to know about his own experience of kitchens, particularly hospital kitchens. Pictures of a hospital for the mentally ill, where cockroaches scuttle around the kitchen, shocked a conference of English and Welsh health authorities in Cardiff last year. Mr. John Yates, a senior research associate at the university of Birmingham, told the health officials about a hospital, the identity of which he refused to disclose, but which he described as having dripping, dirty and dark corridors

"because the authority prefers to save money to spend on patient care".

That reinforces the point that I and my hon. Friends have been making, that, if hospitals have to decide on priorities, obviously patient care must come first. Mr. Yates said that the rooms in the hospital

"were empty of moveable objects, and the lavatories had no paper . . . the rooms were unnecessarily depressing and dark and the lavatories were damp.

Beds in the wards were only inches apart. A long crack over a window in a day room was stuffed with lavatory paper to keep out water.

Worst of all were the cockroaches, a dozen of which had been photographed swarming on tables, around the sink and on the floor".

Mr. Yates said:

"These pictures were taken not 20 years ago but just this month."

He argued that the "'horror stories' about mental hospitals . . . were not isolated instances but signs of a system of management and monitoring that did not work."

Again, that is evidence that pests are not confined to the kitchens, and that the danger to patients cannot be kept within the kitchens. Lifting Crown immunity there will not be sufficient to protect the patients.

The other day I made a point about air conditioning systems, which the Minister missed. Many diseases can be caught from those systems — not just legionnaire's disease, but humidifier fever. Many doctors now recognise that it has a considerable effect on people's health. Other diseases are also caused by air conditioning systems. I asked the Minister to widen the scope of any inquiry to the operation of air conditioning systems in hospitals and other public buildings. In buildings where there is Crown immunity, it is particularly important that proper inspection of those systems is carried out.

[Mrs. Clwyd]

I shall mention an experience that I had in the European Parliament. One in three people were sick during the week when we met in Strasbourg. A team of doctors had come over from Britain to look at the air conditioning systems. Unfortunately, the authorities in Strasbourg thought that it was a plot to get the Parliament moved from France to Belgium, and refused to allow the doctors through the front door. It was only when I got them in through the back door that they were allowed to look at the systems.

The doctors found that there were seven different air conditioning and cooling systems within that one building, and bacteria were contaminating many of the tanks that were pumping water into the air conditioning system. Rat poison pellets were found in ducts all round the building, and those ducts were pumping the air conditioning through the building. It is not surprising that one in three people were sick during our visit to Strasbourg.

The point that I am trying to underline is the necessity for proper investigation of air conditioning equipment used in hospitals and other buildings, which are now protected by Crown immunity. Such equipment can also cause ill health. For that and many other reasons, Crown immunity should be lifted so that the Health and Safety Executive can do its work properly and so that control is applied in areas that were previously protected by Crown immunity. It is not only in the catering areas of hospitals that accidents can occur or where epidemics start.

Anyone who has done the rounds of hospitals, as I have over the years, could provide many examples of disregard for the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974. That is seen in laboratory conditions, the storage of materials, the collection and disposal of rubbish, fire hazards and ventilation. While those breaches can be pointed out to Health and Safety Executive inspectors, there is still no compulsion upon health authorities to rectify the conditions. The best compulsion of all would be for Crown immunity to be completely lifted. I am sure that is what all Opposition Members will be arguing for today.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Cromarty and Skye): Time is getting on, and, if I may say so in the context of this debate, most of the arguments have been made ad nauseam. [Laughter.] I am glad that the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson), who is almost my hon. Friend, has got the joke.

I repeat the support that I gave on Second Reading and in Committee for the extension of the abolition of Crown immunity beyond what is proposed in the Bill. I pick up the point argued by the hon. Member for Fife, Central (Mr. Hamilton), that one of the reasons why the Government have gone for a Bill of more limited application, and therefore, by implication, more limited objectives, is financial. It goes back to many of the debates that we had on the matter in Committee. In the explanatory and financial memorandum to the Bill the Government stress that it does not have financial implications. Many Opposition Members have said that that strikes us as nonsense. I suspect that, although they have not said so, many Conservative Members would agree with that.

It stands to reason that if there are substandard kitchen premises in hospitals, and if health authorities have to commit expenditure to bring them up to standard, that will have revenue implications. Given the extent of the problem nationally it must exist to a considerable extent or we would not have the legislation one can only assume, logically, that the Government realise that, on a national basis, there will be significant financial implications for health authorities from the measure. Despite the fact that the Government argue in the explanatory and financial memorandum to the Bill and in their speeches in support of the Bill that there are no financial implications, the appreciation of the likely financial implications although the Government do not publicly admit to them is one reason why they have confined the impact of the legislation to hospital kitchens.

When one considers the background to the Bill, especially the report on the food poisoning outbreak at Stanley Royd hospital, it is fair to say, as the report did, that the absence of Crown immunity would not have prevented the disaster. That is sensible and self-evident. Paragraph 230 of the report states:

"Basing our view on the facts proved before our Inquiry, and on these alone, the abolition of Crown immunity would appear unnecessary."

The implication is clear: the general application the report was talking about wider abolition than that which the Government propose of such legislation would not have prevented what happened at the Stanley Royd hospital. However, the incident was the straw that broke the camel's back and moved the Government to introduce the legislation.

After considering that specific case, and the undoubtedly important report, Health Ministers concluded that it would be enough to abolish immunity for hospital kitchens. They are mistaken in that. I cannot understand, for the host of reasons that we have heard during the debate, how the arguments that are advanced in favour of the limited abolition do not logically and forcefully apply equally to NHS premises in general. Neither on Second Reading nor in Committee did the Government give an adequate response to that basic contention.

In reply to the Second Reading debate the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security said that the general repeal of Crown immunity was not necessary because the Crown notice system already works well enough. He conceded that,

"although 300 notices have been issued since 1980, in no case was it found necessary to take action." —[Official Report, 15 April 1986; Vol. 95, c. 826.]

I do not doubt the veracity of the Minister's statement, but if the Government were sufficiently persuaded to introduce this albeit limited measure, which must be an expression of their anxiety on the nationwide problem, how can they set that judgment alongside the arguments deployed by the Under-Secretary of State, who was saying essentially, "There is no problem whatsoever"? That is an argument based on internal asburdity——

Mr. Ashley: It is a contradiction.

Mr. Kennedy: I agree with the right hon. Gentleman. It is a fundamental contradiction in terms. The Government have not adequately defended or persuaded the House of their argument.

Even allowing for that, there are difficulties with the Crown notice system in which the Under-Secretary of State placed so much faith. There are delays in implementing some Crown notices because there is no automatic offence for failing to meet the deadline set. Under the Government, the number of Health and Safety Executive inspectors has been cut by 20 per cent. Much of their time is taken up by return visits to Crown premises to persuade employees to comply with their notices. Deadlines are sometimes renegotiated on non-Crown premises, but that is comparatively rare.

The inspectors have less incentive to use Crown notices when there is no prosecution. In 1983, about 13 per cent as many notices were served per 100,000 people at risk in the manufacturing and service industries as were served in NHS premises. Yet, as was fully and fairly stated by the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras, one cannot say that the risk element or dangers in hospital premises can be reduced or overlooked to the same extent as they could be in some service industries. Hospitals are inherently dangerous places, for the many reasons given by the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Ken Weetch (Ipswich): The hon. Gentleman mentioned the word "prosecution". Does he realise that, although a considerable number of appalling facts were discovered during the inquiry at Stanley Royd hospital, it was subsequently revealed that there was not enough evidence to mount a legal prosecution? Has the hon. Gentleman considered what burden of proof might be necessary to find a way through this?

Mr. Kennedy: If an incident involving so many tragic deaths does not constitute a sufficient basis for a successful prosecution, something is wrong. I am glad to welcome the hon. Gentleman's intervention, which hit the nail on the head.

The Government argue that the Bill will have no financial implications, whereas we argue that even on this limited basis it will. Time will soon tell whose assessment is correct. Having argued that it will have no financial implications, the Government none the less stop short — I suspect largely for financial reasons — of extending the logic of their case beyond the hospital kitchen door to NHS premises generally. That suggests an acceptance, albeit privately, by Ministers and civil servants that the rhetoric on the Bill is not a fair reflection of the reality with which the Bill deals.

Ministers have argued that the Crown notice system is satisfactory. The Under-Secretary of State laid special emphasis on that, yet there is a fundamental internal inconsistency in presenting that argument at the same time as the Government present the Bill. If they believe that the system is so good, why do they not stand by it? Why is it necessary to legislate?

The hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Weetch) mentioned the appalling state of affairs highlighted by the report on the tragedy at Stanley Royd hospital. In part, the report mitigates in favour of the Government's argument, which is that legislation does not attack the root of the problem but rather allows some form of redress if the problem proves tragic. The central weakness of the Government's case is that they deny the existence of financial implications, although the Bill must have some. The Bill is also weaker because it stops short of more general application.

We have welcomed the Government's fairly timid steps, but they do not go far enough. I hope that it is not too late for the Minister to see sense, to be slightly more candid and to accept that the principle of clause 1 should extend beyond NHS kitchens.

5.30 pm

Mr. Frank Haynes (Ashfield): First, I declare my interest as a vice-president of the Institution of Environmental Health Officers. It is proper to declare that interest because of my interest in their work. I was involved in local government for many years before coming here and it is clear to me that environmental health officers in all local authority areas have done a first-class job on behalf of the community.

My hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) made a first-class speech and mentioned slack control in the NHS. The service seems to have a protective shell. Through our proposed new clauses, we are trying to crack that shell so that the community can find out what is going on inside. I have heard Ministers defend the NHS and Crown immunity, saying that there is no need for its abolition, for long enough. There is great public feeling about the problems with hospital kitchens. I pay tribute to my right hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley) who has done a marvellous job for many years. He is one of those who have finally got the Government to cave in and abolish Crown immunity for NHS kitchens. There is no doubt that that is a step in the right direction.

I have listened carefully to the debate, especially to what my hon. Friend for Holborn and St. Pancras said. He mentioned cleaning services. I also listened carefully to the intervention made by the hon. Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde (Mrs. McCurley). She should not have said what she did. She should have stayed in her seat. She boobed. There is no doubt about it. She talked of private organisations doing certain jobs in the NHS. Private firms are falling down on the job. It is all very well to say that they will not get paid if they do not do the job, but they are not doing the job properly in many respects, yet they are still being paid for what they were supposed to do and paying their workers little. One of the most annoying things about such private organisations, especially those involved in hospital cleaning, is that many Conservative Members are their directors or are associated with them. They should declare their interest.

Mrs. McCurley: The hon. Gentleman is suggesting that all private enterprise is in some way malevolent and inefficient. The majority of health boards employ responsible and effective companies. If I failed to clean my kitchen properly for several weeks, would I expect it to remain hygienic for my family or would I expect mice to start coming in? May I suggest that the matter is not confined to cleaning services and that it matters very much how hospital staff conduct their daily business. Filth occurs when people do not do their work efficiently and properly.

Mr. Haynes: That was a fairly long intervention. The understanding in this place is that interventions are short. I must repeat that my experience is that many private organisations in the NHS have not lived up to their responsibilities but have, nevertheless, been paid for the job.

The hon. Lady mentioned her kitchen. We have a kitchen in our bungalow. It is spotlessly clean. I do not pay my wife for doing it. We share what we have. She does a first-class job on my behalf and that of the family. In many hospitals, however, the kitchens are filthy. It is high time that there was some action. The Minister can sit and nod his head and grin every now and again, but he is still not listening. He is supposed to be replying to the debate, but if he does not listen how can he?

I should like to pick up something that my hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras said about the Minister. I should like to know what he knows about the NHS. I have a reason for asking. He is a financial wizard.

Mr. Weetch: Oh? That is news to me.

Mr. Haynes: Oh, yes. He is a financial wizard. He was with the Treasury long enough. I tabled a question to the Minister because I wanted to know how many chairmen of district health authorities had no connection with the Health Service. It emerged that, out of 195 chairmen, 41 had no connection with the NHS. That is how the service is being run—on a financial basis. The Government are not running a service for the people who need what my hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras described.

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda): When my hon. Friend next tables that question, will he consider asking the Minister how many friends of Tory Ministers, how many solicitors and professional people employed by Tory Ministers and how many people connected with the Conservative party have been appointed as chairmen of health authorities? [HON. MEMBERS: "How many ex-Labour Members?"]

Mr. Haynes: Can you hear them, Mr. Deputy Speaker? My hon. Friend has hit on a raw spot and Tory Members are reacting. Most of them are financial wizards from the finance houses and institutions of this land. They can be counted when the House is full. During these debates I have often looked at the Treasury Bench and seen as many as five millionaires on it. All they are bothered about is money. We in the Labour party are concerned with the service of the NHS to our people.

Dame Jill Knight (Birmingham, Edgbaston): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Haynes: No, the hon. Lady has only just walked into the Chamber. The hon. Lady can make a speech if she wants to, Mr. Deputy Speaker, providing you let her. That is how this place works. I am trying to make an important point about the way in which the Government run the NHS: their motive is profit.

Dame Jill Knight rose

Mr. Haynes: Because they run it on the profit motive, they want to protect Crown immunity. That is why we have tabled these new clauses.

Dame Jill Knight: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. I remind the hon. Lady that if the hon. Gentleman is not prepared to give way she should not persist.

Mr. Haynes: I am obliged to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I always knew that the Chair would protect an hon. Member, and this is genuine protection. As I said earlier, the hon. Lady has only just walked into the Chamber and she does not know what has been said. I suggest that she hangs on a while and listens to some real debate. Only the Opposition are providing that. I wonder what is going on on the Tory Benches. Are they interested in the NHS? [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] Will they listen to the Minister's reply to the debate without hearing it? When it comes to the vote Tory Members will troop through the Tory Lobby without having heard a word.

Dame Jill Knight rose

Mr. Haynes: To give the Minister and the Whip their due, at least they are present and have heard the debate.

Dame Jill Knight rose

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. If the hon. Lady wishes to participate she should seek to catch my eye. If the hon. Gentleman will not give way to her, she must not persist.

Mr. Haynes: It is a bit off. The hon. Lady has been a Member of Parliament for many years and she knows the rules of the House as I do, although I have not been an hon. Member for so long as she has. I respect the Chair and live up to the rules and regulations of the House.

In my visits to different hospitals throughout the country I have found that mentally handicapped people are treated differently from everybody else, and I wonder why. I have seen wards where the beds have been so close together that there is no room for a locker between them, and wards with beds placed before fire doors, so that in an emergency people cannot get out. If anything happens involving a serious loss of life the NHS and Ministers are within the protective shell to which I was referring. That is not good enough. In such an event they should be prosecuted. They should be taken to court and dealt with. Mentally handicapped individuals cannot possibly look after themselves.

What power does a district fire officer have? In my area he must refer to one of the 41 recently appointed district health authority chairmen, who has a financial interest. The fire officer is reponsible to the chairman or the board, and they take no notice of him, so nothing is done. The shouting and bawling of local people making representations has persuaded health authorities to make alterations, and, indeed, they have. Nothing will be done with this profit motive business and the Government trying to save money here and there. We need much more money in the NHS. People are living longer nowadays and we must provide proper facilities for them. It is shocking that my local authority has not been allowed to build proper housing for elderly people.

There are chiropodists in the NHS, but not enough of them because the Government have cut the funds for them. That means that, because elderly people cannot get the service of a chiropodist, they cannot be discharged and must lie in a hospital bed. I have seen many such cases, and before long the old person dies. The Government should be prosecuted for what they are doing. We have tabled these new clauses to get some sense into the NHS and into the heads of the Secretary of State and his cronies who sit with him. I am talking about not civil servants, but Ministers.

Dame Jill Knight: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I have been listening most carefully to the hon. Gentleman and I wonder whether chiropody has anything to do with the new clause before the House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I too have been listening carefully, and so far I have not heard anything that is out of order.

Mr. Haynes: I am obliged to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Here we go again, with the hon. Lady abusing the Chair. I would never do that. I have had nothing to do with chiropody, and I declared my interest at the beginning of my speech. My connection is with the Institution of Environmental Health Officers which, together with my experience as an ex-chairman of a community health council, is why I have so much experience of the NHS. I know the hon. Lady's connections with the NHS, but I shall not say anything about them. I shall leave that to her.

My hon. Friend the Member for Fife, Central (Mr. Hamilton) made an important point about the appointment of the new chairmen, and my chairman in central Nottinghamshire has no experience of the NHS. I understand my hon. Friend's interest in this area, and in the question of the rent that nurses must pay for their accommodation. We are on a winner with these new clauses. The Government are bumping up nurses' rents because their tiny financial minds tell them that this is another area where they can pull in a bob or two. That is how they think. They do not realise that those nurses are providing a service to the ill. People are in hospital because they are ill and hope to get better, so that they can leave and live healthy lives. The Government are clobbering the people who do a first-class job in the hospital service on behalf of the community, but they continue to make statements on the radio and television as though they were doing a marvellous job. Some of the Ministers should look behind the scenes.

Mrs. McCurley: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Would you try to encourage the hon. Member to refer to new clause 1, because what he is talking about is totally off beam?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. With new clause 1 we are debating new clauses 2, 3 and 5 and amendment No. 62. The hon. Gentleman's latter remarks were addressed to new clause 5 and so seem to me to be in order.

Mr. Haynes: I am obliged to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The hon. Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde (Mrs. McCurley) came in late and did not hear the speeches from the Front Bench. My hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras made all the necessary references to the clauses. It seems that one or two hon. Members are bidding for your Chair, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am having nothing to do with that. They are trying to do your job for you and I object. That is what you are there for, Mr. Deputy Speaker. As I said before——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I can get by very well without the protection and help of the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Haynes: I realise that only too well because I remember the wonderful, exhilarating experience that I had sitting on the Back Benches when you were at the Dispatch Box. I thought it was wonderful, but we lost you because you were appointed to that Chair, when you should have stayed on the Front Bench. I have got that off my chest. No matter where you are, whether at the Dispatch Box or in the Chair, you do a first-class job. There is no doubt that I have been within the rules of order because otherwise you would have pulled me up pretty smartly, because you are pretty keen in your job.

I have said enough. I do not know how long I have been speaking, but I know that there will be other opportunities to speak during the debate. We hope that the Minister is taking in all that we have said. We want the abolition of Crown immunity for the NHS. We want nurses to be looked after properly. We do not want them penalised, because they do a wonderful job on behalf of the community. If the Minister and the Government would accept many of the things that we have said this afternoon, the NHS would run a lot better.

Mr. Rogers: I am pleased to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Ashfield (Mr. Haynes) in his exposition, and to join in his tributes to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I hope that during the course of my speech we shall not get interruptions telling you how to do your job.

The new clause is of great importance to those Labour Members who have a special interest in the NHS. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Ashfield that it is only Labour Members who take a particular interest in the NHS. It seems that Conservative Members are interested in the NHS only when they want to borrow its equipment for use in private practice. The Labour party has a strong vested interest in the NHS because not only do we have a political and social commitment to it, but we participate in it. These are the only hospitals that our children will use. [Interruption.] Does the hon. Member for Aberdeen, South (Mr. Malone) wish to intervene? It is sad that he could but dare not. I realise that the Conservative party is effectively gagged.

Dame Jill Knight: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way. He has always been courteous. Perhaps it is rather a good idea that the private sector occasionally deals with the Health Service in order to provide equipment such as the lithotriptor, which helps to get rid of kidney stone conditions, at St. Thomas's. About 75 per cent. of its use will be for NHS patients. Can this not sometimes be a useful partnership and so help the NHS?

Mr. Rogers: Yes, but——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I hope that the hon. Gentleman is not persuaded to go down that road, because that will take us away from the new clauses.

Mr. Rogers: I agree with you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. If the hon. Lady wishes to lead us down that road, I shall resist the temptation, except to say one thing. I understand that, under the arrangement to which she referred, private medicine makes a profit out of the lending of the machines. I do not blame it for doing this, because that is what it is in action for. The private sector is not hypocritical about it. It is like the Government, who are taking the country for a ride. However, that is what they are there for. They are there to serve their friends the City of London, for the quick buck, to make a couple of bob and shove everything into their back pockets. That is what the Tory party is about. It is not about serving the interests of the people and those who might need this precious institution, the National Health Service. This is why they have such a cynical attitude to the NHS. They will borrow from the NHS when they need to, but when they need to cheat and to jump to the front of the queue, and when they have special treatment——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is falling into the fault against which I warned him. I hope that we can return to the subject of the new clauses.

Mr. Rogers: I shall do so, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am sure that the hon. Member for Birmingham, Edgbaston

[Mr. Rogers]

(Dame J. Knight) will want to intervene again, and if she does I hope that she will not lead me down these side alleys because if I follow her I shall be admonished by you again, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

We are concerned about Crown immunity for hospitals and health authorities because of the appalling conditions that exist in some of our hospitals as a result of cuts in the service, which means that there is not enough money for proper cleaning and maintenance.

I have come to the Chamber from the Public Accounts Committee where we were hearing evidence from the permanent secretary at the Department of the Environment on capital expenditure of local authorities. One fact struck me strongly and is pertinent to the debate. It is that it has been estimated by reliable authorities, and acknowledged as a correct figure by the Department of the Environment, that to enable local authorities to catch up with maintenance and refurbishing, on which they have fallen behind with schools, housing and roads, they would need capital expenditure of £40 billion to £50 billion.

Mr. James Couchman (Gillingham): Rubbish.

Mr. Rogers: The hon. Gentleman says, "Rubbish." If he wants to dispute my figures, perhaps he will correct me. He does not wish to. My figures are correct and will be written into the evidence of the Public Accounts Committee, and they have been published in the Comptroller and Auditor General's report. If the hon. Gentleman is saying that the Comptroller and Auditor General is an idiot and does not know what he is doing, perhaps he will be proved badly wrong. What he has said shows his ignorance of what goes on in local authorities. I am glad that we have been able to put his ignorance on the record.

This problem affects the NHS as well because of the tremendous cuts in spending in this sector. Health authorities, even when run by Tory friends of Ministers, are suffering badly because they do not have enough money to refurbish hospitals to bring them up to standard. That is why the British Pest Control Association said on 11 September last year that cockroaches, rats, mice and other disease-carrying pests were "taking over" hospitals and putting patients' health and lives at risk.

Mrs. McCurley: Is there anything in that report that criticises the Government? If the hon. Gentleman looks at the report more closely he will find no condemnation of the Government, but some condemnation of health authorities which spend more on window cleaning than on hospital kitchen cleaning.

Mr. Rogers: The hon. Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde (Mrs. McCurley) probably has more knowledge of window-dressing authorities than I have. They probably exist in the Conservative areas, one of which she represents.

The British Pest Control Association, in its book "Hospitals Can Damage Your Health", also calls for the abolition of which prevents hospitals and other Government-owned buildings from being prosecuted. The report has already been sent to the Secretary of State for Social Services.

"the anomaly of Crown Immunity"

Dr. Marek: This is an important matter in relation to the new clauses. I do not agree that we are talking about only a few authorities here and there. The problem is serious throughout the country and it is caused by lack of funds. Health authorities are so pressed and so much under pressure that pests and cockroaches exist in hospitals. There are countless examples throughout the country.

Mr. Rogers: I thank my hon. Friend. The British Pest Control Association can hardly be called a raving Left-wing group. It has fairly strong connections with the Conservative party. The association says in its damning document:

"It is a story of indifference and of apathy bordering on incompetence in the NHS."

As the hon. Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde said, the problem is not only one of money, but of priorities. Often the problem is created because of the need to choose between refurbishing and providing front-line services for patients. The choice is often between life and death and refurbishing the kitchen.

Because of the scandalous way in which the Government have handled the nurses' pay award, money has been taken away from the front-line services to fund that award. The Government have handled the problem shabbily in the last two years. The way in which Ministers have obfuscated and misled the House on the issue is a public scandal. The pay award might amount to £150 million or £300 million

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is straying again. Will he please get back to the new clauses?

Mr. Rogers: I accept your admonition, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but the real problems in the National Health Service are concerned with priorities and lack of money. We talk about the appalling conditions which lead to our plea for a lifting of Crown immunity from hospitals and health authorities because conditions are such that health authorities have to choose between operating on acutely ill people and refurbishing a kitchen.

Mr. Albert McQuarrie (Banff and Buchan): One of the biggest problems is that health authorities have built huge administration towers. If we cut those and put more money into patient care there might be fewer problems in the hospitals.

Mr. Rogers: That might be right. I am not here to defend bureaucracy. The bureaucrats are the Conservatives' friends. What amazes me about the Government and Conservative Members is that they have been in government for seven years. Any blame for problems in the National Health Service must lie in their laps. Why have they not done something about them?

Mr. John Maxton (Glasgow, Cathcart): Does my hon. Friend agree that the Government are responsible for the grossly overpaid general managers——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We cannot have a general debate about the National Health Service. I hope that we can now return to the new clauses.

Mr. Rogers: You are right, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am being constantly led astray from the general thrust of my argument.

I have already mentioned the British Pest Control Association and its remarks about the standard of hygiene in hospitals. I said that it could not be regarded as a raving

Left-wing organisation. Another organisation which cannot be said to be hand-in-glove with the Labour party is the Institution of Environmental Health Officers, which states that hundreds of National Health Service hospitals fail to meet accepted hygiene standards and pose serious hazards to patients and staff. It says that almost 100 hospitals would face prosecution or be closed if they were not protected by Crown immunity. That institution has a statutory function to safeguard standards in all aspects of life except in connection with institutions controlled by the Government. The Government hide behind Crown immunity in the face of such damning indictments.

The National Association of Health Authorities and the Royal College of Nursing, which is not what I would call a raving Left-wing, loony organisation, criticise declining standards of hygiene in the National Health Service. The campaign gathered a great deal of support as a result of the outbreak of food poisoning that led to the death of 19 patients at the Stanley Royd hospital in Wakefield during the summer of 1984.

I must tell the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. McQuarrie) that that was five years into this Government's administration. In those five long years they could have done something, but instead they spent millions of pounds on a foolish escapade in the south Atlantic and refused to spend money on giving our hospitals decent standards. I sometimes think it is a pity that General Galtieri did not raid the south Wales valleys, because had he done so we might have received some money. However, for that we would have to get him out of the nick first. It would perhaps not be such a bad idea if he were resurrected, because we desperately need the money.

In my area, not only are hospital standards declining, but the number of hospitals is being reduced. Therefore, my area is doubly penalised. Reports that had been published showed that the standards were exceptionally high in hospitals in my area, but now those hospitals are being closed, which is a great tragedy for the people they serve and for those who work in those marvellous facilities that serve the community at large.

The Institution of Environmental Health Officers said recently that 97 hospitals had hygiene standards that were sufficiently serious to warrant prosecution. Reinforcing the report of the British Pest Control Association, it said that 159 hospitals had significant pest infestations.

Mrs. McCurley: Does the hon. Gentleman condemn those examples that we saw on television recently — I believe on "World in Action" — where staff at a hospital in Glasgow put together cooked meats and raw, dripping meat, uncovered, in the same refrigerator? That has nothing to do with the private sector and pest control associations. It has an awful lot to do with environmental health and the day-to-day standards of activity and work in hospitals.

Mr. Rogers: The hon. Lady is right. I am glad that she supports my argument. If there is no money available for staff training, one cannot expect high standards of hygiene in the kitchen.

Mrs. McCurley: It is basic common sense.

Mr. Rogers: It is not a matter of basic common sense. Very often, no other facilities are available. I do not condone the rather silly happening to which the hon. Lady referred.

Mr. Dobson: While on the subject of common sense, does my hon. Friend agree that the average spent on a long stay hospital is £40 per patient per day and that as only £25 per patient per day was being spent at Stanley Royd there might be some connection between the figures?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The House is debating whether the Health Service should continue to enjoy immunity from legal proceedings stemming from various enactments. I hope that the House will stick to that.

Mr. Rogers: I am trying desperately to do so.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member might try a little harder.

Mr. Rogers: I shall indeed. If Crown immunity were abolished, probably half the people involved in controlling it would be put in the nick. The Department of Health has a cynical attitude to those most alarming reports that have been published, such as that by the British Pest Control Association and the Institution of Environmental Health Officers. In response, the Department of Health said:

"We have not yet seen the environmental health officers' report but we will be looking at it very closely."

Only the Department had not seen the report. At that time, the British Pest Control Association's report had been out for three weeks and the Department of Health, the authority responsible, had not seen it.

"After the last such report, about eight years ago, we recommended to all health authorities, whose responsibility it is, that free access should be given to these officers, and that note should be taken of their recommendations."

With all the notes and all the access in the world, there has been no action that is required by way of investment in the service.

When we talk about Crown immunity and the scrutiny of hospital hygiene, we should perhaps consider what Peter Hartley, the chairman of the environment committee of Westminster city council, said. The city council is controlled by the Conservative party. In a letter to The Times dated 24 September last year Mr. Hartley said:

"hygienic practices in Government premises — particularly in DHSS hospitals — are all too often below standard."

Significantly, the letter did not mention private hospitals. I do not know whether Mr. Hartley is interested in those, but he is an expert on DHSS hospitals. He continued:

"These hospitals are, of course, through the active encouragement of the DHSS, subject to monitoring checks by local authority environmental health officers and the conditions there are open to inspection. Other Crown properties are not open to such council inspection and one may be forgiven for wondering what the overall situation really is".

Mr. Hartley complained at length especially about the present law regarding Crown immunity. In the last paragraph he said:

"In the wake of recent disclosures in other Crown premises a positive response from Government is called for."

6.15 pm

I wonder what the Government have to hide by not being prepared to lift Crown immunity regarding hospitals. On 22 June last year the English and Welsh health authorities met in Cardiff. They were told by Mr. John Yates, a research associate at the university of Birmingham, that at some institutions for the mentally ill cockroaches scuttle around the kitchens and patients beds are inches apart. He said that the conditions were absolutely appalling. He referred to a hospital that had dripping, dirty and dark corridors

" because the authority prefers to save money to spend on patient care"

I think that his conclusion is wrong, because local authorities in my area do not have money to spend on patient care. I think that his conclusion is wrong, because local authorities in my area do not have money to spend on patient care. The Mid-Glamorgan health authority was told recently that it must give back £5·5 million to the Welsh Office, at a time when one of the most deprived areas of Europe is desperately short of hospital beds and hospital facilities.

Dr. Marek: My hon. Friend has made a pertinent point. The Government, in the Bill, are making sure that hospitals come under the food Acts, but only the kitchens of hospitals where food is prepared. If my memory serves me correctly — we have it only on the Minister's say so — food will be protected under the food Acts as it goes on its way from the kitchens to the patients. My hon. Friend made a point about corridors and inadequacies in other parts of hospitals, besides kitchens. The Government are not doing anything about that. They ought to be invited to do so, unless they see sense at the last moment and accept the new clauses.

Mr. Rogers: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. I do not understand why the Government do not agree to the fairly moderate new clause. It is a simple extension of the principle which the Government have accepted. If the principle is good enough to apply to kitchens, it is good enough to apply beyond them, as we are trying to invoke in the new clause. My hon. Friend is absolutely right in saying that in the large institutions — some of our mental hospitals are large institutions — the time between the preparation of food and when it is given to the patients can be fairly long. The food may have travelled a significant distance from the kitchens before it is given to the patients in the wards.

Mr. Ray Powell (Ogmore): I ask my hon. Friend to refer to a hospital at east Glamorgan in his constituency. At that hospital, the repairs to the underground passage have been completed but the services have not been finished. In areas where there is raw cement and works, food is transferred from one trolley to another before it is taken to patients' beds. I suggest that the Minister should consider hospitals with conditions that I have outlined in the constituency of east Glamorgan, for which the Mid-Glamorgan health authority is responsible.

Mr. Rogers: I am well aware of the conditions. Fortunately, I have used the hospital only once, but, in the past three years, my two daughters have had appendix operations there. The hospital has a marvellous record because of the experience, skill and dedication of the nursing and ancillary medical staff. It dedicates itself to a community which is one of the most deprived in Europe. It has to cope with relatively primitive conditions. There is not enough money to refurbish some parts of the building which perhaps should have been knocked down and rebuilt. Even the refurbishment, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell) referred, which is now taking place slowly, is not enough to bring the hospital up to the high standards set by those who work there.

These concerns are felt throughout the profession. It is not just a matter of the Opposition carping and political dogma. The new clause has been tabled because every section of the community, with the exception of the Government and the Conservative party, wants Crown immunity to be removed. In April the British Medical Association wrote to my right hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley) supporting his campaign for the substantial expansion of the Government's legislation to end Crown immunity in relation to hospital kitchens. The BMA wanted the legislation to be amended to cover all hospitals, clinics and health centres, and wanted the health and safety at work regulations to apply to all staff. That campaign has been carried on by the Labour Front Bench.

No doubt the Government will respond by saying that there will be severe public expenditure implications if Crown immunity is lifted, but I believe that the implications will not be severe. The Government will again hide behind the response that they make to all reasonable legitimate demands. The Government, having accepted the principle of Crown immunity, should accept its extension to places through which food is transferred. That is a reasonable request, and I do not understand why the Government do not accept the new clause.

Mr. Ray Powell: I know that you will bring me to order, Mr. Deputy speaker, if I stray from the new clause.

Reference has been made to the appointment of chairmen of area health authorities. I should like the Minister to give full details of the changes since the Conservative party took office seven years ago, because they concern these new clauses. I want him to refer to the attitude of some chairmen to administration and particularly to hygiene and the money spent on certain parts of the NHS. I am concerned especially with the hygiene regulations that should be followed in hospital kitchens.

At one time, the chairman of an area health authority in Wales, Mr. Ron Evans, was the agent of my right hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot). He was replaced by the solicitor and Conservative friend of the then Secretary of State for Wales. I know, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that you will bring me to order, but —

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member is right. He is anticipating my comments. He said at the outset that I would call him to order if he strayed from the subject. He is now doing so. I hope that he will return to the subject of Crown immunity.

Mr. Powell: I was merely prompting you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I knew that it would not be long before you prompted me. Appointments are important, because the attitudes of chairmen and members appointed to area health authorities affect how finances in the Health Service are directed.

Dr. Marek: Perhaps I am anticipating my hon. Friend's comments. He might be about to say that the excuse that is always given as to why hospitals have never been made subject to the provisions of the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act 1974 is that there are no lines of communication, line management, and so on, that consensus decisions are made and that no one is in charge. Now that we have general managers that reason can no longer be used by those who seek to prevent the lifting of Crown immunity in hospitals. Is that not an important argument in support of the relevant new clause?

Mr. Powell: It is relevant. My hon. Friend has rightly prompted me to suggest that we should consider lifting Crown immunity because of the declared interests of these managers.

Mr. Rogers: My hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell) has referred to the problem in relation to the appointment of the chairman of the Gwent health authority. Would not my hon. Friend be wise if he pointed out that the gentleman who was ultimately responsible for the services in the area had no previous experience of the Health Service, but was simply the solicitor friend of the then Secretary of State for Wales?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I hope that the hon. Member will not refer to such matters. They have nothing to do with the subject of the debate.

Mr. Powell: I respect your ruling, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I appreciate the point that my hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers) is probing. It is essential that the managers appointed to the new set-up of area health authorities should be experienced in the Health Service. That is as important as any of the measures discussed in Committee. If the managers are not experienced in the Health Service, the proposals in the new clauses will not be effectively carried out. I hope that the arguments during the past two and a half hours have convinced the Minister that he should accept the new clause.

My hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda referred at length to articles in the Nursing Mirror about cockroaches, bats, mice and other disease-carrying pests which are taking over hospitals and putting at risk the health and lives of patients. He referred specifically to the British Pest Control Association in a contribution that dealt entirely with the subject matter of the new clause — Crown immunity.

I served on the Mid-Glamorgan area health authority for some years before I became a Member of Parliament. I visited hospitals in Mid-Glamorgan and my job, as a member of one of the committees, was to inspect the kitchens. In addition, my son spent four years in and out of the East Glamorgan and Bridgend hospitals. That gave me a further opportunity to visit hospitals before 1979. Since 1979 I have visited constituents and relatives in the same hospitals. The conditions in those hospitals now are absolutely appalling because of the lack of finance to ensure that they are hygienic. The corridors and passageways are not kept as clean as they should be. The health standards that are required in restaurants, canteens and in the Palace of Westmister are far higher than those that are to be found in the National Health Service.

6.30 pm

Mr. McQuarrie: What did the Labour Government do about removing Crown immunity between 1974 and 1979? The hon. Gentleman referred to hospitals generally as being filled with cockroaches and vermin. That may apply to England and Wales, but it does not apply to Scotland. Nurses are trained not only in patient care but in hygiene. I saw a classic example of that only last weekend at the Royal Alexandra infirmary in Paisley. Ward 8 was spotless and the food that arrived from the kitchens was superb. [HON. MEMBERS: "It is a Labour area."] Yes, it is a Labour area.

Mr. Powell: The hon. Gentleman is fortunate to have those conditions in Scotland. He referred to the Labour Government. That was indeed the ideal period. During that time I served on the Mid-Glamorgan area health authority. The conditions about which the hon. Gentleman boasts in Scotland were conditions that my constituents and I enjoyed in Mid-Glamorgan, but we are not enjoying them now. During that period the Labour Government introduced many protective measures, including the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974. I should like those measures to apply to hospitals as they apply elsewhere. In this place we pass Acts of Parliament but they do not apply to us. Perhaps that is just as well, because I should not like the conditions that one finds in National Health Service kitchens to apply to the kitchens in the Palace of Westminster.

The Government say that they are spending more money on the National Health Service. I have been invited to the opening on Wednesday of a new hospital in Bridgend. We have fought for that hospital for 18 years. It will replace a number of hospitals in Ogmore and in Mid-Glamorgan. [HON. MEMBERS: "Who is opening it?"] The Princess of Wales, and it is to be called the Princess of Wales hospital. However, the new hospital is to replace some of the old hospitals. Many of the old cottage hospitals, which were built with the donations of pennies and threepences a week by the miners, are to be closed. Instead of better facilities, there will be even worse facilities. The small communities will no longer have their cottage hospitals.

I have been round the new hospital and I am not all that enamoured of it. Although some of the cottage hospitals were built a century ago, their hygiene standards are far better than those in the new Cardiff hospitals.

Mr. McQuarrie: That is exactly what I was trying to point out to the hon. Gentleman. The standards of hygiene in the older hospitals are far superior to those in the new hospitals. Nurses are trained to ensure that in listed buildings, which were built 100 years or more ago, high standards of nursing and hygiene are maintained.

Mr. Powell: Then why are the Government closing the old hospitals that we should like to retain? The new hospitals should be used to meet the demand for hospitalisation.

Mr. McQuarrie: As I said earlier, the construction and types of wards in listed hospital buildings are unsatisfactory for modern medical practice, but in rural areas in particular the smaller hospitals can be used for geriatric patients. I have many hospitals of this type in my constituency. Instead of being looked after in massive hospitals, patients are cared for in the very kind of hospitals to which the hon. Gentleman referred — nice little hospitals, where people can feel at home in the latter days of their lives. There is a very good case for retaining such hospitals in rural areas.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am afraid that once again we are wandering away from Crown immunity. May we return to the new clause?

Mr. Powell: I am sorry that you intervened, Mr. Deputy Speaker, because I was enjoying the hospitalisation Utopia for which I have been looking and which the hon. Gentleman was describing in Scotland. In Mid-Glamorgan, however, the Government are closing not only the old hospitals but the geriatric hospitals. In Mid-Glamorgan, 14 hospitals, including geriatric units, are being closed. They are old hospitals, but they provide better care for patients than some of the new hospitals.

The new clause ought to be accepted by the Government. It will protect those who have to go into hospital for treatment. It is frightening to read the reports to which my hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers) referred. When patients enter hospital they hope to be cured, but because disease-carrying vermin contaminate their food they leave hospital in a far worse condition than when they went in.

Mr. Rogers: My hon. Friend referred to my area, which is adjacent to his constituency, and to the problem we face over hospital closures. We feel passionately about this, because of what is happening at the Pentwyn cottage hospital at the top end of the Rhondda where my hon. Friend was born. It is vital that the new clause should be implemented to extend immunity to this hospital for the remaining period of its use. It is about to be closed. Very severely handicapped children and people with Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is stretching my patience and, no doubt, the patience of the House.

Mr. Powell: I will not wander down that road, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

My hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda spoke about an area that is dear to my heart—the Rhondda, where I was born and bred—and the hospital that he spoke about is on my doorstep. That hospital treated many miners when they were taken out of the colliery just half a mile away. Although the colliery no longer exists, many miners and miners' widows still live in the area and would enjoy the facility of such a hospital. I have spoken about Mid-Glamorgan because it has a lot to do with this new clause. A brand new hospital is being built, but it will not offer the same facilities as the old one. That new hospital is being built as a result of pressure in this House from 1979, so that the 700 people on the hospital waiting list in that area can be accommodated. We were promised a new hospital and no closures, but within seven years hospitals with high standards of hygiene and health care are being closed.

When people go into hospital for treatment of any sort, have they any claim against the authorities if they are infected by vermin or suffer from food poisoning? It has been suggested that boils, abscesses, typhoid, pneumonia, dysentery, worms or jaundice can be contracted by people in hospital as a result of inefficient management. Cockroaches and all sorts of vermin are sometimes found in the food that patients eat. How can a patient prove that that is because of neglect by the management?

Recently I was wheeled through one corridor after another in the Bridgend hospital, from one part of the hospital to another, to have an ear operation. I noticed that the walls were not being repaired, and cobwebs and cockroaches and other vermin could be seen in the corridors along which I was being wheeled. That was before I got into the operating theatre. The theatre is supposed to be kept in such a way that a patient cannot catch an infection or disease. I was just having an ear operation, but I could have been having my leg off.

After my operation I was wheeled back along the same dirty corridors with the paint peeling off the walls and half the floor coming up. In my room, as I was coming round, I saw six people in pinstripe suits standing at the foot of my bed. I thought they were Members of Parliament. I said, "What on earth are you doing here?" They told me that they had come to look at the room because they were in the process of offering a price. "A price for what?", I said. Unknown to me, because on that day I did not have the Western Mail, there was a front-page article which said that Bridgend cottage hospital was up for sale, was open to offers and could be inspected almost immediately. I understand it has now been sold. There I was in bed recovering from an operation, and six people were measuring the room because they wanted to purchase the hospital. Surely the health authorities could wait until patients have been properly treated and discharged from hospital before they start selling the building under the very noses of people who have just had operations.

There should be some measure to force health authorities to ensure that the standards of hygiene we expect in areas like Mid-Glamorgan and throughout Britain are maintained.

I do not want to dwell on the hospital service in Wales. I have also been to hospitals near the House of Commons. There is no way that we can get medical treatment in the House. We have to go to the hospitals nearby. If I were to suffer a heart attack now, I would have to wait until somebody could take me to Westminster hospital or to St. Thomas's hospital. That is because there is no sick room or hospital room in the House. There are 650 hon. Members and a staff of 3,000, as well as other people who visit the House. It is deplorable that we have so few medical facilities. If we worked in industry, we would have better facilities than anything that is available in this place.

Some years ago I went to visit a close friend of mine who was in hospital, the late hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central, Mr. Harry Cowans. He was in a room on his own, and the conditions were disgraceful. That is all we can expect when we go forward from the House. It is no different from what I expect when I visit some of the hospitals in Mid-Glamorgan and see the treatment that is available there. It is high time that the Government did something to ensure that standards of hygiene are improved. Patients in hospital should not suffer from infection caused by the problems that I have mentioned. The disrepair of hospitals, especially old hospitals, should be remedied.

I hope that the Minister will respond to the speeches on this new clause by accepting it.

The Minister for Health (Mr. Barney Hayhoe): This debate has gone on for just over three hours and I suspect that the House would like to see it concluded. The longer the debate has continued the weaker the case in favour of this new clause has become. The general conditions that have been so roundly condemned by Opposition Members existed throughout the lifetime of the last Labour Government. This Government have come forward with the initiative to abolish Crown immunity in relation to hospital food and kitchens. That initiative was warmly and rightly welcomed when it was announced by my right hon. Friend a few months ago. There has been hardly a mention of that in the debate and one can only assume from the speeches of Opposition Members that for them history began with the general election in May 1979. The hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) barely acknowledged responsibility for those matters——

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I have just been to the Vote Office to pick up a copy of the report of the Second Reading of this Bill and it was not available. It is unprecedented for us to have a debate of this nature when the report of the debate on Second Reading is not available. What can be done? I am told that we must wait for it to come from the printers. We are now on Report and many hon. Members want that document for reference. This is a genuine point of order. We cannot all go to the Library and photocopy all the proceedings. It is unreasonable that we should be debating the matter when the arrangements and supporting services of the House have broken down in that way. I wonder whether you will be able to do something, even at this late hour.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I understand that the hon. Gentleman is complaining that there is not a copy available in the Vote Office of the official record of the Second Reading debate. I shall have some inquiries made.

Mr. Hayhoe: I was talking of the changing situation which existed for many years under the Labour Government. Those Labour Members who have spoken have hardly acknowledged their party's responsibility in these matters. Indeed the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras acknowledged in about 30 seconds that, with hindsight, he would have preferred matters to have been put right earlier. But the right hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley) was wholly and utterly partisan and selective. His world clearly begins in 1979. He was self-satisfied with his own party's record and unfairly critical of others. That narrow, blinkered approach does him no credit at all.

The tragic affair at Stanley Royd has been prayed in aid by many hon. Members. I should make it clear that the report of the committee of inquiry into the outbreak of food poisoning at Stanley Royd reported that the presence or absence of Crown immunity would have altered nothing at Stanley Royd. Available finance has also been referred to. Again, the official report made it clear that resources were not the cause of the outbreak. The reasons were as follows:

"So far as the immediate cause of the outbreak at Stanley Royd is concerned, namely errors and faults in the preparation and handling of food, there are no recommendations which we can make which have not been made before, which do not appear in the numerous publications on catering and hygiene to which we were referred and which were published to everyone concerned. . . . All the rules and principles of good catering practice appear to have been within the knowledge of those concerned in Stanley Royd before the outbreak, including the requirement to keep samples of the food served from the kitchens. The outbreak occurred because those concerned ignored those rules and principles. The failure to follow known rules and principles arose, at least in part, because of the long standing failure of the supervisory grades to supervise adequately. This failure caused venial habits to become bad practices. In turn the failure of the supervisory grades stemmed in part from the failure of management to manage, to check, and to ensure that the staff were constantly reminded of the rules and complied with them."

That must be the background to what we are considering today. Indeed, the report of the committee of inquiry is one of the most powerful arguments in support of general management, which did not exist when the outbreak occurred, being introduced.

Reference has also been made in the debate——

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hayhoe: No. I shall deal with some of the points that have been raised during the debate. The hon. Gentleman was not here and it is important to respond to the points that have been made during what has been a long debate.

Let me deal with competitive tendering. Labour Members, in their usual prejudiced and dogmatic fashion, sought to say that if something was being done by a private contractor it was necessarily bad, with the implication that if something was being done by a public employee it was necessarily good. I reject such a dogmatic and absurd view of the world. The truth is that good practice occurs in both the private and public sectors, just as bad practice can occur in both. I want to see conditions with general management within the NHS supporting good practice and trying to ensure that the sort of failures that occurred at Stanley Royd never occur again.

We have had something of a re-run of the debate in Committee. The hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras repeated the arguments that he put then, as did some of his hon. Friends, and so I must repeat some of mine. There is no exact parallel between Crown immunity as it affects hospital food and kitchens and Crown immunity as it affects health and safety legislation and, indeed, other matters.

The Labour Government treated those matters separately and differently. Most of the representations that we as Members of Parliament have received in recent months also treated these matters separately and differently. The Government have made it clear that the test that they apply to deciding whether Crown immunity should be lifted from a given area of legislation is that the case must be made that the lifting of Crown immunity is the best way to secure any improvement in standards necessary to protect patients and staff.

The Government believe that that case has been established with regard to the application of food hygiene legislation to health authorities. That is why the Government have brought forward the measures contained in clause 1. The wider matters to which hon. Members have referred at various points in the Bill's progress, and which were referred to specifically by the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras in moving new clause 1, are of clear importance, but in no instance has the case to lift Crown immunity been made with the same strength as was made with respect to food hygiene legislation.

Mr. Dobson rose——

Mr. Hayhoe: Let me deal with some of the points raised during the course of a long debate, in which I listened to every word.

Arrangements were established by the Labour Government when they introduced the Crown notice system which still apply and which are working reasonably well. The hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy) referred to comments that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary, the Member for Wycombe (Mr.

[Mr. Hayhoe]

Whitney), had made in replying to the Second Reading debate about the fact that 300 notices had been issued between 1978 and 1984. All had been dealt with and none referred to the Secretary of State concerned non-compliance matters. The Crown notice system, as introduced by the previous Labour Government, gave the power to the health and safety inspectors, if they believed that a Crown notice was not being complied with, to refer that matter to the Secretary of State of the Department concerned.

Suggestions have been made by the hon. Gentleman, and I think elsewhere, that there has been, to put it in unpejorative terms, a more relaxed approach by health and safety inspectors when they were dealing with Crown premises compared with the attitude that they adopted when they were dealing with other premises. I am grateful to have a nod of assent from the hon. Gentleman. The Health and Safety Executive is now tightening up its procedures to ensure that requirements for compliance are as stringent for Crown premises as for firms in the private sector. In particular, it is issuing new procedures with instructions to health and safety inspectors, revised to emphasise that a problem found in a Crown body should receive the same priority as it would in a private concern. The time allowed to do remedial work – a point raised by the hon. Gentleman – should be no more generous than it would be for the private employer. In general, a sense of urgency should be instilled into the execution of any required improvements.

Secondly, copies of all Crown notices that have not been complied with in the time allowed and reports of all offences that, but for Crown immunity, would have led to prosecution, must now be sent directly to the headquarters of the Department responsible for the establishment concerned.

A positive and constructive change is being adopted for health and safety inspectors and I believe that that will go a long way towards reinforcing the existing good working relationship between those inspectors and Health Service personnel.

Reference was made to health authorities restricting the access of inspectors. There is no justification for that. Any inspectors who feel that access is being restricted or that they cannot make random, surprise visits should raise the matter with their superiors. It is intended that such access should be available.

The hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras and others mentioned the Rent Acts. The effect of Crown immunity is that NHS tenants are not protected tenants under the Rent Acts. However, council tenants are also not protected tenants under the Rent Acts and, as far as I can see, the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras wants to institute for the NHS a regime that I suspect that he would not be prepared to introduce for local authorities. I may do him an injustice, but he certainly did not refer to that matter.

The hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras put the debate into the wider context of the Government's policy on NHS residential accommodation. I dealt with the issue in an Adjournment debate on 23 May and I repeat what I said then. The conditions under which staff occupy NHS accommodation and under which health authorities manage the residential estate require examination, with a view to establishing a code of practice or some similar set of arrangements. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has therefore asked the NHS management board to review these matters urgently and to consult health authorities and professional and staff interests. I am sure, from the general tenor of what the hon. Gentleman said, that he will welcome that clear undertaking and I hope that the House will welcome its repetition.

The review will consider Crown immunity and it would be wrong to prejudge or pre-empt the review body's consideration.

The hon. Member for Fife, Central (Mr. Hamilton) asked about the circular that I said on 23 May would be sent out fairly soon. I can tell the hon. Gentleman that the advance copy went to regional general managers on Friday and the printed copies for wider circulation will follow.

The hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras referred to the West Surrey case. He knows about the case and his comments today were even more odd than was his original prejudice, which was based on a fairly complete ignorance of the background to the incident. The property concerned was not owned by the NHS; it was leased from a trust company, which sought to increase the rent to £5,000 a year – four or five times the previous level. The notice to quit was served on the health authority, which, in turn, had to take action and did so by offering the nurse alternatives. I understand that after a fair amount of to-ing and fro-ing she has accepted alternative accommodation.

Mr. Dobson rose

Mr. Hayhoe: The hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras wishes to intervene, but let me ask him a question. He seemed to be saying that the nurse should have an absolute right to remain in that property, come what may. But what if the rent had been going up to £10,000, £20,000 or £100,000? Would he still maintain that Health Service funds should be diverted in that way and that NHS management should not take appropriate action to deal with the situation?

Mr. Dobson: For a start, it was the Secretary of State who was stupid enough to give a guarantee without any reservation or caveat. If he had to break his word to do what he thought was sensible, that is his problem.

If the Minister is saying that the Secretary of State's guarantee applies to no leasehold property, why, when the case arose, did the right hon. Gentleman rely on Crown immunity? The Government ought to accept responsibility for people living in NHS property. If they do not, they surely cannot fall back on Crown immunity as a way of getting people slung out.

Mr. Hayhoe: Crown immunity is a side issue in this case. The essential element is that the property was not owned by the NHS and therefore did not form part of the review of the methods of dealing with that property to which my right hon. Friend was referring when he gave the hon. Gentleman that assurance. I am sorry that, despite our correspondence, the hon. Gentleman seeks to place that assurance in a much wider context.

Mr. Dobson rose——

My Hayhoe: I will not give way to the hon. Gentleman, because I think that the House is ready to come to a decision on the new clause.

The lurid descriptions of Opposition Members of the state of kitchens and other parts of NHS hospitals could lead one to imagine that things were different when Crown immunity did not apply under the Labour Government. Of course, conditions were precisely the same then. We are improving them, in a limited, constructive and helpful fashion.

Great stress has been laid on unacceptable conditions in many of our hospitals from time to time, but it would be right to end the debate by paying tribute to the staff concerned for maintaining high standards as the normal course. It would be wrong if the critical speeches of Opposition Members sent out a message that was critical of the standards of care and service that the vast majority of NHS personnel give to the Service.

Dr. Marek: The Minister has a contorted view if he believes that conditions are the same as they were under the Labour Government. That is not true, because, by and large, conditions in hospitals were considerably better before 1979.

The explanatory and financial memorandum to the Bill says:

"Clause 1 has no implications for public expenditure."

Yet the Government are seeking in clause 1 to make sure that hospital kitchens come under the food legislation and if there are kitchens that are not up to scratch and in which there are cockroaches, flies, feral cats and other vermin, it will necessarily cost money to bring those premises up to the required standard. The comment that clause 1 has no implications for public expenditure sets the tone of the Bill and tells us what the Government really think of the NHS and its hospitals. They want to make the right noises in public. They will do the minimum necessary, but they will not spend money, because by and large Conservative Members and their friends do not use the NHS.

Mr. Rogers: A letter sent to my hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) by the National Association of Health Authorities in England and Wales says that if more effective management is to enable higher standards to be established, extra money will have to be given.

Dr. Marek: My hon. Friend has made the point for me. It is obvious, not only to Labour Members, but to the public, that the Government's hypocrisy has carried them through since 1979. Indeed, they are talking about hanging on until 1988, but the public will not be deceived.

The Government claim that the minimal clause has been introduced because they are dissatisfied with the conditions in hospital kitchens. Of course, that is not true. The credit for the introduction of this Bill must go to the hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd), who was about to have his Bill debated. There was so much concern on both sides of the House about the conditions prevailing in hospitals that the Government had to do something about them. The Government would not have introduced the measure if the hon. Member for Aldridge-Browhills had not been in that situation.

There is no point in introducing a clause that seeks to make only hospital kitchens subject to the food legislation. Food is sent in by outside caterers, has to be prepared, and then travels up and down the corridors. At present we do not know whether the whole area will be subject to the food legislation. After the food has been eaten, the swill and refuse have to be taken away.

My hon. Friend the Member for Fife, Central (Mr. Hamilton) said that cockroaches were no respecters of boundaries. They may primarily eat food that they find in hospitals, or they may find a living in rooms where drugs are kept. The legislation will not cover those areas. [Interruption.] The Government are stupid to say that the legislation should cover food but nothing else.

I shall give some examples of letters that I have received about the Bill. This is an important debate. I know that Conservative Members want me to hurry up, but we are discussing a serious issue. I have received a lot of correspondence, and the issue must be given due consideration. The BMA said:

"The Association's Annual Representative Meeting" which is the policy-making body of the BMA

"last year passed the following Resolution: – That this Meeting believes that Health and Safety at Work Regulations should be enforced on Crown property."

One of the new clauses seeks to do just that.

Why should we ask for health and safety at work legislation to be enforced on Crown property in addition to food legislation? The Health and Safety at Work etc. Act was passed by the previous Labour Administration. It has contributed to safety and the maintenance of standards – something for which the Government have shown little regard. The Act makes "further provision for securing the health, safety and welfare of persons at work, for protecting others against risks to health or safety in connection with activities of persons at work, for controlling the keeping and use and preventing the unlawful acquisition, possession and use of dangerous substances."

I should have thought that the new clause, which seeks to apply the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act to hospital premises, was unexceptionable in this case. After all, there are plenty of dangerous substances in hospitals. That Act also controls certain emissions into the atmosphere. It makes further provision with respect to the "employment medical advisory services; to amend the law relating to building conditions".

The ordinary man in the street would immediately say that we needed all those things and that the Act should apply to NHS hospitals.

In 1983 the Health and Safety Commission went so far as to issue a document entitled, "Safety Policies in the National Health Service", which set our guidance for employers in the NHS

"to devise and use effective statements of health and safety policy as required by the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974".

However, the document was disappointing in that its foreword clearly stated that the guidance document did not have the force of law or of an approved code of practice. The Minister made great play of Crown notices being tightened up and reporting being made much stricter, but there is still a deferential attitude when it comes to applying that Act to the NHS. I do not think that any circulars or ministerial prompting of the Health and Safety Executive will change that.

David Basnett, general secretary of the General Municipal, Boilermakers and Allied Trades Union, submitted a document entitled, "The case against Crown Immunity". It cites case No. 2 in which the House may be interested, which concerns an explosion in kitchen equipment. The prosecution of an NHS manager was eventually dropped. I shall briefly go through the case later, but it is a pity that the prosecution was dropped simply because the Health and Safety Executive did not have the necessary powers. It had a deferential attitude towards the NHS and was persuaded not to prosecute. "The case against Crown Immunity" says —

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am trying to listen to my hon. Friend, but these louts down by the Bar of the House are preventing me from doing so. Will you get some kind of order in the place?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): I am also finding it somewhat difficult to hear. I hope that the conversations taking place in various parts of the Chamber and outside it will cease so that we can hear the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek), who has the Floor.

Dr. Marek: The following was said about that intended prosecution:

"An HSE inspector issued a summons against an NHS Area Administrator for a breach of the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act following an explosion in kitchen equipment and other safety defects. (Managers and other employees in Crown premises can be prosecuted as individuals even though the organisation itself is immune). Following intervention by senior HSE Administra-tors the summons was withdrawn and the Inspector was later transferred. The GMB wrote to the Chairman of the HSC to complain and to seek an explanation. In his reply the HSC Chairman said that Crown Immunity had 'complicated the issue' and that the summons had been withdrawn following more than the usual degree of scrutiny by senior HSE administrators who recognised the 'wider implications' of such an action."

It is not just a case that involves issuing a Crown notice or having a quiet word with the administrator or general manager. A risk to life and something quite serious was involved, yet the prosecution was dropped because of the deferential attitude shown towards the NHS by the HSE. The description of the case continues:

"If Crown immunity had not complicated the issue there would have been a prosecution. A similar case involving another large new entrant area, ie employers covered by health and safety legislation or for the first time following the HSW Act 1975, had resulted in the prosecution of a senior local authority employer. The surrounding publicity and shock to senior managers in local authorities galvanised that whole sector of employment into compliance with the health and safety rules. This opportunity has been missed in the NHS due to the deferential attitude towards the NHS by the HSE".

I had hoped that the Minister would take on board some of those arguments. There can be nothing wrong with applying the Act to hospital premises, especially as that would mean an arm's length relationship between the HSE and the NHS. If the HSE found something wrong, it would have statutory backing to take appropriate action. However one dresses it up, Crown notices are apologies for not doing the proper thing, which is to have statutory regulations guiding the HSE on how to secure the safety of the nation.

The staff in hospitals cannot have the same level of concern about health and safety as they would if there were statutory guidelines. Kitchens are dangerous places, and if the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act were applied there would be a formal system of committees, health and safety officers and inspections. That happens in some hospitals anyway, but there is no statutory backing and the staff cannot demand it. It is another failure in the system.

What possible excuse can the Government give for not allowing the Act's provisions to apply to hospitals? I answered that question during my opening statement — the Government do not want to spend the money. They do not care one jot about what happens in the NHS. They would prefer that it did not exist. By and large, Members of the Conservative party do not use the NHS, so the Government do not have the interests of NHS patients or NHS employees at heart.

The BMA document makes other points, but I accept that time is becoming short —

Mrs. Clwyd: Does my hon. Friend agree that the Health and Safety Inspectorate has been run down under this Government and that there are now 15 per cent. fewer inspectors than in 1979? Therefore, the number of visits to factories and hospitals has fallen by 15 per cent. The inspectorate cannot even do the job that it is expected to do. It is no wonder that the Government do not want Crown immunity lifted from hospital kitchens.

Dr. Marek: My hon. Friend makes a valid point. The Government are not interested in the health and safety of employees, only in the health and wealth of their supporters — and they do not find their supporters working in the NHS.

The new clause seeks to extend the removal of Crown immunity so that hospitals come under the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act. The BMA points out that one of the appendices to the Health and Safety Executive document "Safety Policies in the Health Service 1983" gives a checklist that identifies matters that should be covered in safety policy. It is only a guideline, but it involves some detail in identifying matters that should be considered in the implementation of safety policy. Questions were posed under headings such as noise and vibration in hospitals, radiation, dust, toxic materials and their availability and storage, various gases, infection risks and disposal of waste and effluent. Those areas are of relevance not only to staff but to patients, and the guidelines provide a cogent argument to show why the new clause should be accepted.

Patients are not well people — they are ill, which is why they are in hospital. They need more than the usual care given by health and safety inspectors at a normal place of work. The House should bend over backwards to ensure that the most stringent conditions apply.

The BMA document further states:

"The 1974 Act was to make further provision for securing the health and safety of persons at work and for protecting others against risks to health or safety in connection with the activities of persons at work."

I have given the House a fair impression of what the BMA thinks about this matter. It is a great pity that the Government are obdurate in their insistence upon saving money and not giving their blessing to the new clause.

The Royal College of Nursing also believes that Crown immunity should be removed. A letter from its general secretary of 12 May, which I suspect has been sent to many hon. Members, states:

"The Royal College of Nursing welcomes the Government's plans to amend the law relating to Crown immunity in respect of the Food Act 1984. The RCN would also urge amendments to the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974 to remove the Crown's immunity from prosecution under that Act."

Why does it say that? It is the major nursing union in hospitals and has direct experience of what happens. It has given its considered judgment.

The National Association of Health Authorities in England and Wales has written to express its support for new clause 1. It states that at its annual general meeting the following resolution was passed:

"That Crown property should be legally subject to the same rights and requirements as other property in respect of matters of public concern such as environmental health and health and safety at work and that the present immunity should be removed."

There are many other paragraphs in that letter, but I shall not read them because that paragraph is sufficient. It is a responsible body that has the NHS very much in its mind. It supports an extension of the removal of Crown immunity along the lines of the new clause.

The Consumers Association does not go quite that far, but in a letter it complains about the enormous powers reserved for Ministers and states:

"We have one serious reservation about the Government's Bill as it is drafted and this concerns clause 2(b). It seems that this subclause would give Ministers the power to reduce or even eliminate the application of the main principles of the Bill in virtually any way they see fit."

The Government have done only the minimum necessary, and the view of that body is that Ministers are being given powers to reduce even what the Government are giving in clause 1.

The British Pest Control Association believes that the problem of pest infestation has grown so rapidly that most hospitals are now affected. It is not saying that infestation has been present during the last six years under the Tory Administration at the same levels as under the previous Labour Administration. It says that the problem has grown rapidly and that most hospitals are now affected. That gives the lie to the Government's assertion that the problem existed when the previous Labour Government were in office and that the present Tory Government are taking action.

I am not saying that the problem did not exist under the previous Labour Administration, but I contend that the Government's refusal to spend money on the NHS has led to the problem becoming more severe. The Government talk about expenditure of 24 per cent. in real terms, but that is a gross misrepresentation of the figures. I am grateful to the Minister for not repeating that misrepresentation when he replied to the debate. The real fact is that hospitals have been starved of money and have suffered throughout the past five years. Less money is available to them in real terms than hitherto.

Hospitals are suffering because of the presence of private contractors in many institutions. That is one reason why the clauses have been tabled. If the House accepts them, it is undeniable that there will be a need for extra finance to be provided by central Government or from some other source so that matters can be put right. I believe that the extra finance must be provided in any event. Infestation is so bad that extra money will be necessary if the law is to be obeyed. If the clauses were passed, our case would be overwhelming and extra money would have to be provided.

Private contractors are not interested primarily in the health and wellbeing of patients; they are interested in providing profits for their shareholders. I hope that the Government will not say outside the House that the Opposition have said that that is their view of the staff and workers of private contractors. I am not saying that. I accept that those people have been up to the mark. Unfortunately, the conditions under which they have to work, the materials with which they are provided, low pay, a consequent lack of morale and inevitable uncertainty have led to the grave situation that is now to be found in our hospitals.

The Opposition believe that the Government have gone a small step towards making life in hospitals for patients and NHS staff slightly better. They have done this only because the hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills has a Bill which is about to be debated and voted upon in private Members' time. We do not believe that the Government would have brought forward this measure if that had not been the position. Additionally, we believe that there is a long way to go and that extra provision should be made. Crown immunity should be removed completely and more finance should be provided. This is necessary because the Government have not been providing a real increase in finance for our hospitals. Given the seriousness of the clauses, the Opposition will be asking for separate votes.

APPLICATION OF HEALTH AND SAFETY LEGISLATION TO HEALTH AUTHORITIES

1.—(1) For the purposes of the health and safety legislation:

(a) a health authority shall not be regarded as the servant or agent of the Crown, or as enjoying any status, immunity or privilege of the Crown; and

(b) premises used by a health authority shall not be regarded as property of or property held on behalf of the Crown.

(2) The appropriate authority may by regulations provide who is to be treated as the user, occupier or owner of any such premises for any of those purposes; and

(3) The powers to make regulations altered by subsection (2) above shall be exercisable by statutory instrument.

(4) A statutory instrument containing regulations made in the exercise of the power conferred by that subsection shall not be made unless a draft of the instrument has been laid before Parliament and approved by a resolution of each House.

(5) Section 125 of the 1977 Act and section 101 of the 1979 Act shall have no effect in relation to any action, liability, claim or demand arising out of the health and safety legislation.'.—[Dr. Marek.]

ADJUDICATING PANEL

"(1) Any determinations made under Section 3 may be referred to an adjudicating panel of independent members appointed by the Secretary of State by regulation for a period of five years by any affected person within four weeks of the determination being made and published.

(2) The adjudicating panel will consider the reasonableness of the determination and may refer any determination back to the determining authority for further consideration.".

[Dr. Marek.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Dr. Marek: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): With this it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 46, in clause 3, page 6, line 16, leave out subsection (2).

No. 49, in page 6, line 20, leave out subsection (3).

Dr. Marek: The new clause is important. It would not be so important if we had a normal Government, but we do not have a normal Government. They have been prepared to act unreasonably many times. That is illustrated by the many occasions on which the former Secretary of State for Transport was hauled before the courts for acting unreasonably.

The Opposition believe that the Bill gives far too many wide powers to the Secretary of State for Social Services, especially in determining the remuneration for persons providing general medical services. The Bill enables the Secretary of State, if he has any new information, to reconsider a determination and, on the basis of that new information, to reopen the negotiations and try to claw back some money.

That was done recently with the opticians. I shall deal with that case at some length because it went to the Queen's Bench division of the High Court of Justice and the Secretary of State lost the appeal against the opticians. He did so for several reasons. The judgment is interesting. From it, we understand why clause 3 has been drafted as it has. The judge used certain arguments when finding against the Secretary of State. All those arguments are provided for in the Bill. Should there be another court case, a judge would not be able to deploy them.

Amendments Nos. 46 and 49 relate to the deletion of clause 3(2) and 3(3). To some extent, they are probing amendments. Amendment No. 46 would leave out clause 3(2), which provides:

"An earlier determination is to be taken to have been unsatisfactory only if, had it fallen to the authority to make it at the time of the later determination, the authority would have made it on the basis of different information."

The subsection can be interpreted very widely. Information does not have to be replaced. Different information could be more information. In such circumstances, the Secretary of State could argue that one year has passed since fixing the price for spectacle lenses, dentures or surgical appliances, that he has extra information, and that he will reopen the procedure.

The Minister will say that we have perfectly good working arrangements between contracting services and the DHSS and that we ought to give them a chance. He will argue that we should let bygones be bygones and that the Government will not try to recover the unintended profits from opticians. He will argue that, if only the House trusts him, everything will be all right.

I shall not say that such a statement would be dishonest, but we are legislating for more than the next year or two years. A Minister in a future Government might contend that he has certain powers and would not read the present Minister's assurances. Besides, one Administration cannot bind a successor. The Minister might then use the wide power in clause 3(2) to reopen a determination on the basis of perhaps a very small difference in information.

New clause 4 and amendment No. 46 would stop such action and ensure that, once a determination has been made, it will be left alone. It is important for the contracting professions, such as dentists, pharmacists and opticians, to know where they stand. We still have the problem of future determinations recovering money on different products or services. That is what happened with the so-called unintended profits made by opticians.

The Secretary of State has declared that he would recover the money that opticians made from supplying discounted glasses on eyesight tests. He intended to recover the money from every optician practising at the time, although some might have entered the service only after the profits had been made. That is hardly a moral line and it was much resented by the profession. I am pleased that the Minister has accepted the judgment in the Queen's Bench division and said that he will not try to recover those profits under this Bill if he is empowered as is suggested.

The Secretary of State was quite prepared, however, to take discriminatory action against a class of contractor. It is important to be able to restrain the Minister so that he cannot do anything that he likes.

Amendment No. 49 would leave out clause 3(3), which provides:

"If an amount falls to be deducted by virtue of subsection (1)(a) above, the determining authority, in fixing amounts of remuneration for persons to whom the determination relates, may have regard to the period within which they first provided services of the description to which it relates."

The Opposition do not necessarily oppose the subsection, but we strongly oppose the word "may". The matter was not discussed properly in Committee. "May" should be replaced by "shall". If the Minister is persuaded by our arguments, I hope that he will ensure that such an amendment is made in another place.

We should have "shall" for equity's sake. There should be a system in the DHSS which enables us to track down who provided a service, who entered the profession and who retired. When negotiations are c ed and a determination is made, that should be the end of the matter. We should not be empowering the Minister to reopen any determination which he sees fit to reopen on the basis of almost any excuse.

New clause 4 is a way out of the dilemma. It proposes:

"(1) Any determination made under Section 3 may be referred to an adjudicating panel of independent members appointed by the Secretary of State by regulation for a period of five years by any affected person within four weeks of the determination being made and published."

If the Minister has, perhaps unfairly, determined that the amounts payable should be X plus Y, the contracting parties would have some recourse to an independent adjudicating panel.

New clause 4(2) proposes:

"The adjudicating panel will consider the reasonableness of the determination and may refer any determination back to the determining authority for further consideration.".

The intention is not that the adjudicating panel should judge the determination and go through the lengthy process involved. It is possible that a Minister might be leant on by the Treasury or the Prime Minister to save as much money as possible and he might therefore calculate the figures unreasonably and impose his determination against the will of the contracting parties. The new clause provides some safeguards against such action by a Minister.

I would not normally propose such a new clause, because Ministers usually act reasonably and try to serve the public. The present Government, however, are noted for being comprised of Ministers who make decisions that are found to be beyond their power or incorrect. The Secretary of State for Transport is one; the Secretary of State for Social Services is another, his board and lodging payments regulations having been found to be illegal and not properly drafted.

I shall deal with the case of The Queen v. Secretary of State for Social Services application for judicial review in the High Court of Justice, Queen's Bench division. It is important for the House to know exactly why the judgment went against the Secretary of State. The judgment starts:

"The question to be answered in these cases is essentially the same. Namely whether or not the Secretary of State for Social Services can recover sums which he calls 'unintended profits' which he says he has paid to ophthalmic opticians in England and Wales in the years from 1978 to 1985."

The Minister, not the opticians, called them "unintended profits". As I understand it, they arose because opticians were granted certain sums for spectacles, and, because of competition in the market, certain discounts were given to opticians, who then pocketed them.

The Department was sadly at fault in not perceiving that that had been going on for about four years. It should have been on the ball and said, "Last year you made the extra profits from discounts. We shall change that." Eventually the DHSS woke up to the fact. Its sampling system is at fault, from the usual trouble of not having sufficient manpower to police the determinations and the agreements. Therefore, it does not have a good statistical basis on which to place its determinations. If the Government had spent more money and employed more people, this would probably not have arisen. Amendment No. 46 would not allow the Minister to reopen determinations on the basis that different information had been supplied. If that had been the case, there would have been pressure on the Secretary of State to ensure that, when a determination was made, it was made properly. It would not then need to be reopened.

The judgment continues:

"However the issue is described that is the real nature of these cases. There are two separate cases because two representative bodies have made their own applications. But the cases dovetail and interlock to such an extent that I consider them as one.

I say at once, since I do not believe in suspense, that the applicants succeed in their arguments before me, and thus the Secretary of State may not in my judgment recover the relevant sums."

It would have been nice to see a sentence in the Bill saying that the Department would not recover any sums by primary legislation at this stage. I know that the Minister gave that assurance in Committee [Interruption.] This is primary legislation.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. Ray Whitney): That would have been an extremely odd sentence to insert in the Bill.

Dr. Marek: It could have been inserted through a clause similar to clause 1(8), which states:

"This section shall have no effect in relation to anything done or omitted before its commencement."

A similar sentence at the end of this part would have laid to rest a great deal of the apprehension within the profession. The opticians' and dentists' bodies read Hansard, but I wonder whether every optician reads Hansard as assiduously as Ministers and hon. Members and the bodies representing the professions. If that had been inserted, it would have shown the Government's intention to be fair as opposed to their apparent intention to get away with spending as little as possible.

The judge continues:

"The amount involved is said to be over £14 million of which the Secretary of State assessed that he might recover over £11 million in the course of the next two years should his proposed arrangements for recovery be held to be lawful.

It should however be noted at the outset that the applicants have never accepted that the sums involved are properly described as 'unintended profits'; and (in the case of the Federation of Optical Corporate Bodies) Sir Ian Percival points out that the Secretary of State is unable to identify specifically any sums which may have accrued to his corporate clients and relies upon an 'imputed' figure of £3·5 million as their share in the total sum in question."

8.15 pm

That speaks for itself: the Minister could not identify any sums specifically. Hon. Members will note that powers are given to the Minister in clause 3. Subsection (5) makes the distinction when it states:

"If the later determination is of remuneration for a category of services falling within one of the descriptions of services mentioned in section 43A(1) of the 1977 Act or section 28A(1) of the 1978 Act, it is immaterial whether the earlier determination was of remuneration for the same category of services or for any other category of services falling within the same description."

That makes it clear that it does not matter which category of services it is. The Minister has wide powers to go from one category to another and to make later determinations for different categories from those of the earlier determinations.

The judge talks about members of the Bar appearing before him, and, in his judgment, continues:

"In the same context Mr. Bagnall points out that while his clients did achieve substantial discounts in their buying of spectacles in the relevant years this was perfectly well known to the DHSS from 1978 onwards, and palpably clear from 1982 (see the PAC documents). And . . . full deployment of the history would show that such discounts were necessary for survival in many cases because of the DHSS decision to withold very large sums (up to £92 million at one time) which were legally due to the opticians. The residuary £6 million of that retained sum was only accepted as repayable recently. So that again the applicants say that the overall history would not justify any criticism of the opticians nor any conclusion that they had become unjustly enriched in any way."

The tenor of the judge's statement is that the Minister is not acting reasonably or morally, and that he is not considering dispassionately the reasons why the position arose. It suddenly came to his attention.

Earlier I said that I did not believe that the DHSS knew what was going on, but the judge states that it did. If the DHSS knew what was going on but did nothing, that is worse than if it had not known. The judgment shows that the Minister was acting unreasonably and was prepared to go to the courts to recover the money, without allowing any discussion as to whether the so-called "unintended profits" were unintended. He simply assumed that they were unintended profits, penalised the opticians, and said, "I shall recover this money. What is more, I shall recover it for another service and from everybody, not just from those who benefited from these unintended profits." How much more immoral can one get than that?

The judge continues:

"It should be noted that the fixing of the fees and payments by successive determinations is unilateral, in the sense that no agreement or arbitration is provided for by the Act or the Regulations."

It is clear that the judge was not happy about this, and any dispassionate person aiming to judge the case on its merits would regard this as fair.

The judge goes on to say:

"The Secretary of State is (as Mr. Carnwath put it)"—

I take it that he is another barrister—

"determining rates on which he is willing to do business with practitioners and he lays down the fees and charges. Mr. Carnwath added that the Secretary of State says in his Statements, 'These are the terms on which I think it is reasonable to seek these facilities'.

Actual payments for services by the relevant Committee are subject to specific rules as to over payments made in error or in circumstances where it was not due . . . Within certain constraints therefore the Secretary of State acts in his discretion. But it can at once be seen that the rates can be altered at any time by a fresh determination, so that the correction of any imbalance is wholly in the hands of the Secretary of State."

I emphasise that last sentence, because it is crucial to the way that the Bill has been drafted. It says:

"But it can be seen at once that the rates can be altered at any time by a fresh determination, so that the correction of any imbalance is wholly in the hands of the Secretary of State."

The judge pulled up the Secretary of State, and that is why these powers are included in clause 3. They give the Secretary of State back his untrammelled powers. Everything will be in his hands so that he can make different determinations, or whatever. The new clause and the two amendments seek to restrict the Secretary of State's powers a little by not allowing him this unbridled freedom to do what he wishes.

The Federation of Manufacturing Opticians rejected an alternative argument that included these words:

"While it is, of course, the case that the sums contained in the Statement are those which we have negotiated with you, there is nowhere in the Statement or in the Terms and Conditions of Service of opticians any prohibition, explicit or implicit, on their obtaining more favourable terms if they are able to do so."

If that is the case, the way that the determinations are made should be looked at. It looks as if some hole or gap is available into which wording could be put to tighten up the regulations under which determinations are made. That means not that the answer should be that the Minister should be given these powers, but that he should go away and look at the regulations and the way in which he fixes the determinations between the contracting parties to make sure that those unintended profits are not made.

The judge continues:

"From 1978 onwards it is said that because of discounts available to opticians and (as it seems to me) because of reduced costs in lenses and in manufacture, the Statement payments in respect of appliances have allowed opticians to recover more than the Secretary of State intended, since his intention was that payments should be 'neutral'."

The Secretary of State's intentions may have been that the payments should be neutral, but he did not set up the body, the determination, the apparatus, the consultations and the committees to ensure that these payments should be neutral. He now proposes that we give him blanket powers to go back two, three, or even five years and say that the payments were not neutral and that he would recover the difference.

I am not arguing—and my hon. Friends will agree with me—that the Opposition should support whatever the contracting parties to the NHS should be doing.

Mr. Whitney: Progress.

Dr. Marek: This is an important argument. If the contracting parties were unsure of their future and did not know what the Secretary of State would do about the determinations that had been made years before, that must affect the quality of service that the NHS enjoys from these contracting parties.

I do not want contracting parties to be overpaid or underpaid; I want them to have just the right amount. Any legislation could ensure that. I am glad that the Minister nods. I am sure that both sides of the House would agree with that. The argument is about how we get this. The right way to go about it is not to allow the Minister powers arbitrarily to change the determination at a later time.

The judge goes on:

"Back in 1977 'prescription houses' advertised their services at Statement rates . . . but after that year the DHSS concluded that unintended profits were being made. Some 'realignment of statement rates' was done as from April 1982 and on other occasions, but according to the DHSS this did not produce the intended result. So for 1985 the present assessed figure is the disputed £14 million."

Was there any bungling or any incompetence in the DHSS in not being able to assess the figure accurately? This has been going on since 1977. The judge says:

"Some 'realignment at statement rates' was done, but according to the DHSS this did not produce the intended result."

Are we doing the right thing in passing this primary legislation? Should we be looking instead at what goes on inside DHSS offices at the Elephant and Castle to make sure that the procedures are carried out efficiently, that there are enough staff to undertake the procedures and that the procedures are accurate once they have been carried out? It would have been better if the Minister had looked at the matter from that point of view, instead of taking the easy way out and saying that, as the Government have a majority, it does not matter what they put in the Bill. There might be 15 Tory Members rebelling on Monday night, a different 15 rebelling on Tuesday and yet a different 15 on Wednesday, but it will not matter because of the Government's majority.

Mr. Roland Boyes (Houghton and Washington): How many rebel on Thursdays?

Dr. Marek: They often rebel.

I suspect that that may have been in the Secretary of State's mind when this legislation was introduced. He might have said, "Let us not think too hard about it. This gives us all the powers that we need and certainly all the powers that we thought we had before the judgment. Our life would be made easier if that happened." That may be the case, but our society would not then be as fair as it would be if the Secretary of State went about it another way and looked at his own procedures and organisation within the DHSS.

The judge says:

"It is to be noted that the Statement figure still comes solely from the Secretary of State who obtains his information from the suppliers and not from the opticians. So that the opticians are in no way responsible for what the Secretary of State says has happened."

The argument gets worse and worse. The price fixing was with the suppliers, not the opticians, as hon. Members will note.

The judge is not sure about the next point. He says:

"Furthermore, assuming that more has been paid than was 'intended', the Secretary of State accepts that there is 'no legal basis for imposing the recovery of unintended profits; recovery can only be achieved by agreement' (see DHSS Memorandum of 1st February 1982, page 71 of the Westhead bundle). This theme is often repeated in the answers given to the Committee of Public Accounts. For example, see page 75 of the Westhead bundle:

'Sir Kenneth Stowe. . . . In considering the future settlements within the relevant Whitley machinery of their remuneration we certainly will want to have regard to the fact that they did get this additional sum of money.

The Chairman. But you have no power in that respect?

Sir Kenneth Stowe. We have no power; that will be for negotiation.'"

We must have some semblance of negotiation and agreement if agreement is to be reached. However, earlier there was a statement saying that when the final determination is made — perhaps the Minister will be able to reply on this —

"it can at once be seen that the rates can be altered at any time by a fresh determination, so that the correction of any imbalance is wholly in the hands of the Secretary of State."

The way in which the negotiations take place gives the appearance of agreement. When the Department is behaving properly and is not under the influence of the Treasury, the Prime Minister, or monetarist economic policy, the negotiations leading to determination work well.

The amendments are tabled to cover the case when the Minister is under pressure from outside forces and when the Minister has to attend to economic policies more than we should want. The Minister's first priority should be to achieve the best possible National Health Service.

8.30 pm

The judge says:

"I refer to these samples from the evidence since in my judgment there is no practical or moral blame which can be imputed to the opticians, since they played no part in fixing the rates nor did they ever conceal anything or seek more than was volunteered to them."

I suspect that the fault is with the Ministry and the DHSS rather than with the opticians.

The judge says later:

"First, it does seem to me that this case is not much affected by questions of onus. The applicants are attacking the Secretary of State's determination and Statement. So that to that extent they seek a remedy and would in most cases bear the burden of proving their case. On the other hand, the Secretary of State is admittedly and wholly openly seeking to recover moneys from the opticians, and he cannot do so unless he acts lawfully."

Later the judge says:

"Secondly it is right, as Mr. Bagnall says, that there is an element of retrospection in what the Secretary of State seeks, although the 1984 legislation is not strictly retrospective. And also the direct result of the Secretary of State's action is to take back from the opticians' profession moneys to which they had plain and directly unassailable legal rights.

Unless therefore the Secretary of State has a plain and clear right to act as he seeks to act he should not be allowed to proceed. As a general principle that proposition seems to me to be correct."

It is symptomatic that the Secretary of State seems to think that he has powers to act arbitrarily without considering the merits of the case. This judgment told the Secretary of State that he could not do that. That is why clause 3 is phrased as it is. And that is why amendments Nos. 46 and 49 and new clause 4 were tabled. They attempt to restrict the Secretary of State's power.

The judge goes on:

"Thirdly I am urged to say that the Secretary of State's action is an expropriation or levy or tax, and that special considerations thus apply. But these words are somewhat emotive and this part of the applicants' argument is not in my judgment of great significance."

The judge has accused the Secretary of State of using an element of retrospection in what he seeks to achieve. Can we allow legislation to permit so much freedom to the Secretary of State, especially with the experience in the case to which I have referred?

The judge says that the Secretary of State's action is an expropriation of tax. If that were made known in the press everybody would be appalled. I can imagine what would be said if the Opposiiton Front Bench advocated a policy which allowed a Secretary of State to expropriate such funds. I can imagine what capital Conservatives would make out of that.

I hope that the House will consider seriously what is happening. The judge continues:

"I have already said that in seeking recovery there must be justification for the course taken, and I do not believe that the questions to be answered are helped by comparing the position with that which rules in special fields such as tax, any more than it can or should be decided on a basis of overall fairness . . .Without the help of the 1984 legislation in my judgment there would be no sensible argument for the Secretary of State to advance. Under Regulation 10 of the 1984 Regulations he could simply determine the fees payable and the payments to be made for the relevant services for the future."

It is just as well that we have that legislation, because without it the Minister would have got away with this immoral act of expropriation and retrospection. The judge continues:

"I do not understand Mr. Carnwath to be strongly arguing that without the 1984 Act the Secretary of State could have acted as he did, although I am aware that he did not concede that this was so.

What then is the position as to the 1984 Act? Section 7 adds two Sections respectively to the legislation which governs England and Wales and that which governs Scotland. These Sections are intended to provide (says Mr. Carnwath) a general code for setting fees and remuneration for the professions in the National Health Service, since at present the code provided by current legislation is sketchy.

I am not entitled to enquire why such amendments were necessary or desirable, and I therefore simply consider them as they are.

First I stress that only subsection (4) of Section 7 is at present in force. That subsection provides that 'any determination. . .which was made—

(b) after (the passing of this Act) but before the coming into force of a provision inserted by this section shall be deemed to be validly made if regulations authorising such a determination could have been made had that provision been in force at the time'."

Clause 3 seeks to revert to the previous position so that the Minister would have the power to have a new determination. The provision is couched in slightly different words because there would have to be different information but it is not beyond the wit of any Minister to dig up new information and to claim that the information was different and that therefore he has the power to reopen the determination.

Perhaps I am being too cynical. If that is so, I expect the Minister to show us the colour of his money. He should take on board what I have said and offer to introduce another clause in another place.

The judge goes on:

"All agree that the subsection (and indeed other parts of the Section) are obscure. But I have to attempt to see through that obscurity."

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Read the whole judgment.

Dr. Marek: I would but that would take a long time. I shall continue. The judge says:

"Looking at section 7(3)(7)(a) I am however wholly unconvinced that it allows the Secretary of State to recover these moneys."

He does not use the words "on the balance of probabilities, taking one argument with another I believe that the Secretary of State is allowed to recover these moneys." He says that he is "wholly unconvinced" and that there is no case for the Secretary of State trying to recover such moneys. The reasons he gave were:

"First, I read the subsection simply and solely as an explicit statement that past expenses may be taken into account after taking discounts into account in making a determination for the future. Secondly the subsection allows future trends expressly to be considered. Thirdly the subsection eliminates an argument that some who would not have incurred or will not incur specific expenses are outside the ambit of the determination. These matters are spelt out for the assistance of all concerned.

But in my judgment there is a distinction between 'taking into account' what has happened in the past with a view to fixing rates for the future and thus achieving a fair rate for the future, as compared with recovering sums which the Secretary of State believes to have been 'over-reimbursed'."

The judge is an eminently respectable, responsible and honest person. I think that he was speaking as an average citizen. The crux of the argument lies in the words:

"In my judgment there is a distinction between 'taking into account' what has happened in the past with a view to fixing rates for the future and thus achieving a fair rate for the future, as compared with recovering sums which the Secretary of State believes to have been 'over-reimbursed'."

If a determination is made, it should not be reopened. Powers should not be given to the Minister to reopen the determinations once they have been made, on the pretext of different information. If the Minister has made a mistake he should go voluntarily to the contracting parties and say, "There is a mistake. You are sensible people. Can we agree on a scale of payment in future?" I am quite sure that the contracting parties would agree to that, if he approached them. He should also say to them, "We have made a mistake. I have no intention—in fact, I have no powers—to reopen the determination and cause many problems for people who may have retired and perhaps new entrants into the profession who, therefore, were not affected by the determination." The Minister should say, "The determination has been made. We must do something about it in future. Let us talk and see whether future determinations cannot be dealt with more appropriately." That was the judge's view. That sensible view is shared by myself and my hon. Friends. The judge went on to say:

"Even if I am wrong as to this, and even if the subsection does in terms allow recovery in certain circumstances I am however also convinced that the Secretary of State meets a further insurmountable hurdle.

Section 7(3)(a) allows him to take into account the prescribed matters 'in connection with the provision of services of a kind to which the determination will relate'.

The applicants submit that in this context this cannot possibly allow reduction of sight testing and dispensing fees since the relevant expenses which are being considered simply do not relate to the sight testing and dispensing activities of opticians at all.

In my judgment the supply of appliances is not the provision of services 'of a kind' to which the determination of fees for sight testing and dispensing relate. Broadly the provision of general optical services describes the services provided by opticians, but those services are in my judgment of three kinds, namely sight testing, dispensing, and the supply of appliances."

Later, he said:

"Logically this should also in my judgment be correct since it would surely be unjust to a practitioner dealing solely in sight testing and/or dispensing to recover from him any part of moneys accrued to others in respect of 'unintended profits' gained from the supply of spectacles."

Subsection (5) of clause 3 states:

"If the later determination is of remuneration for a category of services falling within one of the descriptions of services mentioned in section 43A(1) of the 1977 Act or section 28A(1) of the 1978 Act, it is immaterial whether the earlier determination was of remuneration for the same category of services or for any other category of services falling within the same description."

That is another vivid illustration of the Minister trying to have his bread with butter and jam on both sides. He was found wanting by the judge. He was found wanting in terms of ordinary, commonsense action. In a slightly wrapped-up way, he tried to restore his untrammelled powers of freedom that he thought he had and which he was quite prepared to use in acting quite unfairly and immorally. The judge said:

"To some extent this injustice is sought to be alleviated by the provision of a full £8·60 by way of determination of sight testing fees for such practitioners as test sight only. But in my judgment the need for such a distinction highlights the fallacy in the Secretary of State's argument in this respect."

The judge made an important point at the end of his judgment.

"In my judgment there is here an identifiable illegality (in the sense of that word as used by Lord Diplock at p 410 in the case of CCSU v. Minister for Civil Service, 1985, AC p 374) in that the Secretary of State has not acted within his lawful powers in the process of deciding what is the fair determination of fees for sight testing and dispensing. This should in my judgment be subject to control and correction by judicial review and by the imposition of such a declaration as may resolve the problem in this case."

8.45 pm

The judge wants the proper judicial review and control. The Bill does not provide any control whatsoever. It allows the Minister to do what he wants. The intention of new clause 4, amendment No. 46 and amendment No. 49 is to impose some control over the Minister. The judge said:

"I am comforted in my conclusions in this case by a conviction that this result is just, since the opticians played no direct part in fixing the payments for appliances over the relevant years, and if there was fault or failure in the assessment of those payments it was the fault or failure of the DHSS and thus the Secretary of State."

I have referred to other aspects of the procedures within the DHSS which could be at fault and which I suspect were at fault. The Secretary of State takes responsibility for this sorry affair, but it is quite wrong of him to try to get over it by producing a Bill as he has. The judge continued:

"I do however stress that I impute no bad motive to the Department and furthermore there has been no sort of concealment of the full nature of the decision-making process. This has given the applicants the ammunition with which to make their case."

I am pleased that the judge wrote that. It makes me think that the Department was good-natured but incompetent. It was incompetent either because it did not have the manpower to do the sampling and go through the procedures to be able to provide the Minister with the necessary information that certain things were happening, or it did not know about it. The judge seems to think that the Department did know about it but that it failed to carry out efficient administration. In some ways, that is worse than if the Department did not know. I hope that, if that is the case, the Minister will put it right and ensure that the new systems of determination are adequately manned so that they are dealt with in a correct and efficient manner. The judge said:

"It seems to me also just that the loss (if there truly is one) should lie where it falls, upon the shoulders of the taxpayer,"—

we have the Minister to thank for that—

"since otherwise it could well be that a substantial number of opticians or firms which did not benefit from the payments made between 1978 and 1985 might have to meet a share of the recoupment sought by the Secretary of State. If even a few had to pay such sums it would in my judgment be unjust and unfair."

The words which I judge to be important are:

"even if a few had to pay such sums it would in my judgment be unjust and unfair."

Yet the Minister was not only prepared to ensure that a few people paid such sums in such an unfair way but he was prepared to countenance many people paying such sums. Those are the reasons why the two amendments and the new clause have been put down. There is here a clear case showing that one cannot trust Ministers, at every time and in every circumstance, to behave properly. Ministers must try to act fairly and justly. The Minister, for his own reasons, intended to recover money quite unfairly and quite unjustly. An element of retrospectivity was involved. It could even be called expropriation. The Minister was prepared to do that. The judge stopped him.

Now we have clause 3 which, in a different way, would restore these powers to the Minister. Is the House prepared to let the Minister get away with that so that he can act at will? I hope that the House will not allow him to do so. I hope that the Minister, as a reasonable man, will see some sense and say, "Yes, I shall have these powers, but I do not intend to use them unreasonably. I am prepared to think about putting a provision in the Bill—even if I cannot accept the new clause and the amendments—to show everyone that I cannot use these powers at will." Those important points should be borne in mind. I hope that the Minister will see the sense of them.

Mr. Whitney: Mr. Deputy Speaker——

Mr. Campbell-Savours: The Minister had fallen asleep.

Mr. Whitney: I was looking forward to further contributions from a number of supporters of the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek), and I am surprised that they did not meet with favour. It was odd that during the 40 or so minutes during which the hon. Member for Wrexham spoke——

Mr. Corbyn: Fifty-five minutes.

Mr. Whitney: It seemed longer. It was odd that during the 55 minutes of the speech I managed to find one sentence with which the Government would be happy to agree—on the need to strike the right balance and be fair to the contracting professions and to the users of the NHS. The hon. Member for Wrexham seemed to have no concept of the fact that we are talking about taxpayers' money. We are talking about ensuring that that money, which is devoted in ever greater quantities by the Government—since 1979 an increase in real terms of 24 per cent.—to the benefit of the NHS, is used for the benefit of the Health Service and its customers. The hon. Gentleman seems instead to have enlisted on the side of the contracting professions and to have no interest in the proper use of Health Service funds.

We are committed to a fair deal for the contracting professions in the Health Service, and our record shows that. As the hon. Member for Wrexham said, following the 1978 inquiry the Government paid opticians £92 million. I should have thought that it would be difficult to find a more tangible demonstration of the Government's good faith.

The hon. Member for Wrexham inevitably had to recognise that we agreed not to use any new provisions to take into account the opticians' £11 million of what we would call "unintended" profits. The Government's record in determining that that remuneration is on a fair basis has been amply demonstrated. If we went down the road suggested by the hon. Member for Wrexham—no retrospection, and with only one determination being made—there would be a determination after a number of years, which would be retrospective. I cannot believe that the contracting professions would welcome that; nor would it be given a sensible welcome by most hon. Members. We seek a balance between the Government's conflicting duties—most sensible Governments would recognise that—to find a fair deal for the contractors and to find a fair deal for the NHS.

There was no mention of figures, but there was a new-found beneficence to private entrepreneurs. Of course, that is to be welcomed. It was suggested that the Opposition were opening up yet another bottomless pit of public funding, whether for the NHS or for elsewhere. Presumably we would have to add a little bit more to the £24 billion—to which the proposals of the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) add up—for the half-undertakings offered by the hon. Member for Wrexham.

The new clause would add an unnecessary load of bureaucracy to the remuneration system of the contracting professions. There is a strong likelihood that, in practice, there will always be some contractor who does not favour a determination of remuneration for his profession. Therefore, it is likely that every determination would go to a panel as proposed in the new clause.

There is already an independent element in the consideration of remuneration for general medical and dental practitioners, which is provided by the Doctors and Dentists Review Body. There is also the Pharmacists Review Panel, which is available to advise on disagreements arising from negotiations on the pricing of the pharmacist's contract. I remind the House that the Government are fully committed to full negotiations and consultations with the contractor professions' representatives, as appropriate. Sooner or later, such a panel would undermine that negotiation process. For example, the Government and a particular profession might reach agreement on a determination, but an individual contractor might then refer it to the panel and, in turn, the panel might ask the Government to reconsider. What would the Government and the professions' representatives then do? The ensuing uncertainty would be in the interests of no one.

I submit that such a check on the determining authority's decision is clearly unnecessary. Although the remuneration systems of the contract professions are similar in principle, there are significant differences in their operation. This requires, in some cases, an element of flexibility and discretion, which is in the interests of the professions and of the taxpayer. That flexibility is the essence of the arrangements, which on the whole have worked well, and it seems to have escaped the hon. Member for Wrexham.

Amendment No. 46 would remove an important qualifying condition that must be satisfied when previous over or underpayments are corrected in a subsequent payment. The condition reflects the fact that initial payments are based on estimates. The actual figures become available later. This subsection means that corrections can be made only if later information reveals that the earlier estimates, and therefore the earlier payments, were incorrect. The parties may only behave as they would have behaved if later information had been available in the first place. In other words, only the numbers can be changed; the rules of the game cannot be. The removal of this subsection would take away an important safeguard and would appear to confer precisely those arbitrary powers that were feared by hon. Members in our Committee debates.

The same effect would be true of the proposals contained in amendment No. 49. It would remove another important qualifying condition when payments are being adjusted. The subsection gives the Secretary of State—the determining authority—power to take into account the position of new entrants to the service when payments are adjusted to take account of an overpayment in a previous year. This obviously means that remuneration will be lower than it would otherwise have been. This is perfectly fair and reasonable if the people who suffer the deduction have previously enjoyed the benefit of the overpayment. It may not be fair to those people who have joined the service so recently that they did not enjoy the benefit of the overpayment. If the inequity would be of any substance, the Secretary of State might want to make appropriate differential adjustments. This is an important safeguard which it would be most unwise to lose.

On the basis that the hon. Gentleman has failed to make out his case, to understand the system and the need to strike a balance, and to appreciate the need to ensure that the increasing amounts of taxpayers' money that are being devoted to the National Health Service are used properly and responsibly, I invite the House to reject the new clause and the amendments.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: This matter has been brought to the attention of many hon. Members during the last few years. I have received correspondence from local contractors who have expressed concern about the way in which they feel that the Government are imposing their views upon them. If the Minister were to ask his departmental officials to find it, he would be told that correspondence has been received from me which puts their case and sets out to establish some rights on their behalf.

We examined this matter in the Public Accounts Committee during the 1984-85 parliamentary Session. The PAC's 23rd report is entitled "NHS Supplies and Pharmaceutical Price Regulations Scheme, Department of Health and Social Security." I draw to your attention, Mr. Deputy Speaker, the case put by the Pharmaceutical Services Negotiating Committee in a document marked "PAC 88". It contains correspondence of 25 February 1985 from Mr. A. J. Smith, the chief executive, who was writing on behalf of the PSNC. He said that the intention of writing was to set out a brief memorandum that he was copying to the National Audit Office. To some extent, the PAC shadows the National Audit Office, because under the National Audit Act 1983 the Comptroller and Auditor General is now an officer of the House of Commons. Correspondence was sent to him setting out the position.

In his letter of 25 February 1985 Mr. Smith said:

"You will see from the attached NHS remuneration balance sheets that the accrued underpayment on 31st December 1983 amounted to £24·36 million. This was corrected, to a certain extent, during the period ending 31st December 1984 but, even at this stage, there remained £11·95 million underpaid to retail pharmacists."

We are referring, therefore, not to a small amount of money, but to a substantial amount of money that was in contention and about which there has been argument between the Department and the contractors. My hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) has dealt in great detail with the matter, in particular with the legal judgments that were delivered on another but related matter.

That shows that the contractors were faced with an accelerating and developing problem. Mr. Smith continued:

"In the forecast balance sheet for the period 1st April 1985 to 31st March 1986, you will see that the forecast accrued underpayment by 31st March 1986 will amount to £45·9 million."

Again that was an escalating, increasing figure and it was obviously a matter of great concern to the contractors. The letter continued:

"We have, however, concluded an agreement with the Department which will increase 1985/86 remuneration to absorb the whole underpayment and leave a nil balance at 31 March 1986. When I wrote to the right hon. Robert Sheldon on 20th August 1984 I pointed out that on the publication of the Twenty-Ninth report there were certain unfortunate and sensational press comments alleging 'rich pickings'"—

—that is a very interesting term—

"for retail pharmacists by over-reimbursement of drug costs. No mention was made in the Report of the payment owed by the Department to pharmacists because of under-reimbursement of labour and overhead costs."

To what extent did the Government set out to ensure that the truth was known? Did the Department contact the press to put the record straight? Was a press release issued by the Department following this report about rich pickings? Was such a press release circulated to ensure that journalists were made aware of the more accurate picture of remuneration to pharmacists?

When a group of contractors who depend on the Department feel defamed, surely the Department has a responsibility to ensure that the pharmacists' reputation is fully protected. Perhaps the Minister would like to intervene to clarify the position, because I am sure that the contractors would wish to feel assured in case similar developments occur in future. They would like to know that they would be protected, because we have no information about what happened in the past.

Mr. Smith went on to say:

"With the current method of Inquiry, there is an inevitable gap between the date of Inquiry and the finalisation and agreement of the Inquiry results, and it is during this period that over and under-reimbursement occurs. It should be noted that in the Minutes of Evidence—" that is the minutes of evidence of the Public Accounts Committee—

"dated Monday 20th February 1984, it is recorded that 'adjustments have in the past been made to compensate professions for underpayments, at least as often as they have been made to recover payments on behalf of the tax-payer'. I hope that the Public Accounts Committee will include in its deliberations and reports their concern at the magnitude of the underpayments to chemist contractors during recent years and confirm their support for the proposals by both the Department of Health and Social Security and the Pharmaceutical Services Negotiating Committee that annual negotiations are essential so that large imbalances between amounts due and paid in any year do not occur in future. In passing I should mention that one of the major reasons for the current imbalance is the Department's insistence on using Treasury norms for inflation rate forecasts when all the statistical evidence shows that the costs of providing the pharmaceutical service (particularly labour costs) are increasing to a higher rate."

Mr. Smith went on to talk about "Good business acumen." I am sure that that phrase commends itself well to the Government because they repeatedly tell us that they are committed to defending the interests of small businesses, the enterprise culture and the entrepreneurial society. Mr. Smith said:

"Good business acumen and excellent pharmaceutical wholesaler service have enabled pharmacists to achieve great savings in drug costs (currently of the order of 6 per cent.). The whole of this deduction is 'clawed-back' by the Department and currently saves £80 million per annum of tax-payer's money and the cumulative savings, so far, amount to in excess of £300 million for the years 1980-84."

In the words of Mr. A. J. Smith, the chief executive, we have an example of good business acumen and excellent pharmaceutical wholesaler service rewarding the taxpayer with again a windfall of £300 million for the years 1980 to 1984.

Mr. Smith went on to say:

"I am sure you will readily understand the Committee's concern that these efforts of retail pharmacists to reduce drug costs are then referred to as 'rich pickings' in the interim period between the base of the Inquiry and the finalisation and agreement of the Inquiry findings resulting in the clawback. The ongoing savings to the National Health Service are immense and require an equal degree of exposure to public scrutiny."

In his letter Mr. Smith is looking to the Department to ensure that this exposure takes place. I hope that the Minister will take this opportunity to assure the House that in every way every opportunity was used by the Department to ensure that the description "rich pickings", which was attributed to the pharmaceutical contractors, was corrected in favour of what Mr. Smith believes to be the substantial contribution that pharmaceutical contractors have made and the need to illustrate that in press releases and material from his Department.

Mr. Smith said:

"The ongoing savings to the National Health Service are immense and require an equal degree of exposure to public scrutiny. Fairness to both tax-payer and the pharmacist can be achieved by the introduction of a system of continuous monitoring of discounts obtained to which again I would hope that the Public Accounts Committee would lend its support. Business efficiency of pharmacist contractors should be recognised by a proportion of these savings being passed on to the pharmacy contractors" basically, what is being said is, "If we save the taxpayer money we are equally entitled to get a share of that money"

"whereas under the present system"

this is referring to the system operated in 1985 by the DHSS

"the savings in drug costs accrue in totality to the Department of Health and Social Security."

In a written answer on 7 February the then Minister of State said that the Bill was designed "to re-establish beyond doubt the Government's ability, challenged in court proceedings last autumn, to ensure that the remuneration and reimbursement arrangements for all NHS family practitioner services professional contractors are fair to the contractors themselves and to the taxpayer by allowing past overpayments or underpayments to be reflected in future fees."—[Official Report, 7 February 1986; Vol. 91, c. 289-90.]

I think that my hon. Friend was referring—unfortunately, after the meeting of the Public Accounts Committee today and dinner this evening I came in to hear only the latter part of my hon. Friend's glittering speech, which we all found so riveting and interesting—to the court challenge referred to in the judgment of 16 October 1985.

Dr. Marek indicated assent.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Clearly the contractors are not altogether satisfied, and my hon. Friend, in the new clause, is trying to introduce some adjudicating authority to arbitrate between what I might call—I am sure that my hon. Friend will correct me if I am wrong—the warring factions. There is certainly a warring Minister, in the sense that he is out to get them. That appears to me to be the intention behind the Government's position.

I hope that the Minister has taken on board the comments of Mr. A. J. Smith. I am sure that in writing to the Public Accounts Committee he felt that his words would be listened to, and they certainly were. Similarly, I hope that they were dealt with by the Government.

Mr. Maxton: I congratulate my hon. Friends the Members for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) and for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) on their speeches. One of the Government Whips sitting opposite says, "Shortly". I think that he is implying that I should make a short speech. I have every intention of doing so, but the more that I am provoked the longer it is likely to get.

The Bill covers England and Wales and, I hasten to add, Scotland. I am speaking from the Dispatch Box because I am the Labour party's spokesman on health matters in Scotland. The Labour party has taken some interest in the NHS and in the Bill but the Scottish Office Minister with responsibility for health has taken no interest whatsoever. He did not reply to the Second Reading debate, nor serve on the Committee. He was here for about half an hour earlier this evening and it does not appear that he will reply to any debate, although he may just manage to come in to propose one small amendment about dairy companies later in our proceedings. I can assure him that it will be very much later on.

9.15 pm

Which is the determining authority for the prices paid to contractors in the NHS? Given the way in which the DHSS has dragged along the Scottish Office, it is fairly clear that the determining authority will be the DHSS, yet the people who supply services in Scotland are contracted to the Scottish Office. They will almost certainly not be exempt from any attempt to reclaim money. In Scotland the contracting employer will not be determining fees or whether some or all excess profits should be reclaimed.

That is an anomalous position. Labour Members — more than Conservative Members, though I am delighted to see that the hon. Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth) is present — believe that the sooner that we have a system of devolved government for Scotland that allows us to take our own decisions on these matters, the better it will be.

The Minister made great play of saving taxpayers' money and being fair to contractors. I note that the one part of the triangle that he did not mention was the patient. We are all keen to ensure that the Government do not overpay or underpay contractors, but it is hard for us to hear the Government say that they are concerned for the patient when we see what has happened on prescription charges, dental charges and the optical and ophthalmic services.

Equally, it comes hard to me, as the hon. Member for a Glasgow constituency, to hear the Minister talking about a 26 per cent. real terms increase in expenditure on the NHS when I know that the general manager of the Greater Glasgow health board has just made proposals to cut £20 million off the health services. Only three quarters of an hour ago there was a damning indictment in a television programme about the expenditure of that board in Lennox Castle hospital. The Minister should not talk to any Glasgow Member about the NHS receiving more money. There have been massive cuts.

Mr. Michael Forsyth (Stirling): Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that the Greater Glasgow health board is the best-funded health board in the country, receiving £420 per head?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I hope that the hon. Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton) will resist the temptation to move away from the new clause.

Mr. Maxton: I should love to indulge——

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Is my hon. Friend aware that the hon. Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth) has huge private health contracts? Yes, they are declared in the Register of Members' Interests, but they are vast contracts and it is suggested that a series of them with one organisation are worth £80,000 per annum. If that is inaccurate, perhaps the hon. Member for Stirling will deny it in the Chamber.

Mr. Forsyth: That is rubbish.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We must get back to the subject of the debate.

Mr. Maxton: I shall be brief. Of course I knew that. I am well aware of it. Indeed, the Government are vindictive about the Greater Glasgow health board because, despite the fact that it has a Conservative majority, it flatly refuses to privatise any services.

The Government have imposed massive charges on the patient, or user, of those services. Incidentally, I and no doubt many of my hon. Friends have reservations about the whole contractor system within the NHS. In future, we may well want to consider whether that is the best way of ensuring that such services are provided within the NHS. I should like to see much greater direct control of them by NHS management without any contracting out. But the Government believe in the contractor system. They, more than any other Government, have taken us down that road. It seems strange that a Government who want more privatisation and more use of contractors in the NHS can then apparently turn themselves on their heads and create a situation that is unfair within that very system. We argue not that the contractors are always right, and certainly not that the contractor system is the right way of operating, but that, given the system, it must be fair to all those who provide the service.

Under the Bill, the Government can determine a price to be paid to the contractor and in, say, eight years' time can decide that the profits were higher than reasonable. The Government can then reclaim those profits. The problem with that is that they will not always be reclaiming those profits from the contractor who provided the service.

When the idea was first mooted, chemist shopowners in my constituency wrote to me saying that when they bought their shops 18 months ago they also bought the goodwill. However, they did not buy the fact that under the terms set down by this Government, the last owner was paid what the Government considered to be excess profits. The Government are now apparently asking them to repay the money. There is nothing in the Bill to prevent that, and it is unfair.

The price is fixed, with the sole reservation that regard may be had to the number of years involved, and the Minister could say that what was charged was excessive, and that the Government would take back the money. The new clause is very reasonable. We say only that there should be negotiations. The Government should work out, in negotiation with the contractors, exactly what the price should be. Having determined that, they should stick to it. Of course, underpayments and overpayments may be made, but that may be taken into account in later negotiations. If we have an adjudicating body, the price should be right when that decision is taken. That is the point at which it should be done—not at a future date, on a retrospective basis, hitting people who may not have made any money from the deal. It is a grossly unfair clause and we must have a system that is properly negotiated.

The Minister said that negotiations took place. If so, why not build that into legislation? Many sections in Acts state that negotiation should take place, and a similar provision should be included in the Bill. There is no reason why that should not happen.

If the Minister now said that the Government, in another place, would include a provision to allow for negotiation between themselves and the professional bodies, and for an adjudicating body to deal with the decision between them, we should be happy to withdraw our new clause. The Minister made great play of the fact that negotiating machinery existed, so why does he not include it in the legislation? Obviously, the Minister does not intend to respond, and so I urge my hon. Friends to vote for the new clause.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:

Tellers for the Noes:

Question accordingly negatived.

Clause 1

APPLICATION OF FOOD LEGISLATION TO HEALTH AUTHORITIES AND HEALTH SERVICE PREMISES

Dr. Marek: I beg to move amendment No. 2, in page 1, line 9, after 'authority', insert

'or provided by a health authority for the use by health authority staff for residential or other purposes'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this we may take amendment No. 3, in page 1, line 12, after 'the', insert 'user,'.

Dr. Marek: We are uncertain how clause 1 will be interpreted. At the moment, subsection (1)(b) reads:

"premises used by a health authority shall not be regarded as property of or property held on behalf of the Crown."

It is not entirely clear whether a nurses' home is property used by a health authority. It is used by health authority staff. I shall not read out the press stories which appeared under headlines such as:

"Cockroach photographs stun health conference."

"Unsavoury hospital kitchens bring calls for an end to legal immunity."

"Disease carrying pests are taking over hospitals, report says."

"Dirty hospitals to lose immunity."

"Hospital food poisoning report tells of appalling conditions."

According to the British Pest Control Association, the problem has been increasing. The Government have recognised that something must be done and have proposed legislation which will ensure that hospital kitchens and some other places used by health authorities will be subject to food legislation. If food is wheeled along dirty corridors, the food, although not the corridors, will be covered by food legislation. Other buildings owned by the health authority, or perhaps rented by the health authority, will not necessarily be covered by food legislation. It is clear that nurses' homes and places where doctors might live will also be subject to food legislation. I hope that the Minister will be able to accept the amendment.

Amendment No. 3 would alter clause 1 to make it read:

"The appropriate authority may by regulations — (a) provide who is to be treated as the user, occupier or owner of any such premises for any of those purposes".

I hope that the amendment is helpful. Some premises may be not occupied but owned by an authority or somebody else and used by the authority. That is why we think that the word "user" may help.

Nurses' homes are important, and food legislation should undoubtedly apply to them. We are sorry that the Government did not accept that food legislation and health and safety at work legislation should apply to them. Unfortunately, that question has been disposed of previously. It should be absolutely clear that food legislation should apply to such places.

9.45 pm

Mr. Hayhoe: Perhaps I can help the House by saying that the words in clause 1(1)(b)

"premises used by a health authority" cover all the NHS estate and, therefore, include residential premises and premises described by the amendment as:

"provided by a health authority for the use by health authority staff for residential or other purposes."

I am legally advised that the words in the amendment are absolutely covered by those in the Bill.

Regarding amendment No.3, under the food legislation, which it is proposed should be applied to health authorities — that is what lifting Crown immunity will do — requirements are placed on owners and occupiers of premises, not on users. Therefore, it is neither appropriate nor necessary for the user to be designated in any regulations made under clause 1(2)(b).

Those points properly raised by the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) are already covered by the words in the Bill as it stands, so there is no need for the amendments. If they are pressed, I urge the House to reject them.

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): I am grateful for the Minister's comments, because I was worried on reading the Bill and considering the amendments.

Obviously, I bow to the Minister's superior legal advice. Nevertheless, I am extremely anxious that it must be crystal clear that all premises in the ownership and control of any health authority are covered by these measures. The wording had seemed to be ambiguous and I am grateful to the Minister for removing that ambiguity. I trust that what he said will apply when it comes to interpretation by the courts.

I urge my hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) to seek to catch your eye again, Mr. Speaker, not simply to accept the Minister's comments, but to say that he will not press amendment No. 3. Although I have great respect for my hon. Friend, I have been worried about that amendment. It seems to give a considerable amount of discretion to the head of the appropriate authority in defining use and user, which was precisely the sort of discretion that the entire measure was designed to remove by ensuring that health and safety regulations apply to premises owned by health authorities.

There is a possibility that a loophole might be created if amendment No. 3 were to be pursued. However, I trust that, in the light of what the Minister said, that will not be the case and we can be absolutely certain that premises owned by a health authority and used for whatever purpose and by whoever, will be covered by the regulations established. We must be clear on that point, and I hope that that will happen. The impression that I have had from what the Minister has said — I shall read his words carefully in Hansard tomorrow — that the clarity is there and we can be certain of it.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I cannot understand why we have had to wait so long for such a clear statement of intent. Over the past month, there have repeatedly been articles in newspapers and trade union journals setting out the great concern among the membership of trade unions. [Interruption.] Does the hon. Member for Gillingham (Mr. Couchman) wish to intervene? If he does not, perhaps he will contain his pleasure or wrath.

People have been misled, or the Minister is still being ambiguous. I am sponsored by the Confederation of Health Service Employees. I receive no money from the union. Although I am sponsored, all the money is paid to my constituency party and used for serving the community by funding surgeries and an office to which people come with their problems. I retain neither expenses nor any remuneration.

A few weeks ago, in the journal of the Confederation of Health Service Employees, a headline said:

"Minister's pledge on immunity was a sham."

Is this article correct? I would be grateful for the Minister's attention. I hope that he will listen to what I am saying when I make a statement on behalf of the union. I shall read him an article and ask him whether he has anything to qualify what is said. It says:

"Hospital buildings look set to stay on the health and safety danger list despite the Government's pledge to lift crown immunity. A new National Health Service Bill which is supposed to put promises into action will have no effect, a COHSE study revealed. The Bill applies only to hospital kitchens and even then, Minister,s would be left with full power to decide what parts of the law will apply in future. Worse still, fire prevention laws, the Health and Safety at Work Act and the Housing and Rent Acts will not apply to the NHS. COHSE general secretary David Williams described the Government's promise to act as a sham. It had been forced to make a concession because of trade union and public pressure, especially after the deaths at Stanley Royal Hospital, but was hoping no to drop its commitments. 'It looks,' he said, as though the Government want to do the minimum work possible. This still leaves hospitals above the law. David Williams said, 'If crown immunity cannot be justified for hospital food preparation, it cannot be justified for health and safety regulations. It makes little sense to remove the threat of food poisoning but leave patients and staff at risk from deadly dangerous substances like asbestos.' He then pledged COHSE would continue its campaign to persuade the Government to lift crown status in its entirety from health authorities."

From what the Minister is saying, I understand that we and the union have misunderstood the Government's intention. Does my hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) agree with my interpretation of what has been said? I should like the Minister to put the record straight. I shall be referring his comments back to COHSE. I am sure that if the Minister makes it clear and unambiguous, in a way that would be helpful and comprehensible to Health Service workers, the journal would be eager to publish his comments to set the record straight.

Mr. Chris Smith: The Minister referred to the entire NHS estate. Does my hon. Friend agree that that means anything owned by a health authority?

Mr. Campbell-Savours: That is why my hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek), sounded aghast when he replied to the Minister. The Minister made an important statement tonight, although I am sure that these matters were dealt with at length in Committee, where the Minister must have been pressed at length.

Dr. Marek: I am slightly perplexed at what the Minister said. The possibilities are enormous. A health authority might hire or rent premises or have a mortgage. Will such premises be part of the NHS estate? I do not have a legal training so I am not sure. If the point must be made there can be no harm in accepting our proposition.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I presume that the Minister was referring to premises for which the NHS has a responsibility in law, whether the property be freehold, on lease or rented. I assume that the provision is all-embracing and an undertaking to Health Service workers and to the House. The Minister, if he is clear in his response to the article, will achieve much.

Dr. Marek: I do not think that premises for which the NHS or a health authority is responsible are necessarily part of the Health Service estate. I find it difficult to rationalise what the Minister says and what my hon. Friend says.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: My hon. Friend has a subtle understanding of such matters and if anyone in the House were able to differentiate between the various facets of this argument my hon. Friend would be able to do so. I expect a similar subtlety and understanding from the Minister. I am sure that the Minister will wish to confirm that there is a distinction. I thought that he argued that there was no need to distinguish. The matter is all-embracing.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley): If the Bill is passed, it is its provisions that will be the law, not what the Minister says. The Minister spoke with clarity tonight, but his remarks are at variance with the Bill. If the Government think that our suggested words are not appropriate they should attempt to clarify the provision formally, as the Minister did.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: The Minister referred to having the best legal advice. I therefore presume that the Minister's statement meets fully every concern expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike). The Minister would not have given such a firm commitment at the Dispatch Box without having taken the best legal advice because otherwise he would be ridiculed. The Minister would not want that.

In the best sense of comradeship I ask the Minister, please, to reply to the article and to nail anything that he believes to be inaccurate so that Health Service employees are made fully aware of the Government's intentions.

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): The debate might be regarded, in a sense, as having been a little pedantic. The Minister said that all premises within a health authority's control should be covered by the Bill. There is great----

It being Ten o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Business of the House

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, the National Health Service (Amendment) Bill,the Motions relating to Procedure and the Ways and Means Motions in the name of Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour.—[Mr. Lennox-Boyd.]

National Health Service (Amendment) Bill

Question again proposed, That the amendment be made.

Mr. Cohen: There is concern that there could be ambiguity in the Bill. That is the reason why my hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) put down an amendment. He sought to remove any ambiguity and to ensure that all health authority premises are properly covered under the legislation. It is important that there is no ambiguity. There are examples of the courts interpreting a measure in a way peculiar to themselves. The whole idea of the Bill is to ensure that health authorities cannot get away with having premises that are in such a bad condition that patients and staff are put at considerable risk.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham referred to press reports about the abolition of Crown immunity and the necessity to ensure that premises are cleaned properly. My hon. Friend referred to an article entitled:

"Disease-carrying pests are 'taking over' hospitals, report says".

When I looked at the papers I had prepared for the debate, I found that I had that most interesting article in front of me. It stated:

[Mr. Cohen]

"Cockroaches, rats, mice and other disease-carrying pests are 'taking over' hospitals and putting patients' health and lives at risk, the British Pest Control Association said yesterday."

That was in September last year. The association made the case for more spending on pest control.

Mr. Corbyn: Is my hon. Friend aware that in a number of borough council areas, where rate-capping has been imposed, there has been a restriction on the number of pest control officers who can be employed by the relevant local authority? If such restrictions continue, there will be a risk to health, because the inspectors will not be available to find out where the pests are.

Mr. Cohen: That is a good point. That is one of the effects of the rate-capping penalties on local authorities. Great pressure has been placed on environmental health officers, who do an excellent job in my constituency. Local authorities are under great pressure because they are being squeezed by the Government's cuts. Very little money is spent on direct pest control. Despite the enormous problems, according to the British Pest Control Association, only £800,000 is spent on pest control. That must be regarded as inadequate.

In the same article, attention was drawn to a survey of 360 nurses conducted by Nursing Mirror last summer. That showed that 88 per cent. of the nurses surveyed had seen cockroaches in their hospitals, 53 per cent. had seen rats or dead mice, and 51 per cent. considered their hospital unclean. That is an atrocious comment on health authority premises and hospitals by those who work in them.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Crawley): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it is an appalling indictment of those who work in those kitchens that they allow them to be so disgraceful?

Mr. Cohen: I shall come to the reasons why conditions have worsened. The Government have had to be dragged screaming in to introduce provisions to remove Crown immunity. They came forward with this legislation only after the Stanley Royd disaster.

Mr. Corbyn: Is my hon. Friend aware that many NHS employees are angry about the cheap way in which many Conservative Members have treated the outcome of the Stanley Royd report? The problems in many hospitals have nothing to do with the workers employed in them but everything to do with expenditure cuts and inadequate management in the NHS. I know from personal experience that on many occasions catering workers in hospitals have pointed out the dangers to health caused by inadequate control and Crown immunity with respect to hospital kitchens. Does my hon. Friend agree that the Government should address themselves to the need for the strictest control on all pests in hospitals and for an examination of management structures to ensure that patients and workers do not suffer from or are not held responsible for the existence of pests in hospitals?

Mr. Cohen: That is an excellent point and a direct answer to the intervention by the hon. Member for Crawley (Mr. Soames). I thought at one stage that my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) was trying to steal the rest of my speech, but I think that I shall get by.

I was referring to the survey of nurses who had seen the grossly unsatisfactory conditions in their hospitals as a danger to them and their patients. That is why it is vital to remove any ambiguity in the Bill, and why the amendment is right.

There has been an important victory in the wake of the Stanley Royd disaster and the pressure by my right hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley), who introduced a Bill to remove Crown immunity. The Government have responded to the pressure.

Mr. Bob Clay (Sunderland, North): Have they?

Mr. Cohen: That is right. The purpose of the amendment is to ensure that they keep to their word.

It is a matter not just of removing Crown immunity but of providing resources to increase standards of cleanliness in hospitals. Wholesale privatisation of cleansing and catering services in the NHS is making conditions worse. Less cleaning is being done and standards have been lowered because of privatisation.

Dr. Marek: My hon. Friend has made a valid point. Even if the amendment does not succeed and the Minister is right about there being no doubt and nurses' homes being subject to food legislation, substantial extra expenditure will be needed. No doubt my hon. Friend the Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen) has read the preamble, which, under the heading "Financial Effect", states:

"Clause 1 has no implications for public expenditure."

I cannot understand how the Government can square that with lifting Crown immunity, albeit only with respect to food legislation.

Mr. Cohen: My hon. Friend has,as always, made a telling point.

To remove Crown immunity would be only a token. If an individual or union takes a health authority to court and the health authority has to pay damages, those damages will have to be paid for out of its existing budget. That can only mean cuts in the health services that are provided. The Government are blind if they believe that there will be no expenditure implications. The hospitals will remain dirty and in a bad condition unless the Government provide health authorities with resources to get on with the job.

My hon. Friend was right when he said that it is a question not only of resources but of management in the health authorities. The introduction of business-style management has led to chaos in recent weeks. I have spoken to local trade unions about conditions in my local hospital. They are very worried about the standard of management. More and more assistant managers are being appointed, at high salaries, but those who have to provide the catering in hospitals and keep them clean are suffering immensely from the cuts in the number of hours that they work and in the number of jobs. The result is that their morale is very low and that standards have deteriorated.

As for the implications of the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974, NUPE has already condemned the Bill's provisions as not going anywhere near far enough. It says that the removal of Crown immunity should be extended to premises covered by the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act and that sufficient resources should be made available to the National Health Service to meet the new burdens that have been imposed by the 1974 Act and by the laws relating to food hygiene.

NUPE makes the telling point that in the past the Government have always expected health authorities to provide resources for health and safety from within their existing budgets and that no extra resources have been provided to help the NHS to meet its obligations under the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act. That must be wrong. If this Bill is to mean anything, we must remove any ambiguity in the wording and ensure that it covers all premises. The Government must accept the resource implications and provide money for the health authorities so that they can get on with the job and ensure that all health authority premises, in the interests of both patients and staff, are completely clean.

Mrs. Clwyd: My hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) asked the Minister about the financial effects of lifting Crown immunity. It cannot be true that clause 1 has no public expenditure implications. If the Minister is serious about what he said, there are expenditure implications for the Health and Safety Executive. If the health and safety inspectors are to investigate the conditions in hospitals and other National Health Service premises, there must be an increase in the staff of the Health and Safety Inspectorate.

When we debated the Gas Bill we found that there were financial implications because the required increase in the number of Health and Safety Inspectorate staff. Earlier I made the point that since 1979, when the Government came to power, there has been a 15 per cent. decrease in the Health and Safety Inspectorate. Over the same period its staff has fallen by 13 per cent. The gas privatisation Bill alone will place a considerable extra strain on the depleted staff of the Health and Safety Executive, and now the executive is to be given additional burdens. We agree with those burdens being placed on the executive, but they have implications for public spending, because in order to meet its commitments the inspectorate must have extra inspectors.

It is interesting to look at the issue of Crown notices, because the statistics that are available show the reluctance of the inspectors to issue Crown notices without legal backing. In 1978 no Crown improvement notices were issued, and only three Crown prohibition notices were issued. In 1979, 12 Crown improvement notices and four Crown prohibition notices were issued. In 1980 the ratio was 24 to five; in 1981 it was 93 to 6; in 1982 it was 79 to 15; and in 1983 it was 38 to 10. Those figures were given in answer to a parliamentary question put down by one of my hon. Friends.

It is not a straightforward matter to draw comparisons between different industries, but it is difficult to believe that the health services are so safe that only 43 Crown prohibition notices were needed in six years. Many more notices were issued to private industry during the same period. That must say something about the strength of the inspectorate, because in 1978 industry was issued with 12,217 improvement notices and 3,434 prohibition notices. In 1979, 13,517 improvement notices and 3,674 prohibition notices were issued. In the last year for which figures are available for private industry, there were 12,784 improvement notices and 3,221 prohibition notices.

The inspectors are unable to police factories sufficiently and will not be able to do anything about National Health Service premises without a considerable increase in staff. I hope the Minister will tell us how much he expects the staff of the Health and Safety Executive and the inspectorate to increase. In February the Secretary of State for Energy told us in the Committee on the Gas Bill that there would have to be an increase in staff in the Health and Safety Executive and the inspectorate to deal with gas privatisation. He was unable to tell us how many extra people would be needed. That increase will involve public expenditure, and I should like the Minister to tell us how he expects Crown immunity to be lifted on NHS premises without implications for public spending. It is clearly nonsense to say that there are no such implications. I hope that he will answer that question, because unless the staff of the Health and Safety Executive and the inspectorate are increased, the promises that he has made will be null and void and worthless.

Mr. Corbyn: I should first declare an interest, in that I am sponsored in the House by the National Union of Public Employees, which has a substantial membership of well over 250,000 people employed within the NHS. The way that Crown immunity has applied to the detriment of the interests of our members who work in NHS premises, particularly in the catering departments, has been a matter of great concern to the union.

I am one of the Members of the House who have spent a great deal of time visiting hospital kitchens over the past years when I have been involved in disputes that kitchen employees have had, and I have often been in deep discussions with them about the standards of management, hygiene and cleanliness that apply in NHS kitchens. Within those places there is a wealth of manual workers' experience which has often come from outside the NHS. They are people who have been employed in the hotel and catering trade and in educational establishments, and they are well accustomed to the operation of the food hygiene regulations. They are often appalled at what they find in NHS catering establishments. I have seen cockroaches, mice, rats and all manner of things running around in NHS hospital kitchens.

What is incredible is that it has taken until now for the Government to do something about it. They could have done something about it in the past. Merely altering the regulations about Crown immunity does not of necessity solve the problem, as my hon. Friend the Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) adequately pointed out. She said that we need costings from the Government to show how they will fund that change, and that is important. Even if Crown immunity is lifted completely tomorrow, which the Bill does not do, the problem will not be solved. The environmental health departments of all the local authorities are already inadequately staffed and unable to meet the demands upon them of inspecting dangerous structures and dirty kitchens in restaurants and workplaces. If they are now to be asked, as they must be, to inspect all the hospitals concerned, they will need the resources to do it.

When the Minister finally comes to reply to this important debate, I hope that he will tell us what discussions he has had with the Secretary of State for the Environment about ensuring that in the forthcoming year the rate support grant settlement takes account of the needs of local authorities for the new responsibilities that will be thrust upon them.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: And the Treasury.

Mr. Corbyn: The Treasury, too, as my hon. Friend points out, which will have to fund these things. The Government do not seem to have begun to think about the problems that they are about to meet.

Mr. Chris Smith: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is not simply the rate support grant settlement that matters, but the way in which the grant-related expenditure assessments are calculated, the way in which targets and penalties are operated, and the way in which rate limits are calculated for those authorities which are subject to limitations under the Rates Act 1984? It is the entire paraphernalia of the control of local government expenditure which the Government have introduced, which operates in such a malign way on the services which are provided by local government, which matters.

Mr. Corbyn: My hon. Friend is correct. As he and I represent the same borough, we are both faced with the terrible problem of the way in which our inner urban area has been treated by the Government. All that we can look forward to in the next 10 years is a 15 per cent. cut in real terms in health expenditure in the borough of Islington. The same applies in inner city areas all over the country. At the same time, local authority finance is being cut so that they are unable even to provide the social services back-up. My hon. Friend was right to point out that what we are speaking of this evening is part of a wider issue. The two amendments that we are discussing say that we should insert:

"provided by a health authority for the use by health authority staff for residential or other purposes".

That is an important addition.

There is an enormous loophole. I do not know whether the Minister is aware of the organisation of NHS premises, but it seems to me that if our amendments are not passed and a hospital catering department is based, not within the hospital building but in nearby premises, is might not be covered by the Bill. I should be grateful if the Minister would say whether my view is correct. I have dealt with the NHS for a long time, and I know that it is good at finding loopholes.

Amendment No. 3, which would insert the word "user", is particularly important. I am not sure how the Bill will affect the use of buildings by private contractors after the privatisation of NHS catering departments. I should be happy if the Minister would assure us that there will be no more privatisation of catering departments, but will he at least give us an assurance that private contractors will not be able to evade the regulations by privatising a catering department or sub-letting it to third contractor?

I read in the papers today that one health authority is to consider allowing an American company to come here and build and run a hospital for the authority. I want to make sure that that company will be made to abide by the strictest possible regulations on food hygiene and kindred matters.

It is important to consider the background of the problems that hospital kitchens have faced for a long time. Many hon. Members have referred to conditions in hospital kitchens and the presence of pests, and I have witnessed many of the problems at first hand. The Guardian Summary of 27 August last year reported the results of a survey into NHS facilities. It said:

"Health service hospitals where dirty kitchens and infestations of cockroaches, rats and mice were commonplace should lose their immunity to prosecution, according to the vast majority of nurses taking part in a survey. More than 93 per cent. responding to a Nursing Mirror survey believe that Crown immunity, which prevents an NHS hospital being taken to court should be removed."

Those nurses have an enormous commitment to the NHS. The article says that the survey made clear

"the scale and the range of health and safety hazards which exist in hospitals. More than half the 360 nurses questioned believed that their hospitals were not clean. 53 per cent. had seen rats and mice, including 96 nurses reporting sightings in the wards. 36 had seen vermin in the kitchens. More than 88 per cent. had spotted cockroaches or other pests, mainly in wards, kitchens, bathrooms and corridors."

The article goes on to describe what is happening in our hospitals. There is a clear and urgent need to end Crown immunity.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) said when he quoted from a speech by the general secretary of COHSE, the Bill does not solve the problem. It is supposed to end Crown immunity and ensure that NHS hospitals will be safe places, but it applies only to hospital kitchens, and even then Ministers will be left with full powers to decide which parts of the law will apply in future. Worse still, other health and safety legislation, such as the fire prevention laws, the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act 1974 and Housing and Rent Acts will still not apply to the NHS.

We have a mess before us. There are loopholes affecting food and hygiene legislation and the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act. A number of disasters have occurred in NHS hospitals. The worst was the Stanley Royd disaster, but many others like it could happen again, because the legislation does not solve the problem.

10.30 pm

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): It is not the removal of Crown immunity that will clean up the kitchens. Surely the kitchens will be cleaned up if kitchen staff are given the resources with which to provide an adequate service. My hon. Friend would like to stress that point, would he not?

Mr. Corbyn: Indeed, my hon. Friend is correct. As has been pointed out, it is no good passing regulations unless people are empowered to carry them out. Anyone who experienced the long-lost, unlamented operation of the Factories Acts prior to the introduction of the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act 1974 would know that they were nothing more than a joke. I have direct experience of that. If a shop steward in a factory told the management that some machinery was dangerous and that he was going to call in the factory inspector, there would be a hollow laugh. People would know when the factory inspector was coming, because the yellow lines would be neatly painted in the factory and extra cases of wine would be imported. The problems were not solved. There should have been people who were empowered to go into factories on a day-to-day basis to do something about the dangers of the Factories Acts.

A Labour Government introduced the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act, which made an enormous improvement, but unless there is back- up, and unless there is an inspectorate to deal with transgressions of the regulations and the staff in hospitals to deal with unhygienic kitchens, the problems will remain. The Government think that they have solved the problems. They think that they were getting a lot of bad publicity because of the existence of Crown immunity. However, in reality they have done nothing to solve those problems, and they will remain with us for a long time.

I hope that the Minister understands the point and that he will go tonight to one of any number of hospitals in London——

Mr. Ron Davies (Caerphilly): Tonight?

Mr. Corbyn: Well, perhaps not tonight. The Minister may be detained in the Chamber a little longer than that, but there is no reason why he should not pop along in the morning, just as staff have finished cooking breakfast in the hospitals, and have a good look at what is going on in those kitchens.

People should not be shocked, but unfortunately they are, because they do not know the facts, and automatically believe that hospital kitchens are safe places. Workers in the NHS and ancillary staff employed in hospital catering departments feel very passionately about this subject. They feel that the media have misused the issue and cast a slur on their desire to ensure that patients are treated properly and that the food is cooked hygienically. They have often protested about management's lack of attention to such matters and about the lack of resources. They see the abolition of Crown immunity as one step towards providing patients with the standard of catering that they deserve.

That is why those people are worried about the numerous loopholes in the legislation. I would be far happier if, instead of discussing the limited abolition of Crown immunity on some NHS premises, we were discussing the abolition of Crown immunity altogether. It is anachronistic that in a supposedly democratic country the Crown can declare whole areas, including the House, immune from certain laws. The only immunity that we should retain is the right of hon. Members to speak freely in the Chamber without fear of being prosecuted for what they say.

Mr. Maxton: That immunity has nothing to do with Crown immunity. It is a privilege won by Members of Parliament that has nothing to do with the Crown.

Mr. Corbyn: That privilege was gained against the wishes of the Crown. Immunity from the law is bequeathed by the Crown, in the interest of the Crown. That is why we should be debating wider issues.

Be that as it may, and I do not wish to be dragged away from the subject before us, I hope that the House will understand the strong feelings about this issue and accept the Opposition amendments. They are important amendments, but they do not solve the problem. The Government have not come clean on this matter. Either they do not understand the issue of hygiene in NHS hospitals, or they are trying to con the public into believing that once the Bill has been passed all the problems of hygiene will be solved. I assure the House that they will not, and it will take a Labour Government to introduce proper NHS legislation that will end this ridiculous anachronism whereby NHS property can adopt inferior standards to those that apply to properties owned by local government or private concerns.

It is most important that the House agrees to these amendments this evening. It is also important that the House realises that the Bill is limited in nature.

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth): I shall make a brief contribution — [Interruption.] It is all very well for Opposition Members to jeer, but I wonder how many of them have spent two years in hospital as I have. During that time I did not catch any bugs or diseases from the kitchens. Opposition Members do a great disservice to the thousands of people throughout the United Kingdom who work in hospital kitchens. Only a few let the side down, while thousands do a good, dedicated job.

The most annoying part of Opposition speeches was the suggestion yet again that by shoving money into certain areas the problems would be solved. It does not cost money to be clean, to put the lid on the soup, to pick up droppings in the kitchen or to put the lid on the dustbin outside so as not to attract vermin. Why should we always put in resources——

Mr. Maxton: The hon. Gentleman is putting words into the mouths of Opposition Members that are not correct. We fully support those who work in the cleaning and other areas of the NHS. Indeed, we condemn this Government for ensuring that they are the lowest paid workers in the country. Many of those hard-working conscientious people have to work in appalling conditions, where the kitchens are insanitary because of the state of the equipment in them. It is nothing to do with the work force.

Mr. Dickens: The hon. Gentleman appears to be suggesting that if I visited a private or council house and found the kitchen dirty, shovelling in money would somehow make it sparkling clean.

Although the hon. Gentleman has clearly stated that the Opposition support those who work in hospital kitchens, I heard Opposition Members condemning what was happening in kitchens. One hon. Gentleman claimed that he had visited many hospitals — and I have no reason to disbelieve that — and said that he had seen vermin and cockroaches. I suggest that such instances are, thank goodness, fairly isolated. Opposition Members have done a great disservice to those who work in NHS kitchens and they should be ashamed of themselves.

Mr. Corbyn: This is an important and serious issue and it seems that the hon. Gentleman has not understood exactly what we have been trying to say. No Opposition Member has condemned NHS kitchen workers or the conditions that they maintain within them. The hon. Gentleman should realise that the design of a modern hospital often provides perfect breeding grounds for mice and cockroaches, for example, within the central heating system. It is not the kitchen staff's responsibility to clean the central heating system. It is the management's responsibility to ensure that cockroaches are not breeding in it. It is the local authority's responsibility to ensure, through the environmental health service, that the source of the vermin is removed. Members of kitchen staff often say to me, "It is not good enough to put the lid on the saucepan to keep out the mice if the mice are in the larder in the first place."

Mr. Dickens: Is the hon. Gentleman suggesting that maintenance workers should keep the central heating system clean? That is what we are arguing about. Nothing will be gained by throwing ratepayers' money into a bottomless pit. Money does not solve every problem, and every hon. Member knows that without me having to remind him.

It has been said that more resources will be needed for local government so that hospitals can be inspected. How are shops, restaurants and public houses inspected? They are subject to spot checks or random visits. That same system would apply to the hospital service. Every now and again spot checks would be made and that would keep the entire service on its toes. If there were defects in the kitchen and these had to be put right, funds would be found from the hospital's maintenance budget, as it would for other maintenance work throughout the hospital service.

It is easy to criticise the Government for not responding to the cry for more resources on every occasion when in many instances the answer lies in maintaining higher standards of hygiene and employing good management techniques, which would not involve spending a ha'penny more.

Mr. Corbyn rose——

Mr. Dickens: I have finished.

Mr. Ron Davies: The contribution of the hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens) was a disgrace to himself and the interests that he pretends to represent. It demonstrated all the prejudice, malice and ignorance that characterises the Government and Conservative Back Benchers, who support them.

I ask the hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddlesworth two questions. He was quick on his feet to tell us that he had spent two years in hospital, but he did not tell us what treatment he was receiving. He did not tell us either whether he was in a National Health Service hospital. I invite the hon. Gentleman in a moment to answer those questions. It is obvious that the hon. Gentleman is now deep in thought pondering his answer to me.

If the hon. Gentleman is so complacent about the standards that apply in the NHS and so satisfied that all that is needed in the NHS is a little extra bit of spit and polish and some more sweat from the brows of NHS workers, why is he voting in support of the Government this evening? I invite the hon. Gentleman to answer my questions before I move on to other matters.

Mr. Dickens: I spent two years in Edgware general hospital, which was then called Redhill hospital, with infantile paralysis, which is now called poliomyelitis. It was an NHS hospital and it was spotless, I must tell you, because care was taken. You know that care does not cost money.

Mr. Davies: I hesitate to intervene in the personal dialogue between the hon. Gentleman and yourself, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will give us the whole of his medical history and tell us on how many occasions he has been in hospital over the past 10 or 15 years and how often he has been in NHS hospitals. No doubt he will tell us whether he is a subscriber to——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I hope that the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies) will not tempt the hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens) to go out of order, as he is doing.

Mr. Davies: I do not wish to be distracted by the hon. Gentleman, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and I accept your stricture. I shall return to the amendments.

10.45 pm

I should like to address myself to two points. First, when the Minister replied to the opening speech by my hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek), he said that the provision would apply to the entire National Health Service estate. [Interruption.] I realise that Ministers are possessed of many talents, but I have yet to meet one who is capable of replying to a debate to which he has paid no attention. It may be of interest to the House to know that throughout the debate, the Minister has paid no attention to any of the comments of or questions asked by my hon. Friends, and is now busy chatting to one of the Government Whips. Presumably he has no interest in the debate, and has little intention of listening to any of the questions. I am glad to see that he has now put his head back in his file. Presumably the House now has his attention.

During the opening part of his speech, the Minister referred to the entire NHS estate. I am trying to work out exactly what that means. First, let us assume that we have an NHS hospital, which, under the direction of the Government, is in the process of privatising some or all of its services. Let us assume that during the process of privatisation, the area health authority decides that it is appropriate to set aside part of the NHS premises for use by a private contractor. At what point during the time scale, from when the hospital is under NHS management to when it ultimately becomes part of the private sector, will the provisions cease to apply?

Secondly, let us assume that the area health authority, or hospital management, sublets premises—the laundry, which was formerly part of the NHs hospital, or the kitchen, which has equally far-reaching implications—to a private interest, a private contractor. The Minister referred to the entire NHS estate. Does he agree that when part of an NHS hospital is privatised, the provisions will no longer apply? It is a specific point. I hope that the Minister will address it when he replies.

A further point impinges on the ruling of Mr. Speaker. I do not wish to challenge it, but I seek clarification. I am not sure whether the clarification should come from you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, or from my hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham. We are dealing with two amendments, Nos. 2 and 3. I want to work out, either with your assistance, Mr. Deputy Speaker, or that of my hon. Friend, the essential difference between those two amendments.

As I understand it, amendment No. 2 is specific. It provides for the insertion in line 9, page 1, after "authority", of the words:

"or provided by a health authority for the use by health authority staff for residential or other purposes."

I think that all of us can understand the wording of that amendment. It could mean a residential hospital or teaching block, or any other premises provided by the health authority for use by its staff. That is clear and specific. It refers to staff employed by the NHS in services directly involved with or ancillary to the hospital. Nevertheless, they are employees of the NHS.

Amendment No. 3 is different. It requires the insertion in line 12 of the word "user" after the word "the". A user does not necessarily have to be an employee or someone who is directly involved with the services provided by the hospital. It does not have to be someone who is employed by the hospital, either directly in medical care, in ancillary work, or in any other service provided by the hospital. It might be someone whose work is related and who might come into conflict with the health authority. I think, for example, of community health councils.

When the community health council in my area was established it used premises provided by the area health authority. The office was established by the Secretary of State for Wales, and it was deemed appropriate for area health authority premises to be made available for use by the secretary of the community health council. In no circumstances could premises which, as amendment No. 2 suggests, are be deemed to include users such as community health councils.

Mr. Chris Smith: I have followed by my hon. Friend's argument with considerable care. He will be aware that I have expressed some reservations about amendment No. 3. My hon. Friend has, to some extent, changed my mind, however. Does he agree that he is identifying the possibility that the discretion given by amendment No. 3 could enable a health authority to expand the definition of user? I was anxious that it might exclude some users, but my hon. Friend has said that it might be used to include extra users and that it might therefore be useful.

Mr. Davies: That is an important point and emphasises the importance of getting the legislation right. It is all very well for the Government to say that the intention is quite clear, but it is a matter for interpretation by the judiciary and it is our constituents—not those of Conservative Members, who opt out of the NHS and into private health care—who will suffer.

My hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) said that he has reservations about amendment No. 3. He is right. We do not know what it could do. I am inclined to support it because it will empower the Minister to include users who might otherwise be excluded.

Mr. Corbyn: My hon. Friend has touched on an important matter. The Government seem increasingly to introduce permissive legislation which gives Ministers enormous rein on where regulations should apply. Does he agree that it would be much better to have something clear which proviced that there was to be no Crown immunity in any NHS property of any sort, rather than this mishmash of half-baked ideas?

Mr. Davies: I welcome my hon. Friend's comments. As a matter of principle, I agree with him. Abolition of Crown immunity would be the end of the problem. In the absence of abolition, if the Government want to introduce permissive legislation, I am prepared to welcome it, provided that I am satisfied that the Government are well motivated. That is the problem, and in these circumstances I am not satisfied that the Government are well motivated. I suspect that, rather than using the discretion available to extend the powers, they will use it to restrict the provisions.

My hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) spoke of his reservations. As I understand it, at the end of the debate we shall not be offered the opportunity to vote on amendment No. 2 because Mr. Speaker, in his wisdom, has decided that amendment No. 3 will be taken with it. I do not wish to challenge that ruling and, indeed, it would be wrong to do so, but that decision puts some of my hon. Friends in an invidious position. While I accept the logic of it and appreciate that the amendments have been put together, some of my hon. Friends will be more than happy to support amendment No. 2 but would have reservations about supporting amendment No. 3.

During the rest of the debate could you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, ponder the wisdom of putting amendments Nos. 2 and 3 together? I wonder whether my hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham will consider whether it is to the advantage of the House to take them separately. Even on the Government side there may be some hon. Members who are prepared to support either amendment No. 2 or amendment No. 3 but who would not necessarily agree that both amendments can be disposed of on the same vote. I await with interest your ruling on that.

I look forward to hearing whether my hon. Friend supports my contention that the two amendments offer the House something different and that there is a strong case for voting separately on them.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We are debating amendments Nos. 2 and 3 together, and clearly that cannot be altered as we are well into the debate. However, I shall consider the possibility of a separate Division on amendment No. 3 when the House has reached a conclusion on amendment No. 2, and give my decision in due course.

Mr. Corbyn: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Further to that advice, I hope you will be aware that many hon. Members would be grateful if you could allow a separate vote on these two amendments.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have said that I shall consider that. When we come to a decision on amendment No. 2 I shall consider the possibility of allowing a separate Division on amendment No. 3.

Mr. Clay: This has been a most interesting debate on an extremely important matter. However, I am becoming confused and worried that something fishy is going on.

Some time ago the Minister gave what in my innocence, appeared to be a clear statement which seemed to meet what the Opposition are seeking to achieve through amendment No. 2. Since then some of my hon. Friends have spoken, including my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) who read out some criticisms made by the COHSE journal. He asked the Minister to say whether those criticisms were misinformed because he was sure that COHSE members would be delighted to receive that information because the matter would be cleared up.

My hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) said that he welcomed the Minister's assurances, but wanted to be clear that there was no room for doubt. Many Labour Members have made similar remarks. I know that my hon. Friends are anxious to make progress on the Bill. Other important matters need to be discussed. I assume that the Government do not want to be here all night discussing the amendment.

I started to ask myself why, when all that the Minister has to do is to repeat his clear assurance and say that all the doubts that we are expressing are because we have misunderstood the matter, this has not happened. A simple way to proceed would be for the Minister to say that the Government will accept the amendment. That would be the end of the matter.

Mr. Chris Smith: Does my hon. Friend agree that, even if the Minister is not prepared to take the sensible course of accepting the amendment, he could make clear what he means by "the entire NHS estate"? Does he mean everything that is owned, rented or in the control of the NHS or any health authority, or does he mean something different? An answer would clarify the matter once and for all.

Mr. Clay: That is a good point.

Mr. Ron Davies: For the past two and a half hours, there has been no representative of either the Liberal party or the SDP present in the Chamber. Is my hon. Friend trying to put a new mantle around his shoulders—that of being the representative of moderate consensus politics?

Mr. Clay: I am trying to be the representative of decent common sense. That has not been shown by either side of the so-called alliance. No doubt it is because we have been having a common sense discussion tonight that no alliance representatives have been around.

A number of specific points have been raised and questions put that the Minister could have clarified. For example, what did he mean by "the entire NHS estate"? Hon. Members have asked whether this includes NHS property that has been leased to a private contractor. There has been no Government response.

Mr. Corbyn: Would my hon. Friend care to reflect on the fact that unless the Minister is prepared to be clear on this subject, the NHS administration, if it were so minded, could get away from the so-called removal of Crown immunity by leasing the property to a private company to do the work for it, and then buying that product—for example, catering? That could lead to a serious infringement of the will of Parliament.

Mr. Clay: My hon. Friend has identified an extremely sinister possibility. That is why it is all the more important that we have an absolute and unequivocal assurance from the Minister to clarify what he said earlier.

We are all anxious to make progress. The longer this goes on, with the Minister refusing to clarify his interesting remark, which came as a great surprise no doubt not only to Labour Members but to NHS workers and everybody else interested in the matter, the more confusing the matter will become. For a few minutes, my hon. Friends wondered whether we had made a great step forward and scored a small victory. Is this a major concession? As time goes on I worry more and more about what the Minister said. He said that he was acting on the best legal advice and that the Bill covered our suggestion in the amendment. I do not know what his best legal advice was. Perhaps it was the same legal advice as was given to the Secretary of State when he tried to introduce regulations for board and lodging allowance. DHSS Ministers have fallen on the wrong side of the courts more than once. One must assume that Ministers act only after having taken legal advice.

Mr. Ron Davies: The Minister certainly cannot have sought the Solicitor-General's advice. If he had, it would have been leaked by letter.

Mr. Clay: How does one follow that?

I wonder about legal advice. What about the legal advice given to the Secretary of State for Transport on legislation that he has tried to introduce? He has been through the courts more times since the general election than all Opposition Members put together. That is going some.

We must ask what the Minister means by saying that he has had the best legal advice. What he says from the Dispatch Box is no protection for anyone who finds that that best legal advice is wrong. If the Minister makes a fool of himself, that will be of little comfort to the person who finds that the best legal advice does not achieve the objectives of our amendment. We are so used to Ministers making fools of themselves that, when they do, it is of little public interest.

Mr. Brian Sedgemore (Hackney, South and Shoreditch): My hon. Friend says that the Minister was saying, hypothetically, that on the basis of legal advice we might be about to take a great step forward. Then he paused and rethought and said that, hypothetically, on the basis of the Minister's legal advice, we might be experiencing a small but significant victory. Can my hon. Friend tell me, hypothetically, what is the difference between a great step forward and a small but significant victory?

Mr. Clay: I have no legal training, and that was a legalistic question. If I were to stray into that fascinating semantic issue, I might incur the Chair's displeasure. It is not for me to divine such matters or to work out exactly what the Minister was trying to tell us. The Minister should answer all worries expressed by my hon. Friends since he made that interesting statement.

Mr. Cohen: One thing that the Minister did not say was that he had taken the best legal advice about the amendment. If he had asked his legal experts about the amendment, they might have said that it was more watertight than the provision in the Bill.

Mr. Clay: That is an extremely useful suggestion which, even at this late stage, the Minister could take up. It might save a lot of time and serve the purpose that the Minister is trying to achieve if he were to accept the amendment. I hope that the Minister will do so. It would enable us to make progress.

As one who must take into account pessimistic possibilities, bearing in mind the kind of Government with whom we are dealing, I address a few words to my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Front Bench. One or two Labour Members have commented on the difficulties regarding a vote on amendments Nos. 2 and 3. My right hon. and hon. Friends on the Front Bench—indeed, all hon. Members—must decide whether they are satisfied with the assurances that the Minister has given about amendment No. 2.

One can envisage circumstances, both in the Chamber and in Committee, in which, on the basis of the Minister's assurances, the Opposition would not press an amendment to a vote. In the light of the comments made in the past few hours and the extraordinary prolonged silence of the Minister, the right hon. Gentleman will need to take quite a long time to satisfy Labour Members that what he said was as simple as it seemed to be in order for them not to press amendment No. 2 to a Division.

Mr. Maxton: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I listened carefully to my hon. Friend's interesting and good speech. However, it was disrupted at the end by constant conversations by Conservative Members. Those hon. Members obviously believe that a vote is about to take place. They think that if they come into the Chamber and make that sort of noise, somehow or other the vote will take place earlier. I assure them that their behaviour will extend the debate, because there will be further points of order about their behaviour. I hope that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, will ask them to remove themselves to the various parts of the House where they can carry on conversations without interrupting the debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Discussion is going on both inside and outside the Chamber. I hope that hon. Members in the Chamber will listen to the debate.

Dr. Marek: There has been a useful debate on the two short amendments. It is significant that on this occasion, contrary to his conduct on previous amendments, the Minister rushed into the Chamber to assure us on certain matters, but after further questions put by my hon. Friends he was unable to reply, with the result that there is now considerable uncertainty on the Opposition Benches about the state of the National Health Service, whether particular premises are part of an estate if the premises are tenanted, and so on.

The hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens) said, by way of intervention, that money does not keep hospitals clean. I must say that money goes a long way towards keeping hospitals clean. Hospitals and nurses' homes—in fact any part of a National Health Service estate, however it is defined—cannot be kept clean unless there is money available for materials and to pay for staff, adequately and fairly, and unless the management of the National Health Service is able to operate without worrying constantly about shortage of finance, shortage of resources, and shortage of capital equipment. If the management of the National Health Service is always worrying about resources, finance, and so on, however good that management is it cannot do as good a job as it should be doing on the matters that it has to consider.

Mr. Corbyn: Does my hon. Friend accept that the whole management of the NHS in the past seven years has resulted in significant reductions in the total number of staff employed, and that the reductions have taken place almost exclusively among the manual worker grades within the NHS — the cleaners, and catering and portering staff? When the privatisation of cleaning services takes place in hospitals, the average number of jobs lost will be between 40 and 60 per cent. of the complement employed by the National Health Service. Does my hon. Friend accept that the loss of jobs among directly employed staff through the introduction of bonus schemes or through the introduction of private contracts inevitably leads to insufficient staff to do the cleaning and necessary back-up work in the catering departments? Does he agree that that is the real enemy of a good Health Service and good standards of hygiene in hospitals?

Dr. Marek: My hon. Friend is right. It is undeniable that in the past five or six years many health authorities which have been faced with cuts have had to choose how much to invest in the fabric of the estate. With respect to revenue expenditure, they have had to choose between protecting medical services and protecting ancillary services. In many cases they have cut ancillary services to protect medical services.

Mr. Dickens: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that I was saying that the vast majority of hospital kitchens are run well and hygienically? In many cases one could almost eat the food off the floor. I am praising the people who work in the hospital kitchens. I agree that one or two kitchens have let the side down. Cleanliness costs nothing. Every kitchen has the materials needed. We are well served by the hospitals. Because there are those that let the side down, the Government's legislation is worth while. It should correct the position.

Dr. Marek: The hon. Gentleman's first comment was fair but I cannot agree with him that cleanliness costs nothing. There is certainly a problem with pest control in old hospitals in which sewers and sumps lead directly from the kitchen. Modern kitchens avoid that. Hospitals get older. Some hospitals are 50 to 100 years old, and some are about to open next week. Their numbers are declining. The old hospitals have defects, simply because of the technology available when they were built or because of fair wear and tear. More costs are incurred in terms of effort, staff and capital investment to keep such hospitals clean than are incurred in keeping modern hospitals open. Of course, there must be costs in terms of cleaning materials and staff. On top of that, there are the costs of fair wear and tear and the costs associated with the antiquity of the systems. Older hospitals are just that much more difficult to keep clean.

I stand by what I said. If there are sufficient staff and they are paid a reasonable wage, their spirits are high, their morale is good, they feel that they are doing a service for the patient, and we get a little extra from them. Before I am misquoted—I am not accusing the hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens) of intending to do so—I must say that staff in the NHS do an excellent job, but they could do an even better one if the resources were provided. That is what is at the back of the amendment.

We are not sure what will be included in the Bill. We hope that nursing homes and similar institutions will be included. The Minister says that they are included, but he has not backed up his assertion. If they are to be included, additional resources will be required.

The Government did not say on Second Reading or in Committee, and they have not said this evening, that they recognise that there is a problem, that some hospital facilities must be cleaned up and that additional resources will be needed. They have said nothing that will give any hope to health authorities which want to provide clean premises for their staff. The British Pest Control Association says that in recent years the problem has grown much worse and that it has now grown to crisis proportions. For that reason, I am glad that the Bill has been introduced, but it could have been a much better Bill.

I do not want to take up the time of the House. The Opposition are not convinced by the Minister's explanation. It came too quickly and too early. There are many questions that ought to be answered but have not been answered. We believe that amendment No. 2 should be taken to a Division. When we know the result of that Division, we shall decide what to do about amendment No. 3.

Mr. Hayhoe: The Official Report will show that some time ago I responded in clear and unambiguous terms to amendments Nos. 2 and 3. I stand by the words that I used then and I shall be happy to read them in Hansard. I doubt whether as much could be said for many of the other speeches that we have heard on these amendments.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Mr. Corbyn: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. During the previous debate my hon. Friend the Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies) and I asked whether you would be prepared to allow a separate Division on amendment No. 3. You said that you would consider our request and inform the House of your decision. Are you prepared to allow a separate Division on amendment No. 3? There is significant differences between amendments Nos. 2 and 3.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): I understood that the official Opposition did not wish to vote on amendment No. 3. However, if the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) wishes to have a vote, I am prepared to allow it.

Mr. Sedgemore: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The debate is taking an enormous amount of time and there is now a rumour going around that the Government are going to cede the private Member's day, so Conservative Members can go home to bed early tonight. If there are these sort of private machinations going on behind the scenes, should we not have a statement from the Leader of the House as to what is being arranged and offered to the Opposition? At the moment only a couple of individuals are privy to it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I know nothing about these matters.

Mr. Dobson: I beg to move amendment No.4, in page 1, leave out lines 14 to 16.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, we may take the following: amendment No. 5, in page 1, line 14, leave out 'in' and insert 'to extend'.

Government amendment No. 6.

Amendment No. 7, in page 1, line 16, at end insert

'to secure proper hygiene standards throughout all of the premises.

(2A) Vermin shall for the purposes of the Public Health Act 1961 and any regulations or orders made under this Act or the food legislation include rats, mice, insects, mites, birds and feral cats.

Amendment No. 8, in page 1, line 16, at end insert

'to secure proper hygiene standards throughout all the premises'.

Amendment No. 12, in page 1, line 16, at end insert—

'(2A) Vermin for the purposes of the Public Health Act 1961 and any regulations or order made under this Act, which shall apply to National Health Service premises, or the food legislation shall include rats, mice, insects, mites, birds and feral cats.

(2B) For the purposes of section 35 of the Public Health Act 1961 no part of health authorities premises shall be considered as controlled by the Factories Acts.'.

Mr. Dobson: As it stands, the Bill would allow the Secretary of State to set aside the new legislation by way of regulations. Amendment No 4 would leave out the provision allowing him to set it aside. Amendment No. 5 would permit him to change it, but only by extending it. To be fair, the Government's amendment attempts to meet the points that we made in Committee, but we are not convinced about it. We should like to know what evidence there is of any need for the Government to have any power to change this law.

In Committee, we asked the Minister why it was necessary for the Secretary of State to be able to set aside or vary the provision that lifts Crown immunity from food regulations in hospitals. The answer that the Minister gave was that parliamentary counsel had advised him that the clause needed to be included as "a prudent contingency provision to cover the possibility that the application of food legislation may not fit the way in which health authorities are constituted."

Even more surprisingly, he then said:

"Lawyers, from their vast experience of legislation, have seen that difficulties could arise over implementing a provision to remove Crown immunity from food legislation."—[Official Report, Standing Committee E, 29 April 1986; c. 12.]

At our subsequent sitting, the right hon. Gentleman amended that statement ever so slightly to tone it down. However, we do not understand why the Secretary of State should take this power to vary the law on food hygiene.

Have the Government actually sought advice on whether these peculiar powers that they are seeking are necessary? For instance, have they asked the Health and Safety Executive whether its experience of vetting the kitchens of private hospitals — for which it is responsible, as they are not covered by Crown immunity —suggests that it might be difficult to impose the food hygiene regulations on NHS hospitals? Have the Minister's officials reported any possible problems with imposing the regulations on NHS hospitals? Are the problems that are envisaged by those far-sighted lawyers —if those words are not a contradiction in terms—not to do with the practical workings of the hospital but with the way that health authorities work or do not work? Is this demand one not of practicality in the hospitals but of administrative convenience?

Many businesses find regulations inconvenient. Most businesses, if asked, would say that the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act is inconvenient. Certain stupid people, including Lord Young, would say that health and safety at work legislation is an intolerable burden on private industry. Everyone would accept that it is a burden, but not many would agree with Lord Young and say that it is so intolerable a burden that it should be removed. Burdens may be imposed by the regulations, but they are worthwhile burdens because they protect the health and safety of people at work.

In the circumstances, if others accept the inconvenience of health and safety at work and food legislation, we must tell health authorities that if it is simply administratively inconvenient for them to obey the law, that is tough—they can get on with obeying it like everyone else. We would rather inconvenience a few health authorities than have people suffer from salmonella poisoning.

We need an explanation from the Minister of exactly why this provision is necessary. We come back to the point:

"I was advised by parliamentary counsel that the clause needs to be included as a prudent contingency provision".

When parliamentary counsel says that, we should consider carefully what the ulterior motives might be. No doubt the same parliamentary counsel who thought that the clause as drafted was spot on is the one who has come up with Government amendment No. 6 which accepts the variation, provided that it is of the regulations in relation to health authorities.

We are not entirely clear what that means. Is it intended to sharpen the food regulations in case they are not sufficiently strong, powerful and thorough-going in respect of health authorities? If there is evidence to that effect, they should be extended, as sharpened, to all the premises that are now covered. If it is not intended to sharpen the law, the intention must be to blunt it. It is intended either to sharpen it to make it more worth while or to blunt it. If its effect is neutral, there is no need to include the proposition that is before us.

We still want to hear from the Minister what circumstances are envisaged which would make it difficult for health authorities if the law that applies to shops, hotels, restaurants and other premises serving food is applied to them. There was not a shred of a suggestion, in Committee from the Minister or his colleagues of what they envisaged. The proposition is advanced on the basis that it will deal with apprently unimaginable problems that might occur in future. We do not think that any Government—even a Labour Government—should be assisted by a power that will allow them to waive certain laws because of the possibility of unimaginable problems in future.

Amendments Nos. 7 and 12 seek to secure the extension of the definition of "vermin".

Mr. Sedgemore: Nye Bevan had a definition of "vermin".

Mr. Dobson: Labour's most famous Minister of Health had a definition which I recall was related to the Conservative and unionist party, so he cannot have been far off the mark. I would not wish to be controversial as the witching hour approaches. We are talking about experts on infestation, and they advise that it is ——

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): What about "skunk" as a definition?

Mr. Dobson: If the hon. Gentleman were to speak to the Institution of Environmental Health Officers or the British Pest Control Association, which are in favour of the amendments, they might tell him that they consider skunks to be necessary. So far as I know, skunks are not currently infesting hospitals. I do not know whether a hospital in the hon. Gentleman's constituency is in that position. The Opposition are still in the realms of reality. The hon. Gentleman obviously is not.

We wish to redefine public health legislation and to relate the application of the law on food to Health Service premises so that rats, mice, insects, mites, birds and feral cats can be defined as vermin and dealt with appropriately.

Mr. Maxton: What is a feral cat?

Mr. Dobson: My understanding is that it is a cat that has gone wild. In certain hospitals, considerable numbers of feral cats roam round the premises, just as some hospitals within this city and other cities are infested by birds going into kitchens. But because they do not fall within the definition of vermin, it is difficult to deal with them under the law. Some Conservative Members who have been talking while I have been talking might be happy to tell their constituents that their local hospital is infested with rats, mice, insects, mites, birds or feral cats, but people who know their job — by definition, that makes them superior to most Ministers — are advising us, Ministers and the health authorities that the law needs to be changed and that we need to change the definition of "vermin", which would strengthen the law and improve the cleanliness and general hygiene in hospital kitchens. We believe that is right. It should be done.

I do not want to detain the House at enormous length at this time of night, so I refer finally to amendment No. 8. That aims, as it says in plain words,

"to secure proper hygiene standards throughout all the premises".

I think everyone is agreed that we need to sort out food hygiene in kitchens. We should be able to maintain good food hygiene in the rest of the hospital premises once the food has been prepared in clean hospital kitchens — in some cases, for the first time for a few years. We are advised that, as presently worded, the Bill does not apply to the food once it is on the ward. The law should be changed to provide for that. We are also advised that the Bill does not apply to food in a nurses' home. Nurses are entitled to clean, decent and edible food. If the food is tipped out and becomes refuse in the back end of the ward or in another part of the hospital rather than in the kitchen, we are not convinced that that is covered by the food hygiene regulations.

We all know that all the food that is not consumed, the bits and pieces that are left over, is not necessarily returned to the kitchens. So there is food that is being moved about, food that is in the process of being consumed, food waiting about before being eaten and food that has not been eaten hanging about for a considerable time which should be treated as refuse. As far as we can see, all that food is not caught by the Bill as drafted, and we think that it should be.

Those are not fears that we are inventing. Those views are held by those whose profession it is to inspect premises to see whether they conform with the food hygiene regulations. Frankly, if I had to choose between the professional view of an environmental health officer and that of a Minister, I would go along with the person who knew something about food hygiene through his professional knowledge and experience.

I hope that the Government will explain why they are taking unto themselves this extraordinary power to vary the law to suit themselves. I hope also that the Minister will accept our proposition that the amendments should be accepted, because they would strengthen the Bill that they have drafted.

Mr. Hayhoe: These amendments deal with the regulation-making powers to make modifications to the food legislation's application to health authorities by regulations which require an affirmative resolution of both Houses.

I assure the House that the Government do not intend to use the modification power to undermine the commitment to apply the food legislation to health authorities. The hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) acknowledged that Government amendment No. 6 is a response to anxieties that were expressed in Committee. Opposition Members expressed a suspicion about the presence of a modification power in the Bill, which they suggested might be used to undermine the application of the food legislation to health authorities, notwithstanding the Government's declared intention to apply that legislation in full.

In response to an undertaking that I gave the Committee, I have brought the amendment forward. It will restrict the power to make regulations that modify the food legislation to modifications that are necessary to make the application of the food legislation to all health authorities more effective. I hope that I have therefore removed the anxiety that Opposition Members properly expressed.

The hon. Gentleman has raised matters of which he made a great deal in Committee. He asked why the power is required. I refer him to our first sitting in Committee, when I said:

"Lawyers, from their vast experience of legislation, have seen that difficulties could arise over implementing a provision to remove Crown immunity from food legislation." —[Official Report, Standing Committee E, 29 April 1986; c. 12.]

As I said in Committee, the power to seek modification has been introduced as a safeguard to provide for the exceptional should unforeseen difficulties arise. The hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras asked what are the unforeseen difficulties. If I knew what they were, they would not be unforeseen and we would not be doing this. He knows that such provision is included in other legislation and requires an affirmative resolution of both Houses. If the House accepts amendment No. 6, modifications can be only those to make application of food legislation to all health authorities more effective. I should have thought that that is what all hon. Members want.

Amendment No. 5 would confine the modification power in clause 1(2)(b) to extending food legislation to health authorities. The clause does that already. We discussed the other amendments generally in Committee. The proposed subsection (2A) is not relevant. It aims to introduce a requirement that certain categories of vermin should be included in the definition of vermin in the Public Health Act 1961, but the Bill is about food legislation and health authority premises, not public health legislation. As for the definition of vermin, adding mites, birds and feral cats is a matter for the food hygiene regulations, not this primary legislation. As I made clear, the inclusion of those categories of vermin in the definition of vermin in these regulations is under close examination, and if appropriate I shall introduce amendments.

I commend Government amendment No. 6 to the House and advise the House that the other amendments are either redundant or are now covered by the undertakings that I have given.

Mr. Maxton: Any concession from the Government is welcome, and their amendment to insert the words:

"necessary for its effective operation in relation to them"

is a step forward, but some of us do not understand why it is necessary to table the amendment in that way.

Essentially, the Government are saying that present food hygiene is insufficient, yet for years they have argued that it is not necessary to introduce food hygiene regulations into the NHS. In other words, they have gone a step further and said that present legislation is insufficient for the NHS and that regulations to increase the ability of health authorities to deal with food hygiene problems are needed.

[Mr. Maxton]

I accept that the standard of cleanliness in hospitals and other NHS establishments should, if anything, be above the norm for hotels, cafes and factory canteens, but hospital authorities, because they are public bodies, are much more likely to have a high standard of cleanliness than is the private sector, where standards are not normally anything like as high.

The Bill is wide ranging in terms of the premises that it covers. Earlier the Minister made it clear that the food hygiene regulations did not cover only hospital kitchens, but covered kitchens for any employee's use, whether in nurses' hostels or flats. The new general manager of the Greater Glasgow health board has for six months been living in a four-star hotel at the expense of that health board, and I wonder whether that hotel has been subject to Crown immunity during that period, and whether when he travels on the shuttle between Glasgow and his home, again at the expense of the health board, the galley on the aeroplane is covered by Crown immunity because he is an employee using those facilities under the food regulations. As I read the Bill, those facilities will have been covered by Crown immunity. It is an appalling indictment of a man who is suggesting that £20 million can be cut from the Greater Glasgow health board that during the past five months he has taken about £15,000 in expenses, not to mention his salary.

We welcome the Government amendment, but still have reservations about the effectiveness of the clause, as it remains open to interpretations which may reduce the food hygiene powers.

Mr. Dobson: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment made: No. 6, in page 1, line 16, leave out 'appropriate' and insert

'necessary for its effective operation in relation to them'.—[Mr. Hayhoe.]

12.15 am

Mr. Dobson: I beg to move amendment No. 10, in page 1, line 16, at end insert—

'(c) require every health authority to report annually to the Secretary of State on the action taken to improve food hygiene in such premises, any action remaining outstanding and the estimated costs thereof.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take amendment No. 11, in page 1, line 16, at end insert—

'(c) require the Secretary of State to present to Parliament an annual report on food hygiene in health authority premises.'.

Mr. Dobson: The motto for these amendments is a quotation from Dr. Johnson:

"Depend upon it, Sir, when a man knows he is to be hanged in a fortnight, it concentrates his mind wonderfully."

The obligation on health authorities to produce annual reports to Ministers on hygiene in the kitchens would concentrate their minds wonderfully, and similarly, if the Secretary of State had to publish an annual report to Parliament, it would concentrate his mind too. If I am not digressing too far, I shall read a further quotation from Dr. Johnson, which may be appropriate. It is:

"Every hour takes away part of the things that please us and perhaps part of our disposition to be pleased."

If hon. Members feel less and less pleased as time goes by, the doctor knew what he was talking about.

The object of the annual reports is to fix deadlines and attract publicity. Deadlines are a great incentive to anyone who has to produce anything. Without deadlines, nothing would get done. It would be extremely salutary if the health authorities had to produce an annual report on this matter. Therefore, we have tabled two amendments. One is to oblige the Minister to report to Parliament, and the other is the logical one that would make it possible for him to produce such a report — an obligation on health authorities to report to him.

The merits of this are that every year there would have to be an annual report from both the health authorities and the Minister. As a result of that obligation, the health authorities would have to monitor what is going on in the kitchens in their hospitals, as they have manifestly failed to do in the past. They would have to identify all the arrangements that have been made for food hygiene in their kitchens, as many of them have demonstrably failed to do in the past. If the situation was not right, they would have to explain what was wrong.

The next question is whether the reporting has to be a statutory duty. Can the Minister rely on sending a circular to every health authority and getting a response? The answer is that he cannot. As reported by the Comptroller and Auditor General, when he sent a circular to health authorities about cervical cancer last year, 10 of the health authorities which were asked question on this vital matter failed to reply. As far as we can ascertain, the Secretary of State did not do anything about it, because without issuing an instrument in writing requiring them to reply he could not do anything. Therefore, it is necessary for there to be a statutory duty, which will make the health authorities concentrate on this problem.

The obligation to produce a report would show who was responsible for anything that was going wrong. It would show who was causing delays, which bureaucrats were arguing with one another and delaying improvements, and who was not providing the necessary money and other resources. I refer to the report of the inquiry into the food poisoning outbreak at Stanley Royd hospital. In many ways the most disturbing part of the whole report is paragraphs 238 to 271. Those 33 paragraphs spell out all the ludicrous machinations and arguments that went on between officials of the Wakefield district health authority, the Yorkshire regional health authority and officials of the DHSS about what would happen to the kitchens at the hospital.

I shall not delay the House by quoting vast extracts from that report, but it contained innumerable arguments, discussions, changes of plan and indications that the necessary money would not be forthcoming from the Ministry or the regional health authority for essential spending on Stanley Royd hospital.

All this was going on at a hospital where there had been a salmonella outbreak in 1979. For over three years people argued and did what can only be described as sod-all—if it is in order to use that phrase. As a result, 20 people died. If the health authority had had to produce a report to identify what was going on, if it had had to report to the Ministry and the Minister had had to report to Parliament, somebody outside that place might have noticed what was—or what was not—going on. The obligation to produce an annual report would emphasis to those responsible the seriousness of the matter and its high priority.

Ministers have other ways of demonstrating priorities. For example, on privatisation issues Ministers at the DHSS employ more than 60 officials——

Mr. Tristan Garel-Jones (Lords Commissioner to the Treasury): Not enough.

Mr. Dobson: So says one of the Trappist Whips. He says "not enough" to further the interests of Government Members who have financial interests in the promotion of private interests in health authorities. They spend much time on that. We understand that when Ministers have meetings with regional health authorities, district health authorities, or the chairs of those bodies, they are constantly——

Mr. Garel-Jones: Chairs?

Mr. Dobson: Chairs, yes. Conservatives understand what I mean. If they do not, they are out of date. Ministers attach high priority to privatisation, but they do not attach high priority to other matters. An obligation to produce reports annually would create the necessary publicity and high priority.

The amendment also requires the health authorities to produce an estimate of the cost of putting things right. The highest estimate for the cost of putting the kitchens right at Stanley Royd hospital was no less than £600,000. The estimated cost of putting right the kitchens at St. Thomas's hospital across the river is 1½ million. If those sums had to be spelt out, it would become clear who was responsible for providing—or not providing—the funds.

The amendment would reduce the element of irresponsibility that exists within the DHSS and the National Health Service. Ministers say that they have an intention, but that they cannot interfere with the priorities determined by health authorities.

I am sorry that the hon. Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde (Mrs. McCurley) has left the Chamber, because it is important to emphasise the extent to which cleanliness and good food hygiene in health authority kitchens depend upon spending and hardware. The environmental health officers found that in 85 per cent. of the places that they considered to be substandard the major problems were substandard premises and general requirements for equipment. Food handlers were responsible for 15 per cent. of the problems. There has been a great effort both at Stanley Royd and other places to blame the staff, who work in lousy conditions, with lousy and unsatisfactory equipment, and not enough money. There has been a great tendency to blame them —the people at the bottom of the pile. Another reason for having an annual report is that the responsibilities of those a bit further up the pile, or pyramid, would be identified.

We are asking the health authorities to report to the Minister, but we do not think that it is satisfactory only for health authorities to report to the Minister. Ministers receive many reports which they sit on and hide. If reports are embarrassing, they ignore them. The last thing that they do—unless there is a statutory obligation to do so —is disclose them. Therefore, we believe that if the Minister receives reports annually, the House should get reports annually, setting out what has been happening. We want these things out in the open, and we want a comprehensive national report.

Other reports have been produced on the state of kitchens in the National Health Service by a number of trade unions, the Institution of Environmental Health Officers and the British Pest Control Association. It would be better if we did not have to rely on what might be described as the private initiatives—however welcome they may be—of such professional organisations. We should not have to rely on them. We should be able to rely on the Government annually——

Mr. Kennedy: I agree with the thrust of the hon. Gentleman's argument. He said that he wants a comprehensive national report, as it were. His amendments Nos. 10 and 11 specifically refer to "health authority". Other parts of the Bill talk about, in the Scottish context, "health boards". I assume that his amendments would extend to Scottish health boards as well as to health authorities in England and Wales. Can the hon. Gentleman clarify that?

Mr. Dobson: My understanding is that the part of the clause that we are considering refers to "health authorities" but, by some wild extension of the way in which we would go on in this place, that turns into "health boards" when it refers to Scotland. In my view, the Scottish health boards should prepare such reports and should submit their reports, as they would in the normal course of events, to the Secretary of State for Scotland. I understand that the Bill provides for that. Certainly that is what our amendments are intended to provide for. If passed, they would do so without any additional wording to cover Scotland.

We are in favour of such reports. There are a number of examples of Ministers having to report to the House. They must present a report to Parliament, under the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act, on certain aspects of the implementation and progress in implementation of the Act. The Minister of Agriculture Fisheries and Food must report on the intervention board for agricultural products, and so on.

I add those examples in an effort to convince even the most conservative of Members that there are sound precedents for our proposal. I hope that even if the Under-Secretary of State cannot accept the exact wording of our proposals, he will accept the principle that lies behind them and our desire to improve performance and to increase publicity. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Crawley (Mr. Soames) is having a bit of a moan. I hope that even if the Under-Secretary of State cannot accept the amendments, he will accept the principle and introduce in the other place amendments along these lines.

12.30 am

Mr. Kennedy: I am glad that at this late hour the debate is back on track, that those Labour Back Benchers who were released from their cages are once again chained up, and that we are again discussing the Bill more seriously.

Mr. Corbyn: Do not be personal.

Mr. Kennedy: I was not referring to the hon. Gentleman. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Crawley (Mr. Soames) should not be too delighted at such a reference. One side is as bad as the other. Last week's events were no better than some of the incidents this afternoon.

I should like to support the amendments and return to a point that I raised in Committee with the Minister. Perhaps the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland with responsibility for health, the hon. Member for Argyll and Bute (Mr. MacKay), will refer to the matter which I raised then and which was not answered satisfactorily. It is an important and worthwhile matter, and I trust that the response will be positive.

The Opposition have argued that the legislation will have serious financial implications for the health authorities and for the health boards in Scotland. The Government have denied that, as the explanatory financial memorandum makes clear. They say that there are no such significant implications. Therefore, I ask the government to allow the health authorities and the health boards north of the border to submit to the Department of Health and Social Security and to the Scottish Home and Health Department a breakdown of the costs that may be incurred to meet the demands imposed by the legislation. That seems to be a reasonable request. It should not cause the Government any discomfort, because they have argued consistently that the costs associated with the Bill will be zero. Presumably, if they are confident about that, they will not face major bills at the Elephant and Castle or in Edinburgh in the Scottish Home and Health Department.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. John MacKay): At St. Andrew's House.

Mr. Kennedy: I thank the hon. Gentleman. In that case, they will not face major bills from health authorities or the health boards to meet the demands imposed by the legislation. I hope that the Minister, who did not give a clear answer to my request in Committee, will do so tonight. I shall pay careful attention to him when he replies, as I always do. I hope that we shall be given an unequivocal reply one way or the other.

I support the comments of the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) on amendments Nos. 10 and 11. If the legislation is to be as effective as possible, it is sensible to measure annually the improvements that flow from it to the different parts of the country. Therefore, I support the encouragement of health authorities to take that type of action. I agree with the hon. Gentleman that it is not sufficient for the information to be transferred to Ministers, never again to see the light of day, or for it to be transferred to whoever Mr. Victor Paige's successor may be, without it being made available to the public. The information should be made available to Parliament so that hon. Members can judge, on a local basis, and parties can judge, on a political basis, the progress, or lack of it, that is being made towards full implementation of the Bill's provisions.

I support the amendments and again put my specific inquiry to the Minister, in the hope that he will give a constructive response.

Mr. Corbyn: I shall be brief, because I hope that there will be an opportunity to debate the important matters that are provided for later in the Bill.

I support the amendment that has been moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson), and I hope that the House will see fit to agree to it. I should like the Minister to state clearly the cost implications of the envisaged changes. The removal of Crown immunity would, I hope, result in much closer examination of hygiene standards in Health Service catering departments. Implicit in the removal of Crown immunity is cost. There may be additional staff costs, or new equipment may involve additional cost. In the longer term, I think that significant changes in the design of Health Service catering departments will involve additional cost.

Many of the hygiene problems in the new NHS hospitals are to be found in the design of the buildings. They have nothing to do with hospital administration. There is scope for a serious research project into the problem of vermin in catering departments because of hospital design. Reference was made earlier to cockroaches having absolutely perfect breeding grounds in warm air central heating systems. Those who have to maintain such buildings say that when cockroaches start to breed in warm air central heating systems it is extremely difficult to get rid of them.

I hope the Minister will accept that it is sensible that an annual report should be prepared. The Minister should also take account of the curious concept of the Cinderella services. I have never quite understood what a Cinderella service is, apart from the fact that it appears to require money, over and above everything else, during the year for which a health authority is considering the distribution of its budget. The Cinderella services tend to change, depending upon the particular needs that are identified at the time. Improvements in the hygiene regulations and in the administration of hygiene in NHS kitchens are particularly important, and the Minister should consider the inclusion of such a requirement.

Much has been made of the report into the outbreak of food poisoning at the Stanley Royd hospital. My hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras was right to refer to the original outbreak of salmonella poisoning and then to the very serious outbreak some years later which tragically resulted in a number of deaths. That underlines more than anything the need for health authorities, the Minister and, of course, Parliament to become much more aware of the needs of NHS hospital catering departments.

If we do not ensure that not only is Crown immunity totally removed but that there is some sort of annual reporting system, tragically, what happened at the Stanley Royd hospital could happen at another hospital. It could happen in an old building like the Stanley Royd hospital or in one of the modern hospitals, such as those in London and other big cities. I hope the Minister will recognise that and accept the amendment, which would give Parliament year in, year out, an opportunity to debate the issues. That would put at rest many of the anxieties not only of people who, tragically, have relatives detained in hospitals, but of Health Service employees by ensuring that they are not wrongly maligned for unhygienic catering and the resultant food poisoning.

All the reports produced by the trade unions and professional bodies and other people about Health Service catering are well intentioned and timely. Their authors should be congratulated on producing them and on the efforts they have put into them. It is not good enough for us to rely on voluntary bodies, however good they are, to keep us up to date and up to scratch about Health Service catering. It is a matter of public concern, and one way to overcome that concern is by the production of an annual report, such as that outlined by my hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras.

Mr. Whitney: The hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) began his speech with a couple of quotations that he raided from a bumper fun book of quotations from Dr. Johnson. If it were anyone less affable than the hon. Gentleman, I might recall for the benefit of the House the quotation by Dr. Johnson about the talking dog—it was remarkable, not that he talked well, but that he talked at all.

The hon. Gentleman spoke about the "ludicrous machinations and arguments" that went on in the extremely sad affair at the Stanley Royd hospital. I am delighted to have the hon. Gentleman's support and endorsement, which I take by inference, for the system of general management which we have introduced and which we are confident will avoid precisely the "ludicrous machinations and arguments" which caused the difficult and regrettable trouble at the Stanley Royd hospital.

Mr. Dobson: If there is another salmonella outbreak in a hospital with a general manager, will the Minister sack the manager?

Mr. Whitney: That is a hypothetical question that I shall be happy to consider should the need arise.

I hope that the hon. Gentleman will consider the situation that the Stanley Royd hospital inquiry revealed and address his mind to the possibility that, given the clear acceptance of responsibility inherent in the general manager system, it would have been highly unlikely, to put it at its lowest, for that sort of thing to occur had such a system existed at the Stanley Royd hospital.

The hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy) reminds one of another quotation by Dr. Johnson, but I had better avoid that, because to cite it might lose us votes in Scotland.

The hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) spoke about additional costs that might be incurred. I remind the House not only of the increased real expenditure that the Government have already devoted to the National Health Service, and to which I have referred at least once already in the course of an earlier debate, but of the 6·7 per cent. increase in resources that is being made available to the Health Service this year. That is set against inflation, which is about 3 per cent. The savings that are being achieved by the cost improvement programme an by the sale of the estate, and the savings that are being achieved by the competitive tendering programme, offer a fruitful source of funding for any necessary bringing up to standard should that be necessary in any health authority or in any Health Service unit. It has always been accepted that despite Crown immunity the standards that we expect should nevertheless be observed.

Mr. Corbyn: I thank the Minister for giving way. Will he for one moment leave the fairytale land in which he lives about increased resources for the NHS and answer the question in the debate? When a report is made which clearly shows that more money is needed in NHS catering departments to overcome the difficulties, will the Department provide the funds and not take money from the patient care budget, as it has done with every other thing in the NHS?

Mr. Whitney: If the hon. Gentleman wishes to talk about reality, I remind him again of the reality of a 24 per cent. increase in spending real terms since 1979, of a 6·7 per cent. increase this year against 3 per cent. inflation of about £150 million available in the next year and a similar amount that will be made available from the sale of real estate, and the fact that there is also the additional funding that will be available from competitive tendering. That is the reality.

Mr. Maxton rose—

Mr. Whitney: I am answering the hon. Gentleman's hon. Friend. If the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) wants a little reality, let him read carefully tomorrow what I have said in Hansard and he may learn a little about the funding of the NHS.

Mr. Maxton rose—

Mr. Whitney: No, I shall not give way. Sit down.

The hon. Members for Holborn and St. Pancras and for Ross, Cromarty and Skye—we do not know whether or not the Liberals will join in this these days—are offering a whole bundle of paper which is to be shipped yet again into the Vote Office and the Library in the form of annual reports to Parliament from some 191 health authorities. That is a completely unnecessary procedure, set against the fact that the purpose of clause 1 is to apply the food legislation, including its enforcement provisions, to health authorities, so that their premises will be inspected by environmental health officers who will be able to require improvements to comply with the legislation, and, if necessary, will be able to prosecute and, indeed, to seek closure of premises. So in future any health authority which has failed to follow our long-established policy of complying on a voluntary basis with the legislation will, once the Bill comes into effect, be obliged by the force of law to comply or face the consequences.

When my right hon. Friend announced the Government's intention to seek to remove Crown immunity under the food legislation from the NHS, he said that we would also be revising the central guidance in the light of the Stanley Royd report and other developments. We are now consulting other interested bodies, such as the Institution of Environmental Health Officers, on a draft of this guidance. This makes it clear that district health authorities should receive each year, in the public part of their meetings, a summary of EHO inspection reports. It also asks regional general managers to see that food hygiene standards are monitored in their districts.

This guidance, along with the force of law applied through the enactment of clause 1, will ensure good food hygiene standards in all our hospitals. The Government see no need to introduce the large volumes of extra paper which would be the main effect of the statutory reports envisaged by these amendments supported by the Labour and Social Democratic parties. I urge the House to reject the amendments.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. John MacKay: I beg to move amendment No. 15, in page 2, line 26, after 'means', insert
'the Milk Dairies (Scotland) Act 1914 to 1949,'.

This technical amendment is required to bring the statutory provisions relating to milk in Scotland within the effect of clause 1. Legislation in Scotland on milk is largely separate from the main provision on food—the Food and Drugs (Scotland) Act 1956—and this amendment completes the references to Scottish provisions relating to food.

Mr. Maxton: I rise merely to welcome the Scottish Minister to the debate. This is the first time that he has been in the Chamber. [Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman managed to dash in on the previous occasion that I spoke —he was obviously told by a Government Whip that I was attacking him for not being present—but he has hardly been present. Yet the Bill covers the whole of Scotland.

I assume that there will have to be a drafting amendment to the Government amendment, because I assume that it should refer to the "Acts" of 1914 to 1949 and not just the "Act". No doubt that will be put right.

I also assume that the Minister has got the amendment right—though it will be unusual if he has. However, I intervene merely to welcome the Minister on one of his rare appearances in our debates on the Bill.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 2

PHARMACEUTICAL SERVICES

Mr. Dobson: I beg to move amendment No. 20, in page 3, line 20, at end insert

'and—

(iii) the times at which he will undertake to provide those services.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this we may take the following amendments: No. 24, in page 3, line 47, at end insert—

'(e) for the Committee to consult local public transport undertakings about the hours of opening of the premises under consideration.'.

No. 25, in page 3, line 47, at end insert—

'(e) to ensure that every neighbourhood has reasonable access to the services of a pharmacist; that such services be advertised in such manner of language to be easily understood and that they be available at specific times outside normal trading hours.'.

Mr. Dobson: The main aim of amendment No. 24 is to ensure that the provision of pharmaceutical services and decisions about the services provided are not taken in isolation from consideration of the transport facilities that are available to get people to and from chemists' shops when they want to get a prescription dispensed.

Many people do not have their own transport and have to rely on public transport. The timing and routes of buses are often not convenient and not related to the location or opening hours of chemists' shops. That makes it difficult for people who are sick or are nursing sick relatives or friends to get drugs that they require.

We propose in amendment No. 24 that before deciding whether to accept a proposal for a chemist's shop in an area the committee responsible for making the decision should consult local public transport undertakings on the opening hours of the premises. It may be possible to get the people running the shop to vary their hours or to get the people running the transport system to vary their timings so that buses are run for people who do not have private transport. At some times of the day, those people are the majority.

My hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) will no doubt explain his amendment No. 25, which proposes that and that services should be made known in languages that are understood by people whose mother tongue is not English.

"every neighbourhood has reasonable access to the services of a pharmacist"

We argued in Committee that it would be useful for the committee that decides on applications to open chemists' shops to consider matters such as opening hours and ease of access and use of local pharmacies. We are in favour of people making better and more extensive use of their local pharmacies, and that is what the amendments are intended to secure.

As I am always willing to admit, there may be something wrong with the detailed drafting of the amendments. If there is, we should be happy for the Minister to accept the basic proposition and to introduce a more appropriately worded amendment in the House of Lords which will do better the job that we want done. I can see no reason why he should not accept the general drift of the amendments.

Mr. Corbyn: I support my hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson). When the National Health Service was set up, controls on pharmacies were exercised through family practitioner committees. Later, those controls were made more powerful, and now the Government wish to introduce more requirements for the opening of pharmacies.

Amendment No. 25 places a requirement on the Health Service to ensure reasonable access to the services of a pharmacist wherever people live. Although I can understand the argument that we should stop too many pharmacists opening shops in one high street or shopping area, it is also important to ensure that there are enough pharmacies in each neighbourhood. Increasingly in rural areas the idea of local shops is disappearing with the development of hypermarkets and motorised shopping centres. Village shops are also disappearing, and in the suburbs of small towns pharmacies tend to disappear altogether. It is important to ensure that pharmacies open in places which it is practical for people from every neighbourhood to reach.

A similar, although more complicated, problem arises in urban areas. Shopping centres tend to suffer from the growth of larger multiple shopping centres some distance from town, so urban areas lose many shops, especially pharmacies, which are needed by those who have difficulty in getting around. My hon. Friend mentioned the need to consider public transport facilities.

The committees involved must also ensure that the opening hours of pharmacies are well-advertised and that they open outside normal trading hours. Unfortunately, people do not require the services of a pharmacist only during office hours. Additionally—this applies to some areas more than others, but especially in my constituency —there is a need for multilingual advertising of such services. In my constituency, 41 languages are registered or spoken. Some are more dominant than others, including several African languages, Hindi, Urdu, Bengali, Greek and Turkish. At least six languages are commonly spoken, apart from English. It would be appropriate for the local committee to require that pharmacists' services be advertised in the languages commonly spoken in the locality. Elderly people from the subcontinent and other areas often have to ask children to vist the pharmacy and explain what is wanted or obtain the necessary information.

The suggestions in amendment No. 25 would change the Bill's approach from the entirely permissive to the more compulsory. They would ensure that pharmacies were located in reach of everyone, that they were open at convenient times and, importantly for areas such as Islington, that the services were advertised multilingually to ensure that no one is left out of this aspect of the Health Service.

I am

Mrs. Clwyd: I should like briefly to support the comments of my hon. Friends. I was a member of the Royal Commission on the Health Service, and among the subjects that we dealt with were pharmaceutical services, and particularly access. Many of those who submitted evidence to us about pharmacists were concerned about the reduction in the number of pharmacists that has occurred in recent years. Thus, the points made by my hon. Friends are very relevant.

Although the number of trained pharmacists and those in training has been rising, the number of pharmacies in the community has fallen by more than a quarter since 1963. Most of the closures have been in urban areas, but their effect has been felt particularly in rural areas, and was the subject of comment by several community health councils. For example, Bath CHC told us that "the increasing trend for small pharmacies to close is giving more and more cause for concern, particularly in the small and rural communities where the alternative service may be some distance away."

If that trend continues, the difficulties experienced at present by some of those who try to get to a pharmacy are likely to become more widespread. I should be grateful if the Minister could give us some assurances on that point.

Although the contract has in general received support, opposition has come, for example, from the recently formed British Pharmacists Association. It claims that at least 1,400 small chemists shops will close when the contract is first introduced, and that 3,000 could close in the first year. I should be interested to know whether the Minister has received any representations from CHCs, which would be the first to report on any concern about access voiced by patients. I have heard about the reaction of professional bodies to the new contract, but little publicity has been given to what potential patients think about reducing access to pharmacies as a result of the contract. Perhaps the Minister could give some assurances on that point.

Mr. Hayhoe: I shall begin by responding to the comments of the hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd). I think that her remarks were more relevant to amendment No. 17, which was not moved. The opportunity for dealing with the opposition to the contract which has been expressed in some quarters has passed. Consequently, I shall confine my remarks to amendment Nos. 20 and 25, which have been spoken to by the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) and his hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn).

Amendment No. 20——

Mrs. Clwyd: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hayhoe: No. Let me deal with the amendments that have been moved. Amendment No. 20——

Mrs. Clwyd: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hayhoe: I do not accept amendment No. 20——

Mrs. Clwyd: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The Minister said that my point was irrelevant to the amendment, but it is very relevant to it. I refer to amendment No. 25, which seeks to ensure that every neighbourhood has reasonable access to the services of a pharmacist. That is precisely the point that I was making.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: (Mr. Harold Walker): That is not a matter for me.

Mr. Hayhoe: I shall say something about amendment No. 25 in a moment. I said that that speech seemed to be more relevant to amendment No. 17, and particularly the reference that the hon. Lady made to the association which opposes the contract. That would have required the deletion of the whole of the clause. However, I shall return to that point.

I am broadly sympathetic to the idea behind all of the amendments, which are concerned with trying to ensure a better service for the patient. I hope that that is common ground among us, and, indeed, it was certainly reflected in all our discussions in Committee.

The amendments are unnecessary as part of the primary legislation. With respect to amendment No. 20, there is already adequate provision on hours of service to ensure that patients receive an adequate service when they require it. Regulations state that the FPCs, after consultation with the local pharmaceutical committee, should prepare schemes to secure that one or more pharmacies should, at all reasonable times, be open. Any such scheme should specify the days and hours during which such pharmacies would be open, and all FPCs operate model hours of service schemes. Most of us know from our constituencies how effectively they work and how the information is made widely available.

On amendment No. 24, FPCs are responsible for planning local primary care services, which is a matter for local judgment. If the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras is concerned that the draft guidance is not sufficiently specific, I shall be glad to look at the matter further when we reconsider the guidance to FPCs following the passage of this legislation. I hope that the hon. Gentleman is satisfied with that assurance.

That is broadly what I wish to say to the hon. Member for Islington, North about amendment No. 25. I agree that every neighbourhood should have reasonable access to the services of a pharmacist. Indeed, the underlying aim of the new arrangements for allocating the NHS pharmacy contracts is that patients should receive an adequate service that is not wasteful of NHS resources. That appeared to be a matter of common ground during our detailed discussions in Committee. Of course, the regulations cannot ensure that. All that we can do is provide the framework within which the FPCs can operate to obtain the best arrangements possible. Obviously, services should be advertised so that they are easily understood and give specific times for when they are available outside normal trading hours.

As I have said, I do not think that these matters are for this primary legislation. The need to consider the maintenance of out-of-hours services when considering new applications for contracts should, of course, be taken into account by FPCs. I assure the House that we shall emphasise that requirement in the guidance to FPCs.

Although we are broadly sympathetic to the points that have been raised, I do not believe that they are appropriate for primary legislation. I am prepared to consider both what has been said tonight and any written representations before we issue the detailed guidance.

Mr. Corbyn: Can the Minister make it clear that while it is obvious that the House cannot legislate for every corner-shop pharmacist, he will take on board the necessity of ensuring that a pharmacist is available in every community? Secondly, the right hon. Gentleman has not answered the point about multilingual communities and the need to ensure that the services are clearly advertised in the languages of minority ethnic communities. There is a serious problem with the inability of some people to communicate with their pharmacist when obtaining medicines because of the of the enormous language difficulty. It is important that that point is included in the guidelines.

Mr. Hayhoe: The question of ensuring that that happens is not appropriate to this legislation. However, in the guidance to FPCs we shall seek to give positive guidance aimed at the objectives of proper coverage to suit the patients and details of out-of-hours service for local residents. That should cover the point of that information being given, as far as is practicable, in languages that as many of the local population as possible will understand.

Amendment negatived.

Dr. Marek: I beg to move amendment No. 21, in page 3, line 36, leave out 'or some of the services'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this we shall take Government amendments Nos. 26, 27 and 34 and amendment No. 36, in page 5, line 17, leave out 'or some of the services'.

Dr. Marek: I shall be brief as the Government amendments go some way towards meeting the comments and criticisms which were expressed in Committee. I shall be interested to hear what the Minister has to say.

Mr. Whitney: As the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) has said, Government amendments Nos. 26, 27 and 34 go some way towards meeting the matters that he raised in Committee, during which we had a valuable and constructive discussion about whether family practitioner committees and health boards could accept an application in part only. For example, if an applicant said that he wished to supply three types of service and only two types were necessary, could the FPC accept the application only in respect of the services needed? It will probably be common ground that FPCs should have the right to make an appropriate judgment.

Clause 2 does not expressly permit FPCs to adopt a selective approach. Therefore, we gave a clear undertaking to consider the matter and, indeed, we have done so. The amendment makes it clear that FPCs have the right to be selective when considering applications for new contracts. Only these services needed locally would then be selected. As FPC would not be forced to accept an application because only some of the services on offer were required. Equally, it would not be forced to refuse an application where all but one type of service was necessary and desirable.

I am grateful to the hon. Member for Wrexham for tabling the original amendment in Committee and to my hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims) for his contribution to the discussion. I hope that hon. Members on both sides of the House will accept the Government amendments.

Dr. Marek: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave withdrawn.

Mr. Dobson: I beg to move amendment No. 23, in page 3, line 47, at end insert—

"(e) for the Committee to consult the Community Health Council for the area concerned before reaching any decision on the establishment continuance, or closure of a pharmacy.'.

The purpose of the amendment is fairly clear in its wording. That is because I am incapable of writing anything that is not simple. The proposition is that the Committee considering an application for the should, before reaching its decision, consult the community health council of the area concerned. That seems to be a sensible, simple and sound proposition, and no doubt the Government will be urging the House to reject it.

"establishment continuance, or closure of a pharmacy"

Community health councils are consulted — not as often or as carefully as they should be, and having been consulted their views are often ignored — over hospital closures and variations in services by the hospital service and the community health service, and it seems that they should be consulted over something as important to a community as the "establishment continuance, or closure of a pharmacy".

If a pharmacy is removed from a locality and it is the only one in the area, the local community suffers considerable inconvenience, and the difficulty and inconvenience of getting drugs dispensed may put some people in danger. It is a sensible and reasonable requirement that the committee considering the "establishment continuance, or closure of a pharmacy"

should have to consider the local community health council, which to a limited extent represents the views of consumers of health services in the locality.

1.15 am

Mr. Corbyn: This is an important amendment, which I hope the Minister will take seriously.

One of the many problems in the Health Service is its fundamentally undemocratic nature. Health authorities are fairly undemocratic, and family practitioner committees are even less democratic than health authorities. Sometimes they take decisions without any apparent rhyme or reason. Until we have a Labour Government who will ensure that there is a much more democratic Health Service and an end to the false division between health authorities and family practitioner committees, the least that we can do is require that when the allocation of pharmacies is made, and when the closing down or reallocaton of pharmacies is considered, there is some public consultation. That already happens with doctors' surgeries. Because that happens, there has been a serious debate and public concern about the problem of elderly family practitioners in inner urban areas.

The same public concern has not been voiced about the shortage of pharmacies, simply because there is no means to voice it until the pharmacies have closed and gone, and been turned into newsagents, betting shops, or estate agents, as so often happens——

Mr. Dobson: Or massage parlours.

Mr. Corbyn: Indeed.

It is important that we have some form of public consultation. While community health councils do a valuable job and attempt to represent the views of people in their community, in addition to that there should be an opportunity, perhaps through the community health councils, for local authorities and other interested groups to make comments. It is a serious problem, particularly in a community with a large number of elderly people, if a pharmacy closes down and there is nowhere nearby or convenient where they can go to obtain medicines or make other purchases.

I hope that the Minister will ensure that there is consultation, because by that very process we could make sure that the family practitioner committees paid as much attention to the provision of pharmacies as they now do to the allocation of doctors' practices.

Mrs. Clwyd: I should like to reinforce what my hon. Friends have said. As a former member of a community health council, I know what a valuable voice those councils are for consumers in the community, despite the lack of resources allocated to them by the Government, who set up community health councils, but have given them no teeth. We argued for that in the Royal Commission on the National Health Service. We believe that more resources should be given to community health councils so that they can represent the consumer more adequately. That has not been done, but they still represent the only authentic voice of the community on Health Service matters, although they are able to do so only in a rather inadequate way because of the lack of resources.

I am pleased that the Secretary of State for Wales is here. He knows that the Health Service in Wales is even less democratic than in England, because the powers that were given to the regional health authority were removed by him to the Welsh Office, where Ministers are not really responsible for the day-to-day running of the Health Service because they have such a vast variety of subjects for which they are responsible and it is civil servants who take the major decisions on Health Service matters that affect consumers in Wales. Thus it is even more important that the voices of the community health councils are listened to in Wales than in the rest of Britain, perhaps, because of the less democratic nature of the Health Service there.

The Minister did not answer me when I asked him whether he had had any representations from community health councils on the new pharmacy contract. If he has not had them, he should ask for them. I am sure that they will have views. They gave views to the Royal Commission on the National Health Service. I am sure that they would do so again if asked. It is important that the Government hear them. If they think that services to patients are being run down by the closing of pharmacies, which has been predicted by one of the professional organisations, it is only right and proper that their voice should be heard. The views of community health councils are important. If there are such organisations, they should be used as the authentic voice of the consumer. I support this important amendment.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I shall be brief, but I feel strongly about this matter.

I have some experience of the inadequacies of family practitioner committees. A surgery in my constituency was closed without any member of the public knowing what was happening. It was closed by a resolution carried by a FPC in Carlisle.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The amendment deals with the establishment, continuation or closure of a pharmacy.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: That is absolutely right.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will stick to it.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: That is precisely what I am doing. I am trying to draw attention to the fact that family practitioner committees are not competent to act on their own when the public interest is at stake. I am giving an example of one which failed in its public duty. The story that I gave shows their inadequacies. They should be required to consult community health councils, which are closer to the community.

In the case to which I referred there was a clear difference of opinion between the community health council and the family practitioner committee. Privately and, to some extent, publicly, the council said that it felt that the public had not been consulted and that the FPC had dealt with the matter inadequately. Pharmacies are an important part of local Health Service provision. There must be public consultation in every way, and there is no better means of doing that than consulting community health councils. I hope that the House will carry this important amendment.

Mr. Whitney: Such is the generosity of the Government that, even at this late hour, I should like to say that we have considerable sympathy with much of the reasoning behind the amendment. The draft guidance to family practitioner committees makes it clear that, when an application for a new contract is received the FPC will notify local community health councils. Those CHCs will have the right to make representations on the application to the FPC. CHCs will also be notified about applications for minor relocations at NHS pharmacies. It is the Government's intention to confirm these arrangements in regulations but, as the Secretary of State for Social Services already has the powers to make such regulations, the Government do not consider that extra powers in this Bill are necessary.

The hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) asked about the number of pharmacies. I am happy to be able to say that the number has risen and that, to the six months ending 31 December 1985, no fewer than 215 opened, 13 of which were in Wales. The hon. Lady also asked about representations from the CHCs on the new pharmacy contract. I am advised that we had no such representations.

In the great majority of cases, closure is decided by the contractor involved — the matter is not within the control of FPCs. There would, therefore, be little point in the FPCs consulting community health councils about something that they do not control.

Mr. Corbyn rose——

Mr. Dobson: The Minister must bear in mind the fact that the Bill will offer financial incentives to some pharmacies to close, so there is a direct responsibility. The Government, with FPC involvement, will induce pharmacies to close. In those circumstances, FPCs have a function in regard to a proposed closure.

Mr. Whitney: That would be a judgment for the FPC. The Opposition amendment proposes that all closures are subject to consultation with the CHC. That is not within the gift of the FPC, given that in the majority of the cases closures are decided by the contractor.

Mr. Corbyn: This is the heart of the problem. The FPCs have a power to ensure that there is a doctor's surgery in every area. While Opposition Members have many criticisms of the way in which FPCs operate, it is right and proper that they should ensure that that is the case. The fact that they do not have the equivalent power for pharmacies is no reason for not passing the amendment and every reason to amend the primary legislation to ensure that FPCs, in a more democratised form, have control over pharmacies to ensure pharmacy services are provided in every community.

Mr. Whitney: The provisions go a long way towards ensuring that there is wide and appropriate coverage of pharmacies. The figures that I gave for the past six months demonstrate adequately that the coverage of pharmacies is good and increasing. I invite the House to reject the amendment.

Question accordingly negatived.

Amendments made: No. 26, in page 4, line 1 at end insert—

'( ) that an application to a Committee may be granted in respect of some only of the services specified in it;'.

No. 27, in page 4, line 8 at beginning insert 'that'./Mr. Whitney.]

Mr. Dobson: I beg to move amendment No. 32, in page 4, line 23 after 'appeal', insert

'to a committee of such persons as should be appointed by the Secretary of State'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take the following amendments:

No. 33 in page 4, line 24 at end insert

'on the ground of manifest unreasonableness at the time of the relevant decision and on no other ground.'.

No. 42, in page 5, line 46 at end insert

'on the ground of manifest unreasonableness at the time of the relevant decision and on no other ground.'.

Mr. Dobson: I shall be brief and give the extra corps the opportunity to go home.

The purpose of the amendments is to provide a national appeals machinery against the possibility of a family practitioner committee turning down an application. Doubt has been expressed by the pharmaceutical profession — or trade — because pharmacists are not happy about existing pharmacists sitting on a committee and turning down applications from people who want to open pharmacies. They have asked for a national appeals machinery and have been refused. We think that such a machinery is reasonable.

Mr. Kennedy: I support the amendment. During the Committee stage, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Wycombe (Mr. Whitney), gave a clear undertaking, which led to a similar amendment not being pushed to a Division on that occasion, that he would, in due course, hold discussions with pharmaceutical representatives over the possibility of setting up an independent appeal mechanism on what they considered to be one of the most important central provisions for their well-being in the legislation. In good faith, the matter was not pushed to a Division on that occasion.

Recently, I wrote to the Minister for Health, because the pharmaceutical representatives are concerned that the implication in the Minister's remarks in Committee—that is, discussion—appears not to be the case. As far as they are aware, in their contacts with representatives of the Department, there is an outlook in the Department that some discussion would be in order prior to the tabling of any regulations coming from that part of the Bill.

The pharmaceutical representatives were disappointed. It is fair to say that they consider there to be a breach of faith on the Minister's part. Given the tenor of the remarks made in Committee, it is not what we would have expected tonight. The implication that alliance Members were left with was that the Government would table amendments to that part of the legislation. That was the impression that we received, in genuine good faith. On the basis of that understanding, a Labour Front Bench spokesman did not push the matter further. The Minister should be aware that the matter is causing concern among pharamaceutical representatives. I hope that he can put to rest the anxiety that they have expressed to us, and which I share.

Mr. Hayhoe: I made it clear in Committee that the Bill did not specify an appeal system. The details of the system were to be dealt with by way of regulations. Hon. Gentlemen will remember that I circulated, for the convenience of the Committee, the draft regulations which were prepared last autumn so it could see what was in mind. Indeed, that helped our discussions. I went on to say that I would look at the regulations again, taking into account the views expressed in Committee, the individual representations by hon. Members and the views of some outside representative bodies. I know that further representations are coming in. They were due in last week, but they have not arrived.

All those representations will be taken into account. The objective will be to establish a fair and objective appeal system that meets the needs of local people and takes account of what has been said. That assurance holds absolutely. I hope that the amendments will not be pushed. I assure both the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) and the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy) that the discussions will take place.

There was no commitment to bring forward amendments to the Bill on Report. The commitment is to bring forward new regulations embodying an appeal system which, I hope, will take account of what has been said. Different views have been expressed. Whatever system is set up, it must be monitored carefully. If it is not proven to be entirely satisfactory, there will be an opportunity for amending it at a later stage.

Mr. Corbyn: I am not sure that we have been given a helpful answer by the Minister. The issue about which he spoke and the amendment moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) go to the heart of one of the biggest problems in the Health Service—its fundamental lack of democracy and the neo-clandestine atmosphere in which many decisions are taken by the family practitioners committees. My hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras was talking about the need for a proper appeals system.

It is not good enough for the Government to introduce the National Health Service (Amendment) Bill which goes into considerable detail about the problems of pharmacies and the pharmacists' contract. I understand that there was much discussion in Committee about pharmacists' remuneration. Yet, when it comes to an appeal against a decision by the family practitioner committees, the world is silent and nothing is offered. There can be nothing more important than to know where to go if one wants to complain about one of those decisions. It is high time that the Minister accepted the amendment and told us what type of people will make up the committees and from where they will be drawn.

In the debate on an earlier amendment the role of community health councils was mentioned. They might have a role to perform in this respect, but the problems concerning the administration and structure of the Health Service are serious and the least the Minister could do is give us a straight answer to what is basically a simple question: is there to be an appeals system, or not?

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Does my hon. Friend accept that, if the Government had been wise enough to accept the earlier amendment and to vote with us during the last Division, we would not have needed to debate this matter now? We would have been satisfied that the consultative arrangement which we sought under the community health council amendment dealt adequately with the problem. The Government have brought this accusation upon themselves by once again refusing to accept an eminently sensible amendment tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson).

Mr. Corbyn: There is some merit in that intervention but, unfortunately, the amendment that the Government chose to defeat did not go far enough. However, I do not wish to be drawn backwards. We are obviously anxious to go forwards and to ensure that there is a proper system in which community councils would have a role to play.

The amendments are simple, but important and fundamental. As with all aspects of the Bill, we must await the election of a Labour Government to have a proper democratic Health Service and to end the sort of fudge and backstairs manoeuvre by which it is now run.

Mr. Dobson: Sympathetic though I am to the propositions of my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn)—having written them down myself—I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment made: No. 34, in page 5, line 28, at end insert—

Clause 6

SHORT TITLE, ETC.

Mr. Dobson: I beg to move amendment No. 61, in page 8, line 9, leave out 'three months' and insert 'one month'.

The Bill provides that the lifting of Crown immunity should come into operation three months after the Bill is given royal assent. As reasonable people, we all understand that sometimes it is necessary for a period to elapse before a Bill comes into operation because consultations need to be carried out and regulations need to be issued. In some cases it is necessary for the bodies that are covered by the regulations to make special new arrangements to cope with the change in the law, but in this case no regulations are required.

Ministers have told us throughout the discussions that Crown immunity provisions are being lifted from the food hygiene regulations, but that the change is gratuitous because health authorities are carrying out the provisions already without the law having been changed. There is no need for any regulations in this case. Ministers say that there is no need for any change in practice, policy or behaviour by the health authorities. In those circumstances, there seems to be no reason why they should have to wait three months before the law comes into force.

Mr. Corbyn: This amendment is an important long-stop. During this rather short Report stage we have found time and time again that the provisions of the Bill are subject to a later decision by the Minister. This is a feature of so much of this Government's legislation. The House votes and then finds that all that it has done has been to give a pen to the Minister. He can decide how the Bill will operate, where it will operate and who will suffer as a result.

The Minister was unable to answer questions on the appeal mechanism for family practitioner committees where pharmacy contracts are to be curtailed or introduced, or on consultations about the location of pharmacies, or on consultations with community health councils. We are awaiting the regulations dealing with the location of pharmacies and the surrounding issues. Therefore, it is not right that the Bill should be brought into operation within a mere three months. Six months is even a little tight. My hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) was a little cautious in providing for only six months in his amendment. It would be better if there could be a full year before the Bill is brought into operation.

In case any Conservative Member should say that the abolition of Crown immunity would be held up, there is nothing to prevent the Government from saying now that the provisions of the food hygiene regulations and the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974 should be deemed to be operative in NHS premises from now on. There is no need for delay. The least that the House can do is to accept the amendment. The Minister would then be able to think about the answers that he has promised to give to the House.

Mr. Hayhoe: The hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) seems to have been as inaccurate in his comments on this amendment as he was in much else that he said. The amendment proposes to reduce the period from three months to one month. The hon. Gentleman seems to think that the amendment proposes to increase the period from three months to six months. If his understanding of even that simple provision is as incomplete as he has now demonstrated, heaven help us if he were to try to interpret the more complicated provisions of the Bill.

The three-month provision was included in the Bill when it was published. Nobody can say that the Bill has been delayed. It was announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services in February. To carry it forward to Third Reading early in June is a fairly significant achievement. It would be unreasonable at this stage to change the implementation date. Therefore, I hope that the amendment will not be pressed.

Amendment negatived.

1.52 am

Mr. Hayhoe: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

This short Bill contains provisions on three important health issues. Clause 1 seeks to apply the food hygiene legislation to health authorities and thus remove Crown immunity from hospital catering. Clause 2 is concerned with the change in the arrangements for retail pharmacists to take up NHS contracts. It provides powers for family practitioner committees to grant an application for an NHS contract only in circumstances where it is considered as necessary or desirable for the adequate provision of services to patients. It carries through an agreement that was made by my predecessor and the industry. The new contract offers many benefits and is a substantial improvement on the current arrangements. Patients will have a service that more accurately reflects their needs, and some of the expected savings will help to finance the development of the pharmacist's wider role. The taxpayer will get some savings and better value for money.

Clause 3 puts beyond doubt the statutory basis for the longstanding and accepted practice of adjusting future payments to NHS contractors to offset past under or over-payments when considering remuneration. That is for general medical practitioners, dental practitioners, opticians and pharmacists.

The Bill has been debated thoroughly in Committee. I think that it has been improved by the amendments that have been agreed during Report and I commend it to the House.

Mr. Dobson: We welcome clause 1 of the Bill in so far as it removes Crown immunity from the food hygiene regulations. However, it does not go far enough and will not have a significant effect unless the Government provide the funds that are necessary for health authorities with inadequate kitchens to bring those kitchens up to scratch. We support in clause 2 the idea of rationalisation of the distribution of pharmacies. I can understand why a number of Government hon. Members are not keen on this proposition. It is because it explicitly recognises that the free play of market forces is worse than useless in determining the best locations for pharmacies. There are communities which want pharmacies but the free play of market forces may mean that they will not get them.

We support the licensing system that the Government are introducing. Even with its disadvantages, the Bill will improve the situation and we look forward to a better local pharmaceutical service. I make again the point I made on Second Reading, that we will never get the full benefit of the usefulness and the skill, training and education of pharmacists until they find some way of separating from the pharmaceutical side of the business the sale of rubber ducks and other such items.

Subject to reservations, we welcome the proposition contained in clause 3 and are glad that the law will be changed so that clawback will mean what it is supposed to mean and will not mean just plain claw, because up to now Governments have allegedly clawed back from contractors money that the contractors never had in the first place. That is wholly wrong and unreasonable and held to be so in the courts. My final point will commend itself to my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn). The Government have introduced legislation that has resulted in a number of elected local councillors being surcharged for the financial consequences of things they have done. Why has no one been surcharged for the financial consequences of the foul-up which led to the Department of Health and Social Services being taken to court and found guilty of wrong-doing by trying to get money to which it was not entitled? If people at one level of government are held responsible for the financial consequences of their actions, then people at central Government level ought to be held responsible. We would rather it was Ministers than civil servants. Subject to all the reservations that we expressed on Second Reading, in Committee and on Report, we broadly support the Bill.

1.59 am

Mr. Neil Hamilton (Tatton): I owe an apology to my right hon. Friend the Minister for Health and to the House, because I was not in my place to move amendment No. 17. That was because I was listening to the persuasive arguments of my hon. Friend the Deputy Chief Whip about why I should withdraw my amendment. The moment to move it arrived and I missed it. Had I the suspicious cast of mind of the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) I should no doubt have suspected a squalid manoeuvre by a Government Whip to muzzle a Back Bencher. As we know that the Whips do not indulge in tricks of that kind and as I have a rather higher view of the purpose of our Whips Office, I did not think that for one moment. The alternatives with which I was left were either to hold a press conference in a Committee room tomorrow morning or to make a speech on Third Reading——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not seek to make now the speech that he might have made had he been here to move his amendment. That would not be in order.

Mr. Hamilton: I stand to be corrected, but as I had intended earlier to confine my remarks to clause 2 and what is in the Bill, I believe that what I am about to say will be in order on Third Reading.

The effect of clause 2 is repugnant because it goes counter to the Government's philosophy of reducing state interference, monopoly and bureaucracy. On Second Reading, my right hon. Friend the Minister for Health said that the Bill's overall aim was to develop the pharmaceutical service, which would better satisfy the interests of the patients, the profession and the taxpayer and that the new contract would enable the family practitioner committees to make progress towards a more even distribution of pharmacies, which would better meet the needs of patients without being wasteful of NHS resources. Clause 2 seeks to achieve that by removing the current automatic right of a registered pharmacy to obtain an NHS contract to dispense NHS prescriptions.

We all applaud the Government's policy of getting better value for money in the NHS. Modest cash savings are claimed from what clause 2 introduces. There is plenty of scope within the NHS for making much larger savings than that. Waste is a byword within the NHS because of the absence of market disciplines and the signals which that gives. Therefore, it prevents a rational consideration of priorities.

The savings that I would have preferred to see are, alas, not included in the Bill and we have instead a net saving of, perhaps, £2 million, as the Government claim, for the effect of clause 2. But the price that we shall have to pay for those £2 million in savings, if we accept them, is the effective cartelisation of the pharmaceutical retail sector. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary, the Member for Wycombe (Mr. Whitney) said on Second Reading that by restricting the right to entry into the retail sector of pharmaceuticals we would not be restricting the establishment of a pharmacist, in practice, because a pharmacist can set up a practice without an NHS contract. I hope that he will not mind if I say that I thought that that was somewhat disingenuous because the average chemist derives 70 per cent. of his income from NHS prescribing and if he is not able to prescribe medicines on the NHS he will not be able to have a commercially viable business and so will not be able to set up.

Therefore, we see the baleful effects of the NHS monopsony on the monopoly among its suppliers which the Bill will create. In this way we shall buttress the inefficiency of the system and in so doing we shall create a new capital asset for existing contractors, one which has been recognised by the Pharmaceutical General Council for Scotland in the propaganda which it issued designed to encourage us to support what the Government propose. It said that the improved security of tenure would reduce the financial risk in the eyes of a bank because a competing pharmacy will be allowed an NHS contract only where it is necessary or desirable and the security of a loan will thereby increase.

The industry and its apologists accept that a capital asset will be created which arises out of the monopoly privilege which the legislation will give. That asset will be paid for, first, by the taxpayer and the consumer through inconvenience, and would-be pharmacists, through not being able to set up in business as a result of the restrictions.

The £4 million gross savings that that will bring about must be seen in the context of the total NHS dispensing budget of over £350 million a year. Even of that £4 million it is proposed to plough back £2 million into the system. But if the number of closures of existing pharmacies which the Minister wishes to encourage exceeds the 300 which it has been claimed will come about, those cost savings will be correspondingly reduced.

In some parts of the system we shall be increasing costs, because it is proposed to create up to 100 new quangos which will be charged with the duty of deciding who will be able to trade as a pharmacist. We shall be substituting the choices of bureaucrats for those of consumers.

Entrepreneurs build businesses by fulfilling a need or filling a gap in the market. The proposals in the Bill will frustrate such developments, because people will need a permit to trade. It will be difficult for the bureaucracy that will administer the system to anticipate future patient needs or the changes taking place in the retailing sector and thereby enable the market to develop and satisfy the consumer.

In effect, we shall be freezing the existing pattern of distribution of NHS dispensaries, inhibit the development of the retail trade and intensify concentration in the industry. There will be a great incentive for firms to expand by the acquisition of existing pharmacies rather than by setting up in competition and developing new pharmacies to take advantage of the changing demands and desires of consumers.

Several of my hon. Friends think that a Conservative Government should not be going along that road. The Minister claims that there is general support in the industry for the move that he has made. The local pharmaceutical committees contractors' conference in June 1985 overwhelmingly supported the Bill, but that is not surprising, because the conference is entirely comprised of existing contractors and they will acquire a capital asset and the competition to which they will be subject in future will be reduced. They have passed a resolution in support of the Government's proposals, but we can say, "Well they would, wouldn't they?"

Company chemists, comprising 1,500 pharmacies, have come out against the proposals and between 2,000 and 3,000 independent pharmacists who are supposedly represented by the Pharmaceutical Services Negotiating Committee are also against the Bill. In addition, the 34,000 or so members of the Pharmaceutical Society, who might wish to set up in business one day, are not represented by industry representative bodies and had no opportunity to vote or express an opinion. The president of the Pharmaceutical Society has attacked the proposals. He said:

"They have struck at the basic structure and operation of the entire pharmaceutical profession."

We might have chosen an alternative way to achieve the savings that we want to make in the system, but, alas, the Government have not chosen to go down that road. In 1984 the Pharmaceutical Society, the Rural Pharmacists Association, the Pharmaceutical Services Negotiating Committee, the National Pharmaceutical Association, the Co-operative Pharmacy Technical Panel and the Company Chemists Association proposed that by financial incentives and disincentives——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I hope that the hon. Gentleman is not seeking to make the speech that he might have made on Second Reading or at an earlier stage in our proceedings. He must address himself to what is in the Bill.

Mr. Hamilton: I believe that I am confining myself to what is in the Bill——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Chair got a different impression, so I hope that the hon. Gentleman will follow my guidance.

Mr. Hamilton: I shall follow your guidance with pleasure, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

I was seeking to explain why clause 2 is misguided. It contradicts what I believe to be highly beneficial principles of economic policy that the Government have embarked on introducing in other areas and, in that context, the proposal is mistaken.

I am aware that the hour is late, and I shall not expatiate upon that at great length, but in the clause the Government have indulged in a flirtation with Socialism, which has led us into a shotgun marriage. We have seen this all before. On prices and incomes policies, we embarked upon one system of regulation, which was doomed to failure, which encouraged us further down the road to regulation and which achieved the opposite of what we intended. We have seen it in relation to milk quotas in the common agricultural policy——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. There is nothing in the Bill about milk quotas. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will stick to what is in the Bill.

Mr. Hamilton: I was seeking to draw an analogy which is directly relevant to the system of regulation which the Bill will introduce. What we have seen elsewhere is what we shall see in relation to the provision of pharmaceutical services if the Bill becomes an Act. Costs will become insupportable within a nationalised Health Service, and th need for bureaucratic controls rather than market pricing, as we have had with milk quotas, will reduce consumer choice and increase costs to the taxpayer.

We have supped with the devil on this occasion. Instead of using a long spoon, as we should have done, we have been spoon-fed by the devil. I hope that when the Bill is considered in another place, their Lordships will do what they did last year on the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Bill and remove the clause, the better to provide for the needs of consumers and taxpayers.

Mr. Kennedy: Clause 1 is still drawn too narrowly and is too limited in its objectives and, therefore, its effect, although its provisions are welcome in their own right. It is a shame that the Government did not take this legislative opportunity to go further. I hope that their Lordships will try to extend the provisions of clause 1 and remove Crown immunity from hospital premises generally.

The Minister did not answer satisfactorily the point made earlier about the way in which the new contract for pharmacists and the right of entry into the NHS contracting base will operate. It has frequently been argued that there is bound to be considerable disquiet among unsuccessful applicants because of what many of us regard as an inadequate appeals mechanism. The Minister promised further discussion on the matter. In the context of clause 2, his remarks were a little woolly. He said that representatives of the pharmaceutical profession could make submissions to him, but he did not give the sort of commitment which we wanted: that he will sit down and discuss with the elected representatives of the profession the appeals mechanism that could be introduced. The Governmemt must give more attention to that matter than they have so far. I hope that the concept of an independent appeal will commend itself to Conservative Members in another place, who tend to be more fair-minded than those who operate from the Conservative Benches in the House of Commons.

On clause 3, the Government are not just storing up trouble, but amassing further power for themselves, although they have stressed that they have no intention of using it. I cannot understand why the Government are taking those powers in the first place if they do not intend to exercise them. That is not the normal practice of Government. However, they claim that they will not try on again their efforts to recoup what they identify to be excessive and unreasonable profits, as happened dramatically last year over the NHS dispensing costs associated with opticians.

The Government had to legislate only because they were taken to court over the considerable sums involved.

and were found to be acting illegally. It is particularly ironic that, because of an unfavourable court ruling, the Government have introduced the clause, but, to assuage hon. Members and the contracting professions in the NHS, they have informed us that they do not intend to use the very powers that they have gone to such lengths to grant themselves. We look on that aspect of the Bill with some dubiety.

In some of its provisions, the Bill is sensible. I think for example of the abolition, as far as it goes, of Crown immunity and of the recognition that there is a need for a rational distribution of pharmacies. However, the Bill does not go far enough, or indeed fairly enough in some respects, towards meeting some of the legitimate and sensible anxieties that have been expressed. We shall not oppose it tonight, but we hope that it will be improved further in the other place.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I have no intention of detaining the House. I appreciate the lateness of the hour, but I should like to support the arguments — without repeating a single one of them—put by my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton)

It is a tragedy that the arguments that some of us made on Second Reading were not pursued in Committee. We are having to consider them at a very late hour when we are under some pressure. The Bill uses public money to ensure the closure of hundreds of small businesses round the country. It rejects competition by allowing pharmacy practice sub-committees to maximise the distance between dispensaries to one kilometre. It sets up more than 100 new quangos and gives no indication of the cost of doing so or of how they will be serviced or will obtain the information that they will need about demographic changes and changes in the nature of their community in order to make their decisions. The Bill will literally destroy thousands of full and part-time jobs. It will diminish choice and force up prices as it will reduce competition for goods sold in chemist shops.

The Bill will do all of those things, and seems to be quite against the basic priciples that I would expect from a Conservative Government. I am sorry that those arguments have not been given proper scrutiny during the Bill's passage in the House, and I look to my noble Friends in the other place to make it a better Bill, and one more fitting for a Conservative Administration to introduce.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

Procedure and Ways and Means Motions

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): I understand that motions Nos. 2 to 11 are not to be moved.

2.26 am

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. May we clarify the position? On the Order Paper there are 10 Procedure and Ways and Means motions, and, as I understand it, the House is entitled to debate each separately and to divide on each—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The motions are not being moved. It is 2.20 am, and it is showing.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at the sitting of Wednesday 11th June, notwithstanding the provisions of Standing Orders No. 3 (Exempted Business) and No. 4 (Prayers against statutory instruments &c. (negative procedure)), if proceedings on the Motions in the name of Mr. Secretary Fowler relating to Social Security and on the Motion in the name of Mr. Neil Kinnock relating to Housing (S.I., 1986, No. 852) have not been previously disposed of, Mr. Speaker shall at Seven o'clock put forthwith any Questions necessary to dispose of them.—[Mr. Biffen.]

2.27 am

Mr. Terry Davis (Birmingham, Hodge Hill): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. May we ask the Leader of the House for a statement? The Opposition are expecting him to make a statement about matters that were raised earlier today—or, in fact, yesterday. We were given to understand that the right hon. Gentleman had come to the House at this late hour to make a statement about business. We are hoping to have that before we leave the House.

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I understand that discussions are still proceeding.

Mr. Davis: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Discussions usually take place through the usual channels. I am advised that discussions are not proceeding through the usual channels. It is the Opposition's understanding that the discussions had been concluded, to the satisfaction of both the Government and the Opposition. I understood from our half of the usual channels that we were not only to expect a statement from the Leader of the House, but that it was to be a most satisfactory statement.

If necessary, these discussions will have to proceed with the utmost dispatch, because I am sure that there is a limit to the time that you will allow me to make such points of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

I believe that the usual channels have now been unblocked and that some communication is being made to the Leader of the House. I hope that, even now— [Interruption.] I note that the right hon. Gentleman is about to come to the Dispatch Box.

Mr. Biffen: I understand that discussions are proceeding. Perhaps a Dyno-rod is a useful instrument from time to time, but all I can say is that just at the moment I have nothing further to add.

Rural Bus Services

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.[Mr. Maude.]

2.24 am

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth): I sought to secure an Adjournment debate on rural bus services because I felt that, although the Government are past masters at introducing sound legislation, I was not at all sure that they are past masters at selling some of it to the general public. I often feel that we have lost the propaganda war on rural bus services.

Littleborough and Saddleworth is a collection of small towns and villages nestling in the Pennines on the outskirts of Rochdale and Oldham. These villages rely very much on—[Interruption.]—public transport——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. I ask hon. Members who wish to have private conversations to conduct them outside the Chamber.

Mr. Dickens: As I was saying, Mr. Deputy Speaker, the villages in my constituency rely heavily on public transport. That is especially so for the elderly, who have no vehicles of their own. This being the position, I was greatly disturbed during the local elections when Opposition parties made it their business to circulate misinformation and indulge in scaremongering by pushing leaflets through the letterboxes of my constituents, which were disgraceful and in many instances entirely untruthful. One example bears the headline:

"Prepare for the worst. Your local bus may soon disappear."

It sets out all the instances where routes have not been registered.

The Government's deregulation legislation was carefully designed. One of the major objectives—this must be said, as it is no good mincing words—was to save taxpayers' money. In the old Greater Manchester council area it was costing £30 per head of population per year to run the bus services. In many of the shire counties it was costing only £5 on the same basis. That was crazy and there was a tremendous drain on the taxpayers and ratepayers in my constituency.

When the Opposition parties were telling the elderly in the villages in my constituency that they would lose their bus services, they neglected to tell them that in place of the large, single-decker bus that used to run infrequently to the villages, at times not linking passengers with the return buses for two hours, which meant that they had to spend a long time in the freezing cold or enter a cafe for a cup of coffee, for example — it was a deplorable service about which they were always grumbling—it would be possible for operators with taxis and minibuses to tender for the routes which other operators found less favourable.

Without question, the more profitable-looking routes have been tendered for and secured by the deadline. D-day for the buses to come into the new system is 26 October, at which time the small operators may be invited to tender for the less profitable routes. If they win the routes in proper tender the Government have made available £20 million in subsidies for rural transport areas. The operators will be able to take advantage of cheaper prices for diesel and petrol. In addition, the leaflets neglected to state that arrangements can easily be made for concessionary passes to be used for taxis and minibuses.

These issues must be brought to the attention of the public.

Mr. Tom Sackville (Bolton, West): In Bolton, which is not far from my hon. Friend's constituency, there has been a mischievous and misleading campaign — especially frightening for the elderly — about bus services being withdrawn later this year. No mention has been made of the considerable subsidy that will be available and of the considerable saving that can be found. All in all, that has been misleading. I am certain that it will turn out that no necessary, and certainly no socially necessary, bus routes will be withdrawn, and many of those fears will turn out to be ill-founded.

Mr. Dickens: I am obliged to my hon. Friend. That is the point that I am making.

The small operators can bid for those routes until 26 October. If they secure them, they have to give a guarantee that they will run them for a minimum of three months, so that there is security for the villagers. If they drop out, others can take their place. If we reach D-day for buses — 26 October — and the local passenger transport authority has not gone to the trouble of putting the routes out to tender, people can just take on those routes. I could get my lads to drive minibuses, if I wanted, or unemployed people could start a transport company of their own, as long as they maintained the high safety standards that we would continue to expect.

All in all, there are many frightened people in the villages. When one lives in a village, one is pretty isolated, and villages die without transport links. Even the youngsters start to move away if they do not have the proper transport, village to village, and village to town and back for major shopping. The matter is critical.

One can understand how the Conservative party took such a thumping at the two by-elections, because the local buses became a big issue. All the misinformation, scaremongering and myths created were ingredients for winning votes. One wins votes by fanning anxieties. If one can introduce an anxiety into somebody's mind, one confuses the person. He feels, "For goodness' sake, if the Conservatives are going to leave us without buses, I had better vote for one of the other parties." We were left in a vulnerable position, which was reflected in the opinion polls, which then started to reflect on the local government elections. So rural buses was a big issue, bigger than I think Her Majesty's Government realised. We lost the propaganda war because we did not sell our excellent policy.

I have said locally that what we are seeking to do is provide a more regular service with tailor-made vehicles of the right size, perhaps running more frequently, at sensible prices. They can take advantage of subsidies and low petrol costs. Concessionary passes can be used on those smaller vehicles. That can be done if the routes are secured through competitive tender.

It is time that we spoke up about the matter and started to sell our policies. I feel deeply that it is no good putting forward sound, sensible legislation in the House and then failing to explain in careful detail to the public exactly how it will affect them. I felt that the misinformation was a disgrace, so I applied for this Adjournment debate so that at long last we could start to forge through and win the propaganda argument and sell an excellent scheme. I hope to see the small buses running in and out of my villages with great frequency, to the town centres and between the villages, as they are in many parts of the country, happily and successfully.

2.33 am

The Minister of State, Department of Transport (Mr. David Mitchell): My hon. Friend the Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens) has admirably redressed the balance in the argument about rural bus services, and I am grateful to him. For far too long we have had one horror story after another put about by the Government's critics.

My hon. Friend referred to leaflets that were put out during the local government elections. My hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, West (Mr. Sackville) referred to problems in his constituency, where similar leaflets and attempts to deceive people have occurred. It must be a matter for great regret that the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mrs. Shields) is not here. If she had been, we would have been able to hear whether she just did not understand the bus legislation when she made it such a central part of her election campaign, or whether she did understand it and knowingly deceived her constituents into believing, as the propaganda that went around at the time suggested, that if services had not been registered, people would be without a bus service.

My hon. Friend the Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth has given us an opportunity to redress the balance. Party politicking is one thing, but frightening the elderly by deceiving them into believing that they will have no bus service is quite another. It is wholly reprehensible when parties play politics on the worries of the elderly.

To listen to people, one would think that we deliberately set out to do as much harm as possible to people who live in towns and villages and who depend on bus services to get around. One would also think that those bus services were doing quite well until we disturbed them. The facts, of course, are very different. There is a sorry tale of 30 years of decline. Our policies must be seen in their true historical context.

During the past 30 years, there has been a steady decline in bus services, especially in rural areas—rising fares have helped to create that—and a loss of passengers. Bus services have operated at a loss in their thousands. They have been cut, and villages have been left without services. Sunday services have been cut and there has been chronic decline. If anyone doubts that, they should ask the 10,000 National Bus Company employees who have lost their jobs what they have to say about the past decade.

During the past 10 years, subsidies have risen from £83 million to a massive £558 million. My hon. Friend spoke of reducing the subsidy as one of the Government's primary objectives. That is not so. The Government are trying to stem the decline. We accept that chucking money at it does not resolve the problem. If it did, the problem would have been resolved.

Our purpose is not to cut expenditure in the Transport Act 1985. We estimate that the £100 million spent in the shire counties is about the right amount. It is quite true that expenditure in the metropolitan counties has been wildly in excess of what any reasonable person would judge to be right and proper. There are mechanisms for cutting extravagant local government expenditure other than the bus legislation. Saving money and reorganising bus services are two separate matters.

The decline in bus services has been due partly to the growth of car ownership, but local monopoly and lack of competition have been enormously important in stifling innovation and enterprise. A fresh approach is urgently needed to to adapt to changing patterns of passenger demand. In his admirable speech, my hon. Friend talked of a large bus and frequent service. That is an example of how local monopoly has inhibited change and innovation to meet the market. We see passing our doors double-decker buses carrying only a couple of people, when people want more frequent services of smaller vehicles, which more nearly match the size of the market. If there are only two people, it is much cheaper to carry them in a taxi operating as a bus service.

My hon. Friend and I both recognise the tremendous need for bus services, especially in rural areas. Many people do not own a car and many families own only one car, which is used by the breadwinner to travel to work, leaving the rest of the family dependent on buses for the rest of the day. Our concern for such people is a major influence on our policy for deregulation. The 1985 Act was introduced to stem the ongoing chronic decline which year by year produced fewer buses to serve our rural communities.

As my hon. Friend is aware, the first phase of transition to competitive and deregulated services was passed on 28 February, when operators had to register those services which they intend to operate commercially after "deregulation day", which is 26 October. Unfortunately, owing to much irresponsible scaremongering from people who should know better, it is still necessary for me to stress that the registration of commercially viable services by 28 February was only the first stage in the abolition of road service licensing. My hon. Friend has given some examples of this black propaganda. Not so long ago, people were predicting that disaster would strike on registration day, with only a small fraction of existing services surviving the test of commercial viability. In fact, 75 per cent. of existing services have been registered.

That is an immensely encouraging result, when one considers the high level of blanket subsidies now being paid. Obviously, when we point out that the cup is three quarters full, there will always be those who try to turn that against us by complaining that it is one quarter empty. But local councils will now fill up that one quarter. They have the resources and the opportunity to do so. Anybody who has been led to believe that services which have not been registered will not be run have been deceived by those who suggested that.

Councils are at present considering which of the missing services they should direct their considerable sums of subsidy to purchasing. The new system of competitive tendering for local authority subsidy will ensure that local authorities will get more services for ratepayers' money than previously.

Only last week the newspapers reported that the Highland region—not an area which one would expect to produce a great deal of competition for tenders—has already reported savings of £179,000 of ratepayers' money. That is an encouraging, but not unexpected result which augurs well for the rest of the country.

Local authorities have sufficient funds to support socially necessary services, and the new requirement to go out to tender for services which need financial support will ensure that they obtain better value for money and can make their funds go further.

[Mr. David Mitchell]

For many rural services, minibuses, shared taxis and other unconventional solutions will suit local circumstances far better than a double-decker bus running down country lanes with only a few people on it. Indeed only last week I read that a new taxi bus service which has started in Somerset and replaced a conventional service, has been so successful that the operator is considering extending it. We hope to see many other taxi and minibus firms tendering for services or, even better, running them commercially.

Now that the registration network is known, there may be cases where people can see that there is a service that the lower operating cost of the smaller vehicle could make commercial. Although the registration date is passed, I would like such people to know that they still have an opportunity to seek a registration of such a service with the consent of the county council or the PTE. There is plenty of scope for new services to come in, and I hope that they will do so on the routes on which nobody has yet registered a service under the registration opportunity.

I can illustrate the sort of things that might happen. I understand that some 70 taxi-operated local services have already been registered to run from October. My hon. Friend will have seen the series of leaflets that we have already produced, and distributed widely. We have a further leaflet and booklet called "Getting on the Road", which we shall publish very shortly, offering advice to people contemplating setting up a bus service for the first time. Once we have got past the transitional period, which is necessary to ensure a smooth transition from licensing to registration, operators will be able to register services to start at any time from 26 January 1987 onwards with just 42 days' notice.

In this context, operators do not need to ask the consent of anyone to do it. They register their service, and provided that they have an operators' licence, with 42 days' notice, they can go ahead. We have already seen evidence of the enterprise which deregulation has introduced in Brighton, where taxi operators are planning to run a circular taxi-bus service to outlying suburbs late at night, and in Hampshire, where Hampshire Bus has reversed past thinking by increasing the frequency and using smaller vehicles on loss-making services in the Hythe area instead of giving up and reducing frequency. In many parts of England—in country towns such as Taunton and Exeter—as well as bigger cities, we are seeing minibus services spring up, giving the sort of frequent, rapid services that customers deserve.

My hon. Friend made a point about the transitional rural bus grant. We realise that it will take longer for the financial benefits of competition and tendering to work through in rural areas than in town and cities where the scope for competitive services is greater. Therefore, we have introduced the transitional rural bus grant, which will be worth £20 million in the first year, reducing gradually during the next three years. In the first year, the current year, operators of most local bus services will receive 6p for every vehicle mile they run in rural areas. That can tot up to a considerable sum. In addition, they get the fuel duty rebate, which is 74·5p per gallon for diesel and 88p for petrol. This demonstrates the Government's very real commitment to supporting existing rural services and encouraging new ones.

Just so that we have it clearly on the record, I point out that these sums are in addition to the subsidy that can come on a tender. The county councils and the PTEs are now in the process of preparing invitations to tender for socially necessary services for which any operator with a licence can put in a bid. If he gets that bid, and the route is in a rural area, he will get not only his 6p a mile, and on top of that his fuel duty rebate, but on top of that, a monthly cheque from the county council or the PTE for the agreed contract price for providing that service. This adds up to an attractive package which should be more widely known.

To help rural communities take advantage of the opportunities provided by the new services, we are providing the Development Commission with £1 million a year for innovative ideas and to help to get new services off the ground in the rural areas.

In conclusion, I share my hon. Friend's concern at the campaign of distortion and innuendo which is designed to alarm people unjustifiably and to turn them against our policies before they have been given a chance to work. Our opponents have had a field day because the transition to deregulation has left a period of uncertainty before local authorities have made known their decisions on subsidies and contract services.

I am confident that our opponents will be proved wrong. The proof of our policies will come after deregulation day on 26 October. People will see that their local bus networks have not disintegrated as the Jeremiahs predicted. They will see the benefits of deregulation in terms of competition in fares, wider choice on popular routes and innovative minibus and taxi services which will cater for their needs better than before. We shall win the argument where it counts—among the bus passengers in our cities, towns and villages. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving the House this opportunity to discuss these matters, even at this hour.

Perhaps when the next election comes around or when, in the autumn, services do not disintegrate as our opponents have predicted, some people may be courageous enough to stand up locally, to be reported in their local paper, possibly with banner headlines as were used in the scare stories, and say that they deceived people. Perhaps they will then accept that we have brought to an end the reduction in bus services which has been such a feature of recent years.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at nine minutes to Three o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Universities (Funding)

1. Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on future funding of United Kingdom universities, with particular reference to research and staff salaries.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. George Walden): As my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, North-East (Sir K. Joseph) announced on 20 May, the Government are willing to consider some additional funding for the universities provided there is clear evidence of progress in implementing necessary changes. These include the development of the policy of selectivity and rationalisation, better financial management and improved standards of teaching. Any new structure for academic pay will have to provide the necessary flexibility to enable institutions to recruit and retain staff of the required quality.

Mr. Hamilton: Is it not a shocking thought that after seven years of Conservative Government there should be talk about the possibility of closing one or more universities in this country? Does the Minister recognise that in the past seven or eight years the eight Scottish universities have suffered a cut in their financial resources overall of over 10 per cent. in real terms and that in the forthcoming academic year all of them will suffer substantial cuts? Will he give an undertaking on behalf of his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State that they will fight like tigers in the Cabinet for increased resources? A sickly smile will be no substitute for that.

Mr. Walden: I know of no plans to close universities. As for the position in Scotland, the University Grants Committee does not discriminate geographically.

Mr. Batiste: Does my hon. Friend agree that while it makes sense to link research funding to the excellence of that research, it necessarily implies that there must be fair criteria for selecting the quality of research and a fair method of appeal for those who disagree with the category within which they have been put?

Mr. Walden: My hon. Friend makes a fair point, but I draw his attention to the fact that these judgments were not arrived at haphazardly. They were arrived at not only by the UGC, but in consultation with the Royal Society, research councils, medical charities, other learned bodies and other very distinguished individuals. Therefore, I stress that the judgments were not arrived at lightly.

Mr. Freud: Is the Minister aware that poor pay and chances of promotion are the major factors affecting recruitment into universities? Does he accept that lecturers and vice-chancellors agree that there is a 24 per cent. fallback in cash? What will he do about it?

Mr. Walden: I shall not weary the House with the arguments about the so-called 24 per cent. cut in pay. I am looking to the future on this question, as I hope the hon. Gentleman will, too. As indicated by my right hon. Friend the former Secretary of State for Education and Science, we hope that the university authorities, vice-chancellors and the Association of University Teachers, will come up with some movement in the areas of flexibility, structure and appraisal, which will enable us to look again at academic pay.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Is my hon. Friend aware that the institute of agriculture at Stirling university, which has managed to raise more than £1 million of outside research funds, has a gold medal and has won two international prizes in the past three years for its research, has been described by the UGC as having a research department of average calibre and that, instead of having applied research, it might merge with the biology department? Is he satisfied that these people are able to make objective decisions, because, rather like the experience of my hon. Friend the Member for Elmet (Mr. Batiste), there is widespread concern about this and no means of appeal?

Mr. Walden: I should like to make it clear that the judgments of research quality do not reflect judgments of whole universities. For example, they do not take account of teaching. They are judgments made department by department. I go back to what I said earlier. If my hon. Friend does not expect the list of impressive institutions and individuals to which I referred to make those judgments, who else can do it? Certainly not the Government.

Mr. Radice: Why, after the Prime Minister's pledge at the 1983 election that the real level of university funding would be kept level, was the current grant cut by 5 per cent. in real terms last year and why, in the coming year, do universities face a cut of 2 per cent. in real terms?

Mr. Walden: Again, I invite the hon. Gentleman to look forward and not to hark backwards. I draw his attention to the fact that serious, positive and forward-looking discussions are currently taking place between the vice-chancellor and my Department.

Schools (Text Books)

3. Mr. Evans asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received on the report of Her Majesty's Inspectorate about the provision of text books in schools.

The Minister of State, Department of Education and Science (Mr. Chris Patten): My right hon. Friend has received no representations on what Her Majesty's Inspectorate has to say about the provision of text books in his recently published report on "The Effects of Local Authority Expenditure Policies on Education Provision in England". He has offered to discuss the report as a whole with local authority elected members.

Mr. Evans: Does the Minister acknowledge that the HMI report on Britain's schools confirms what many parents and teachers have been saying for a long time—that most state schools in England are desperately short of books and equipment? Does he further acknowledge that the new Secretary of State will have a mammoth task on his hands and will need much more public money if he is to correct that state of affairs before the next general election, when education will undoubtedly be a major topic?

Mr. Patten: I hope very much that education will be a major topic at the next election. I am bound to say that I do not think that it will redound to the credit of the Opposition when it is. The hon. Gentleman has been even more selective in referring to the HMI report than I had anticipated. The report is unequivocal, that in the majority of cases lack of money is not the main reason for shortages. The HMI report says:

"In nine-tenths of schools—

Mr. Evans: What about books?

Mr. Patten: The report says:

"In nine-tenths of schools it was the inadequate identification by teachers of pupils' educational needs and poor management of resources which were more telling factors than the level of capitation."

That goes for books, too.

Mr. Pawsey: Will my hon. Friend confirm that HMI said that more money and resources would not resolve all the difficulties in our schools? As a practical example, does my hon. Friend agree that in the Inner London educaton authority more money has been chasing a reduction in the quality of education?

Mr. Patten: As ever, my hon. Friend is accurate in what he says. If money guaranteed the delivery of quality, as I have said before, the standards in ILEA would be second to none. Unfortunately, that is not so.

Mr. Flannery: Is it not a fact that the revelations of the HMI report have alarmed the Government so much that the one for 1985 will be the last such report?

Mr. Patten: We have not seen the last of those reports. I am delighted that this Government actually publish them. If the previous Government had published those reports, they would have shown that between 1975 and 1979 spending per pupil on books and equipment fell by 6 per cent. in the primary sector and by 8 per cent. in the secondary sector in real terms.

Mr. Greenway: Does my hon. Friend acknowledge the need to get the right balance between the number of teachers and books used by pupils? Does he recognise that there are more teachers per pupil than ever before and that perhaps the provision of more books is needed in some areas? Will my hon. Friend also remember that modern technology has taken the place of many books, and that should be taken into account?

Mr. Patten: As my hon. Friend points out, local education authorities have often chosen to spend more money on equipment than on books. Anyone who looks at the figures for books and equipment can see that trend over the past few years.

Mr. Radice: Does the Minister accept that the HMI report is a clear warning to the new Secretary of State that inadequate levels of provision are threatening standards? If he doubts my word, he should look at paragraph 98. Does he agree that more resources and investment in education are now desperately required?

Mr. Patten: On a number of occasions, both in the House and outside, I have made it clear that if we wish to accomplish all our educational objectives we shall have to see more investment in the education of each child. I have said that again and again, and even on television in the presence of the hon. Gentleman. The hon. Gentleman should recognise that the HMI report makes it absolutely clear that it is important in the education service to make the best use of the resources that we spend. If we do that, we put up a better case for more resources in future.

Mr. Lord: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is now vital that all schools should publish annual accounts so that everyone can see precisely what is spent under every individual heading, including text books?

Mr. Patten: Yes. I invite my hon. Friend to take part in this afternoon's debate on the Second Reading of the Education Bill. I am sure that what he says on that will receive a warm response from me or my right hon. Friend.

Advanced Further Education (Funding)

4. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has any plans to increase funding for the advanced further education pool for 1986-87.

Mr. Walden: No, Sir. The advanced further education pool for 1986-87 was determined in November 1985 by my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, North-East (Sir K. Joseph) at £661 million. That represented an increase of 6 per cent. over 1985-86.

Mr. Kirkwood: In the light of the recent survey of employers' demands for graduates increasing by 4 per cent. annually, will the Government take an early opportunity to respond to the National Advisory Board's plans to reduce polytechnic intakes by up to 9,000 places? Is the Minister not now in danger of repeating mistakes that he has already made in universities in the public sector?

Mr. Walden: The allegation that the Government have a policy of cutting places at polytechnics was rubbish two months ago and it is rubbish today. There has been a great deal of selective quotation from the HMI report, and I, too, would like to make a selective, but truthful, quotation:

"Advanced further education still has some scope to provide for some further increases in the total numbers of students."

That completely undermines the proposals put around by the NAB secretariat and completely supports the Government's point of view.

Mr. Shearman: Will the Minister come clean? The fact is that the NAB secretariat, working on figures from his Department, is planning for a cut in the number of students at polytechnics of 9,000 to 10,000. That will mean even less opportunity for young people seeking higher education. Will the Minister announce more money so that these dreadful cuts will not take place?

Mr. Walden: I understand that the hon. Gentleman must go through all that again, but it becomes rather tiresome for us after a while. I invite him to read carefully the HMI local authority expenditure report, not on schools, but on AFE provision. The increase of 6 per cent., which I mentioned in my initial answer, which the public sector of higher education has enjoyed this year should be set against a projected inflation rate of 3·75 per cent.

Deaf-Blind Children

5. Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he intends to publish the consultation document about the education of deaf-blind children.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Bob Dunn): A draft consultation paper was circulated for comment on 1 May to the local authority associations, voluntary bodies and other interested parties. A final version will be issued to local education authorities, schools and other relevant bodies after the consultation exercise has been completed.

Mr. Ashley: Is the Minister aware that the consultative document acknowledged some important facts about deaf-blind children? First, it is difficult to make local authority provision for them becuse of their numbers. In some cases it is impossible to do so. Secondly, many of them are inappropriately placed in mental handicap schools. Thirdly, most of them have no communication whatever. They are deaf and blind, living in a world of total silence and darkness. However, the Government have produced a consultative document which is a scandal and which has been condemned by Sense — the organisation for deaf-blind children — and by parents. Does the Minister accept that the only answer is nationally co-ordinated provision? Will he take away this rotten document and rewrite it to ensure that there is proper provision for these children?

Mr. Dunn: As the right hon. Gentleman is aware, the placement of deaf-blind children, like any other children with special needs, is a matter for the local education authorities. It is true that we do not know how many children should be classified as deaf-blind. One of the objects of the consultation exercise is to clear up the terminology and establish a basis for estimating and for action.

Mr. Robert Atkins: Is my hon. Friend aware of the proposed closure of the Derby school for the deaf in Preston, at which some of my constituents have children? Is he further aware of the campaign to save this much needed and much valued facility in central Lancashire? Will he do all he can to ensure that this particular sort of education is continued for those who need it?

Mr. Dunn: I am aware of this campaign and I know how hard my hon. Friend the Member for South Ribble (Mr. Atkins) has worked for it. I invite him to come and see me to discuss how this provision can be maintained or improved.

Mr. Corbett: Will the Minister give the House an undertaking that, at the end of the consultation period, he can guarantee that sufficient funds will be available to ensure that there are enough qualified teachers for the deaf and blind in every part of the United Kingdom?

Mr. Dunn: There are at present no training courses especially for teachers of deaf-blind children. I believe that the future training needs of such teachers ought to be considered, and that is presently under consultation and review.

Mr. Pawsey: What representations has my hon. Friend received from the National Deaf Children's Society regarding the training of teachers? What are his proposals for improving the training of such teachers?

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend the former Secretary of State for Education and Science attended a meeting of Sense on 20 March. The training needs of teachers of pupils with profound multiple learning difficulties, and, in particular, deaf-blind children, will be reviewed in the light of the consultation process which is now taking place and will end, I hope, on 16 June.

Mr. Bruce: Following that last reply, when the Minister is considering his response to the report of the Advisory Committee on Supply and Education of Teachers, which proposed that the initial training for teachers of the deaf should be phased out, will he ensure that an adequate supply of trained teachers coming forward from in-service training is maintained?

Mr. Dunn: I can and will give an undertaking that we shall do our best to achieve that end.

Local Education Authorities (Resources)

6. Mr. Lawler asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what plans he has to re-distribute resources from those local education authorities with surplus capacity of school building accommodation.

Mr. Dunn: The Government's plans for local authority expenditure on education assume that authorities collectively will remove surplus places in line with Government targets. The grant entitlement of individual authorities is not directly related to occupancy of school places but will reflect changes in pupil numbers.

Mr. Lawler: Is my hon. Friend aware that we have a serious problem in Bradford? There is a growing school population and a third of school buildings are over 83 years old. That has led to overcrowding and a bad state of repair in many places. Will he take action to ensure that the £700 million, which was recently identified by the Audit Commission as being wasted on maintaining surplus capacity, is redirected to places like Bradford, where £17 million is needed to clear up the backlog of repairs?

Mr. Dunn: I look forward to visiting my hon. Friend's constituency of Bradford, North later in July. I recognise that much of Bradford has basic need problems because of a rising school population. That is why the authority has received the second largest capital allocation of any of the metropolitan authorities in each of the last two years. I look forward to seeing for myself the problems raised by my hon. Friend.

Mr. Madden: When the hon. Gentleman visits schools in Bradford, will he go to the one which was recently visited by the city's director of education, where he had to carry an umbrella inside because the roof was leaking so much? Will he also find the £1 million which is necessary to repair electrical faults in the city's schools and do something about providing more money so that more than three schoools can be redecorated this year? On that basis, it means that schools in Bradford get redecorated only once in every 100 years?

Mr. Dunn: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that helpful question. Progress in removing surplus places is a key to improvements in provision for repairs and maintenance. If authorities can remove places in the worst state of repair, maintenance staffs will have more time for the premises for which there is a continuing need.

Mr. Andrew MacKay: Is my hon. Friend aware that in areas such as Berkshire, where there has been a rapid increase in population, which has led to a grave shortage of accommodation in primary schools, we look with amazement and envy at other authority areas where there seems to be so much surplus accommodation which is being wasted?

Mr. Dunn: Authorities' grant entitlement is not directly related to the occupancy of school places, but will reflect changes in pupil numbers. If my hon. Friend would like to write to me on that point about Berkshire, I shall look into it.

Universities and Polytechnics (Resources)

7. Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what recent representations he has received about resources for universities and polytechnics.

The Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Kenneth Baker): I have received representations from the University Grants Committee, the National Advisory Body for Public Sector Higher Education, institutions of higher education, hon. Members and other bodies and individuals.

Mr. Dubs: Will the Secretary of State confirm that Birkbeck college of the University of London, which caters for 3,000 part-time students, is facing a cut of 35 per cent. in its grant this year — the largest cut facing any university institution in the country? Will he further confirm that it will be virtually impossible for the college to survive a cut of that magnitude? Does he care?

Mr. Baker: Birkbeck's grant for 1987-88 has yet to be determined. The UGC makes a block grant to London university and it is for the university court to decide how that is allocated between its constituent colleges. The UGC's weighting nationally for part-time students is only one of the factors that the court will need to consider. I understand that the UGC is visiting London university tomorrow, and I am quite sure that the funding of Birkbeck college will be one of the issues discussed.

Mr. Cormack: Does my right hon. Friend, who I am sure we all welcome to his post, have confidence in the competence of Britain's vice-chancellors? If so, can he tell us how many of those vice-chancellors are happy with the recent allocations?

Mr. Baker: Yes, I have confidence in some. [HON. MEMBERS: "Name them."] I cannot name them all yet. I do not know them all yet. I know some, and those I have met seem decent chaps. I have already met the Committee of Vice-Chancellors to discuss a matter to which I shall refer in my speech later today. During the next few months I shall be meeting many of them and the UGC to discuss the level of university funding.

Mr. Fatchett: Does the Secretary of State agree that it seems somewhat strange that the allocation of resources by the UGC to university departments is on the basis of research only, and that there is no reference to teaching? Is it not strange that we can have a section of the education system in which there is no regard whatever to the standard of teaching?

Mr. Baker: The recent report of the UGC on the relative merits of various types of research is a very interesting document. There was an exchange earlier about how it should be assessed. I agree with the hon. Gentleman that the document does not take account of teaching by universities. That must be considered in the full roundness of the funds that are available to universities.

Mr. Latham: Following the speech by the Under-Secretary of State, in which he said "enough is enough", will my right hon. Friend strongly confirm that the Government attach great importance to the university sector, believe it to be an essential national resource, and want to see it develop effectively?

Mr. Baker: I can certainly confirm that. The universities are asking for level funding for the academic year 1987-88. My predecessor made it clear on 20 May that the Government will consider additional resources if the universities demonstrate their commitment to the pursuit of improvement in academic standards, cost effectiveness and management efficiency. I reconfirm that pledge.

Mr. McNamara: When the Minister is talking to the chaps about the full roundness of the expenditure that he will allow, will he pay special attention to those universities that have suffered particularly badly in the past seven years? Based on the figures given by his hon. Friend, Hull university is minus 22 per cent. in real terms over that period. What will the Minister do to raise the morale of teachers in those universities and encourage students to go to them? Will he recognise that in areas of great depression and high unemployment a university is an enormous economic influence? Any cuts at such universities affect the whole community and not just the university.

Mr. Baker: The hon. Gentleman spoke about the university in his own town and I pay tribute to it. In my discussions with the university vice-chancellors and the UGC over the coming months I shall make it clear that I am committed to a very strong university sector.

Mr. Forman: I welcome my right hon. Friend to his new post. Does he accept that level funding for higher education in the near future has a special meaning for higher education in the sense that there is a relative price effect which requires that higher education should be slightly more generously treated than some other forms of comparable public expenditure?

Mr. Baker: I appreciate that point. It is important to recognise that there are ways in which cost savings can be made without seriously affecting the quality of education that is available.

Mr. Radice: I congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on his new appointment and also on saying that he is committed to a strong higher education sector. Does he agree that strength implies an increase in cash? Expenditure on higher education has been cut in real terms over a number of years and is being threatened with future cuts.

Mr. Baker: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his words of welcome. Over the period of office of this Government there has been an increase of some 80,000 students in higher education. When the hon. Gentleman next takes advertising space to comment upon the Government's higher education policy, perhaps he will say that in the Thatcher years there has been an increase of 80,000 students, and that the Opposition want a return to the Labour years when there was a cut of 2,600.

Mr. Wilson: Will the Secretary of State explain to the House why the English UGC gave the Scottish universities only 40 per cent. of the increase, small though that was, that it gave to the English universities? How does he explain this kind of discrimination?

Mr. Baker: This is a matter that I shall be discussing with the UGC.

Higher Education

9. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he is satisfied with the number and proportion of school leavers taking up places in higher education; and if he will make a statement on future trends.

Mr. Walden: The increase in the number of young entrants to higher education as a proportion of the relevant age group from 12·4 per cent. in 1979 to around 14 per cent. last year is very satisfactory. We hope that there will be further increases over the next decade.

Mr. Chapman: I welcome the increase and hope that the trend will continue. Does my hon. Friend agree that his figures belie the assiduously cultivated propaganda that apparantly fewer and fewer potential students can afford to embark upon courses in higher education? Does he further agree that, essentially, the policy must be to ensure the quality and relevance of courses in higher education for the needs of our society as well as for the edification of students themselves?

Mr. Walden: I congratulate my hon. Friend on his perspicacious remarks. The Government are trying to get both quality and numbers. Unfortunately, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State stole my best lines, but it is a good story, so I can elaborate a bit. We have now not only the largest ever absolute number of students, but the largest ever proportion of 18-year-olds in education. We have also a rising proportion of school leavers with the necessary A-levels and the highest ever numbers of mature students. That does not seem to be a bad show overall.

Mr. Sheerman: Will the Minister admit that a large number of students who, in 1979 and 1981, would have got into higher education, cannot do so now because of the cuts that the Government have imposed on that sector? The index of qualified students shows that that is the case. Have the Government not failed to provide places for students equally well-qualified as those in 1981? The Government's record is abysmal compared to the industria' nations with whom we compete.

Mr. Walden: The hon. Member's path to the Dispatch Box is paved with banana skins. As in his last supplementary question, that was last year's story. He knows, and I have just given him the details, that we are increasing the numbers and are proud of it. The age participation index, to use a technical term, is up. The qualified participation index, which means the number of school leavers with the necessary couple of A-levels, is also increasing.

Pupil Unit Costs

10. Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects the 1984-85 figures for pupil unit costs broken down by local education authority to be available.

Mr. Dunn: I am arranging for the information to be published in the Official Report.

Mr. Chope: I thank my hon. Friend for publishing the information. Will he confirm that expenditure per pupil is now at an all-time high? Will he further confirm that many of the low-spending authorities, such as Hampshire, are achieving the best results, and that many of the higher spending authorities are achieving the worst results? Will he take powers to ensure that any extra resources will be directed to those authorities that will obtain the best value for money with them?

Mr. Dunn: I welcome and agree with my hon. Friend's remarks. I can confirm that although there is an association between satisfactory levels of resources and the quality of the educational process, available evidence suggests that there is little correlation between levels of attainment, as measured by public examinations, and the level of spending on education.

Mr. Straw: Were the Government not planning to cut education spending per pupil in successive public expenditure White Papers, and is not the only reason why it has risen that Labour and other local authorities have ignored the Government's spending targets? If the Minister says that it does not matter what is spent per pupil, why is the Prime Minister claiming unto her own the record of the higher spending Labour authorities and boasting that educational spending per pupil is now at a high level?

Mr. Dunn: I take this opportunity to congratulate those education authorities which do well by their children, which seek value for money in education expenditure, and which spend moderately but wisely. I remind the House again that while there is evidently a link between expenditure and results, there is no correlation between them. If there were, the Inner London education authority would be so far ahead it would be out of sight.

Mr. Dickens: If I gave my hon. Friend a choice between a first-class teacher teaching in a shack and a third rate teacher teaching in a palace, what would his selection be? Anticipating his reply, I suggest that the point kindly illustrates that it is not resources and bricks and mortar that turn out good pupils, but the standard of the teachers in our schools.

Mr. Dunn: My hon. Friend, who is at least always populist in these matters, is absolutely right. I would always come down on the side of the quality of the teacher, because I have seen many examples of good teachers in mediocre surroundings doing extremely well, and the reverse of mediocre teachers doing badly in well-built structures.

School Buildings (Improvement)

11. Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what percentage of local education authorities have now returned completed survey forms concerning building improvement needs; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: Local education authorities were asked to return completed survey forms to my Department by 1 April 1986. At the end of May, 44 per cent. of authorities had made either complete or partial returns for the sample schools in their areas. In all, about one-third of the total number of forms due have been received so far. Authorities which have not made their returns as yet are being heavily pressed by my Department to do so as soon as possible.

Mr. Pike: Will the Minister assure the House that when this survey is completed he will respond positively and make funds available to local authorities to enable them to deal with repairs and maintenance of their school buildings? Does he accept that Lancashire county council has already proved that it needs an extra £44 million over the next five years to bring its schools into good order? Will he make extra money available now to Lancashire to deal with that problem?

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend's predecessor undertook to inform the House of the outcome of the survey, and I dare say that action and debate will follow from that. In response to the hon. Gentleman's question, I point out that Lancashire's prescribed capital expenditure allocation of £12·5 million was the third highest in England after Hampshire and the Inner London education authority, and represented 58 per cent. of the authority's bid against the average for England as a whole of 43 per cent.

Mr. Latham: While no Conservative Member thinks that there is a limitless pot of gold for this purpose, will my hon. Friend bear in mind when working out his allocation of resources that if maintenance work is left too long it becomes more and more expensive as the years go by?

Mr. Dunn: I agree with my hon. Friend. Between 1981-82 and 1984-85 spending nationally on the repair and maintenance of school buildings increased by 13 per cent. in real terms.

Mr. Pavitt: Will the Minister give special attention to Brent education authority and consider that authority's returns? For the past 15 years there has been such a dereliction of buildings that the expenses are now astronomical. As this is an inner city area and was rate capped for some time, does he accept that insufficient rate support grant is being given to allow the education authority to carry out the job that it wants to do?

Mr. Dunn: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point. The Opposition parties must bear a fair share of the responsibility for the decline in the repair and maintenance of the quality of our school stock. I am old enough to remember the time when a Labour Secretary of State for Education responded to the allocations of funds to local authorities with a bias against those authorities which would not go comprehensive as they were being forced to do. That was the start of much of the problem for many local authorities.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: On reflection, the Minister will realise that that is rubbish. The real point is that there is insufficient spending on school buildings. Unless those resources are spent, we shall have to spend more in the future. Will he accept that there is overwhelming evidence from the trade unions, the Building Employers Confederation and from HMI reports about the appalling state of our schools? When will he allow local authorities to spend some money and employ large numbers of unemployed building workers to put our schools into a decent state of repair?

Mr. Dunn: I must state straight away that what I said was not rubbish. It was true. We must accept that the state of our school stock is the cumulative result of inadequate spending on the repair and maintenance of the building stock over many years. The bias against Shire counties imposed by the Labour Government, supported at that time by the Liberal party, is one of the manifestations with which we have to cope.

Higher Education

12. Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what percentage of applicants to higher education gained admission in the years 1979, 1982 and 1985.

Mr. Walden: Information on the total numbers of applicants to higher education is not collected centrally. For universities only the proportions of those applying who were accepted for entry in 1979, 1982 and 1985 were 49·5 per cent., 45·3 per cent. and 46·9 per cent. respectively. Many of the unsuccessful university applicants will have gained admission to public sector higher education.

Mr. Ross: Is it not true that the numbers attending university have risen by less than 1 per cent. since 1979? Does that not compare unfavourably with our competitors in the Western world and Japan? Is not the great necessity that industry should have more graduates? What are we doing about that?

Mr. Walden: That was an interesting bundle of misconceptions. First, as I said earlier, British business is receiving more graduates. Secondly, Britain's record in producing graduates is not nearly as bad as the hon. Gentleman implied or as bad as the newspapers unfortunately often imply. Thirdly, although it is true that the number of students in universities has been broadly static since 1979, that must be viewed within the context of the massive expansion in the public sector system. I am sorry to hear Opposition Members, who naturally want to have a go at the Government, implicitly criticising higher education in this country, which has done an extremely good job by accepting more students for the same money.

Mr. Forth: Does my hon. Friend agree that if there are any difficulties, real or imagined, with the present grant system, it is high time he reopened the debate on introducing loans as an alternative to grants? Loans would provide a real incentive and give real equality of opportunity to those seeking places in higher and further education.

Mr. Walden: I have nothing new to say on loans today.

Mr. D. E. Thomas: Will the Minister reconsider his earlier statement that the University Grants Committee does not discrimmate on a geographic basis? Does he not accept that as a result of the UGC's funding mechanism, and his approval of it, there will be a geographic imbalance in university and higher education places?

Mr. Walden: I can only reiterate what I said earlier, that such issues cannot be decided on geographic grounds. The quality judgment of research at the universities of Warwick and York belies those who say that there has been a concentration in the south-east.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Craigen asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 10 June 1986.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I had meetings with minsterial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today. This evening I hope to have an audience of Her Majesty the Queen.

Mr. Craigen: Does the Prime Minister approve of the suppression of parliamentary debate on the conduct of affairs because she is frit?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman knows full well that various parliamentary tactics are used in all parts of the House. I do not recall the Opposition complaining when opponents of the Unborn Children (Protection) Bill used a variety of parliamentary devices to try to prevent the private Member's motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Brighton, Kemptown (Mr. Bowden) being reached on 7 June 1985. The hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) and the shadow Leader of the House participated in that.

Mr. Stanbrook: As one who received his first chance of higher education at Birkbeck college, London university, while otherwise in full-time employment, may I ask my right hon. Friend to intervene in the matter of its grant to ensure that it continues to do its splendid work?

The Prime Minister: Much as I admire Birkbeck college and its splendid work, my hon. Friend will be aware that I cannot intervene in the matter of its grant.

Mr. Steel: Now that [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Steel: Now that the Foreign Secretary and the Prime Minister's former policy adviser, Sir John Hoskins, have both advocated Britain's joining of the European monetary system, for how long will the right hon. Lady continue to resist it?

The Prime Minister: I give the right hon. Gentleman the same reply as I have given previously to the Leader of the SDP. Whether it will be received equally, I do not know. At present, there is no intention of joining the European monetary system. To do so would deny us an option that we have at present. If there was speculation against sterling there would be only two ways of dealing with it if we joined the EMS. One option would be to use up precious reserves, which could be done only to a very limited extent. The second would be by sharply increasing the interest rate. We would be denied the option of taking the strain on the exchange rate. I do not think it right to deny us that option at present.

Mr. Fallon: Has my right hon. Friend noticed that it is the well paid who affect disdain for tax cuts? Does she agree with me that the fastest way to get people back to work in areas of high unemployment like the northern region is through lower taxation, higher take-home pay and social security reform?

The Prime Minister: I broadly agree with my hon. Friend. Lower taxes is a long-term way of creating jobs and creating more incentive. There also is a great deal of equity in reducing the level of taxation on those of average and below average earnings.

Q2. Mr. McWilliam asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 10 June.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. McWilliam: Will the right hon. Lady take this opportunity to condemn those of her hon. Friends who denied my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) the right to express his opinion and have it debated in the House? Will she undertake to restore to Back Benchers an additional private Member's motion on Friday?

The Prime Minister: Opposition Members cannot bear from this side of the House the tactics that they have frequently used themselves. The House will recall that on 25 March 1965 the late Richard Crossman, assisted by his parliamentary private secretary the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell), dragged out a debate on planning to prevent discussion of a private Member's Bill introduced by the late Airey Neave on pensions for the over-80s. They were successful.

Mr. Hayes: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the Conservative party is the only party with the policies, the will and the determination to defend Great Britain against its enemies?

The Prime Minister: Yes, the Conservative party is the only party that has a clear, united policy on the defence of this country and would be a reliable ally in time of trouble.

Mr. Kinnock: On the matter of defending essential British interests, given the very high standards of engineering and technological skills in Rolls-Royce, and the great significance of that company for the manufacturing sector of our economy, will the Prime Minister now give us an undertaking that she will use the full powers of her Government to ensure that British Airways' huge engine order is placed in Britain?

The Prime Minister: British Airways has asked all three major aero engine manufacturers to provide quotations, as it usually does when considering the purchase of a new aircraft type. When it has completed its evaluation and has made a judgment about how many of the aircraft it wishes to acquire, it will put proposals for approval to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport. As the right hon. Gentleman knows, there are arrangements between General Electric and Pratt and Whitney and Rolls-Royce. The essential thing is that Britain wins its orders on merit and performance.

Mr. Kinnock: I fully acknowledge that. First of all, of course, it is necessary for British manufacturing industries to stay in business in order to be able to compete to win those orders. Does she recall that it was the Government of which she was a member who rightly rescued Rolls-Royce from extinction? Does she not believe that she should be much more forthright and positive in her determination to ensure that the interests of that company, its workers and its technologists are properly safeguarded now?

The Prime Minister: Yes, but the right hon. Gentleman agreed that to be efficient and thriving a company has to win its orders on merit and, in fact, Rolls-Royce does. Why does he not concentrate on the possibility of Rolls-Royce winning on merit? It is for British Airways to evaluate the quotations from the technical and financial point of view. Rolls-Royce supplies the engines for most of the British Airways fleet at present, and I am sure that this will be a factor in BA's judgment, but I hope that Rolls-Royce will win on outright merit.

Mr. Kinnock: So do I, Mr. Speaker. Is the right hon. Lady going to bat for Britain?

The Prime Minister: Yes, but one does not bat for Britain by protecting industries that would be inefficient. One bats for Britain by backing industries that win on merit, and that this Government have done with Rolls-Royce—merit.

Mr. Forman: Is my right hon. Friend aware that virtually all of us on the Conservative Benches support her desire to reduce the burden of taxation on those on average earnings and below? Does she agree that perhaps the most cost-effective way of doing that would be an extension of the earlier policy of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer to reduce employee national insurance contributions?

The Prime Minister: Yes, but I think that the better way is to do what my right hon. Friend the Chancellor did in his last Budget. He has concentrated enormously on raising thresholds. However, as my hon. Friend will be aware, there is a very sharp increase as one comes into the first pound on which tax is paid, which is very damaging to incentives. One has to consider all three: the thresholds, the standard rate of tax and the national insurance contributions. I am sure that my hon. Friend will agree that that is exactly what my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has done.

Mr. Mallon: Is the Prime Minister aware of the great concern caused by the very circumstantial suspension of the deputy chief constable of Manchester? Will she assure the House of her vigilance in protecting the integrity of the report that he prepared on Northern Ireland and the integrity of a good and professional policeman?

The Prime Minister: As the hon. Gentleman is aware, the Greater Manchester police authority has appointed the chief constable of West Yorkshire to investigate allegations that have been made. It would not be right for me to comment on the case or its implications while it is under investigation.

Mr. Cormack: Will my right hon. Friend accept that Birkbeck college, which she says she cannot help directly, could be helped enormously indirectly if the fees of mature students were made tax deductible?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is proposing quite a fundamental change in the tax system, and I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will have heard his question.

Q3. Mr. Patchett asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 10 June.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Patchett: Does the Prime Minister agree with her Secretary of State for Employment that the unemployed in my constituency have never had it so good?

The Prime Minster: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman would quote my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment accurately, which he did not do. [Interruption.] I understand that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment pointed out that those who are working have average earnings and a standard of living that are higher than ever before, but I shall add my own comment. There are occasions when sometimes higher pay for those in work is taken at the expense of putting more out of work.

Mr. Holt: Did my right hon. Friend see last night's "Panorama" programme on unemployment in Cleveland? If not, will she kindly do so and take instructions to ensure that Smith's Dock is not closed?

The Prime Minister: No, I did not see the "Panorama" programme last night. My hon. Friend will be aware that the problem with shipbuilding in this country stems from a shortage of orders, particularly for merchant ships. Unless there are more orders about, it will not be possible to keep all our merchant shipyards going. It is, of course, a matter of great regret that some of them have had to close.

Q4. Mr. Pendry asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 10 June.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Pendry: Will the Prime Minister find time today to meet the director general of the British Tourist Board? If she does, she will discover that as a result of her slavish actions towards American foreign policy, especially the mad-hatted and ill-conceived bombing of Libya, hundreds and thousands of would-be American tourists are not coming to this country, resulting in millions of dollars being lost to our economy. As that is the result of her statements and action, what is she positively doing to rectify the situation?

The Prime Minister: I hardly think that the hon. Gentleman's question is calculated to get more American tourists to come here, but I hope that they will return to this country, and we are doing everything possible to that end.

Mr. Hayward: When my hon. Friend considers the comments of the Leader of the Opposition, will she bear in mind that this Government funded the RTM 322 through Rolls-Royce, the European fighter aircraft which is powered by Rolls, the AV8B, which is powered by Rolls, the Hawk trainer, which is powered by Rolls and which has been sold to the United States, and the IAE 2500 engine, which is also partly owned by Rolls?

The Prime Minister: I congratulate my hon. Friend on his carefully rehearsed question. I hope that Rolls-Royce will win on merit. It does no good for the efficiency of British industry to protect it from foreign competition. That is the way to reduce our efficiency and ultimately to reduce our standard of living.

Q5. Mr. McNamara asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 10 June.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. McNamara: Does the right hon. Lady believe that France, Germany, Italy, the United States and all our other competitors, if placed in the position that is faced with British Airways, with a major industry having a major contract, would, under any circumstances, allow it to go abroad?

The Prime Minister: Rolls-Royce, as the hon. Gentleman knows, has arrangements with the two other big aero engine competitors which I have mentioned. An order for one often means a great deal of subcontracting to the other. I repeat what I have said. Rolls-Royce and other industries have to win on merit. If the hon. Gentleman wants universal protectionism, that will be bad for our exports and bad for our standard of living.

Q6. Mr. Watts asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 10 June.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Watts: Is my right hon. Friend aware that many successful small businesses in my constituency and elsewhere do not look to the Government for cash handouts, but wish to have better access to Government contracts, in particular, the £34 billion a year which is spent on purchases of goods and services? Will she take steps to ensure that such better access is made available to the small business sector?

The Prime Minister: I know my hon. Friend's concern about this matter. It is important that small firms are able to compete for Government contracts. I think that he is aware that the central unit on purchasing is examining, with purchasing Departments, small firms' access to Government contracts. We expect to receive its report towards the beginning of July, and I shall keep in touch with my hon. Friend.

Business of the House

3.31 pm

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. At the end of our exchanges at 3.30 pm yesterday on last Friday's lost business, the Lord Privy Seal offered discussions through the usual channels. Can he inform the House today of the progress made in those discussions with a view to restoring last Friday's lost Back-Bench Members' time? Meanwhile, and until those important matters are resolved, will the right hon. Gentleman agree not to move the motions relating to the Finance Bill on the Order Paper today?

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Discussions on this matter took place at a late hour last night and are continuing to take place through the usual channels. It will be the Government's intention not to move the motions relating to the Finance Bill at the end of business tonight but to take them tomorrow night. I am hopeful that, if the Leader of the Opposition asked at business questions on Thursday, it may be possible for me to give a positive response to the matter which the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) has just raised.

Dr. Kurt Waldheim

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is it in order for the Prime Minister to send a message of congratulations to Dr. Kurt Waldheim when he is

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is not a matter for me. The hon. and learned Gentleman must find other ways of raising a matter of this kind.

Mr. Janner: May I ask, Mr. Speaker, whether there is any precedent affecting the House

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. and learned Gentleman must find other ways of raising that matter.

Mental Handicap (Hospital Conditions)

3.33 pm

Mr. Dennis Canavan (Falkirk, West): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the need for an inquiry into the conditions of patients and staff in hospitals for the mentally handicapped in view of the revelations of the World in Action television programme which was broadcast last night."

Millions of people must have been angered and sickened by what they saw on television last night, and we in this House would be failing in our duty if we did not make some immediate response. The programme referred to the filthy conditions, the dilapidated buildings, the overcrowding, the lack of basic amenities and the severe staff shortages in institutions which are supposed to care for some of the most deserving people in our society. Reference was also made to the deaths of five patients and a nurse at the Royal Scottish National hospital in Larbert, in my constituency. As far as I can ascertain, no fatal accident inquiries were held into any of those deaths. The programme suggested that the staff shortage at the RSNH may have been a contributory factor to some of the deaths.

The Royal Scottish National hospital is not unique. Lennox Castle hospital, a similar institution, which is short of at least 200 nurses, was described on the programme as similar to a prisoner-of-war camp and little more than a warehouse for the long-term storage of human beings. Most disturbing of all, the Government have apparently known about those intolerable conditions for some time but have tried to cover them up. Last August, the chairman of the Mental Welfare Commission for Scotland wrote privately to the Secretary of State for Scotland about the Duich ward at the Royal Scottish National hospital in the following terms:

"This must be one of the worst wards the Commission has visited in mental deficiency hospitals in Scotland".

The Government's gross negligence and unforgivable failure to provide adequate staffing and other resources for those patients cannot be ignored by the House. I submit that the need for a public inquiry should have urgent consideration.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan) asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 10 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he thinks should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the need for an inquiry into conditions of patients and staff in hospitals for the mentally handicapped in view of the revelations in the World in Action television programme broadcast last night."

I have listened with great care to what the hon. Member has said, but I regret that I do not consider that the matter he has raised is appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 10. Therefore, I cannot submit his application to the House.

Football Betting Levy Board

3.36 pm

Mr. Tom Pendry (Stalybridge and Hyde): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to establish a Football Betting Levy Board with powers to impose levies on football betting and to allocate such moneys for the benefit of association football

The Bill, if enacted, would give real and continuing financial backing to our national game of association football which, as the House knows, is suffering a decline not only on the playing fields of Mexico but here in the land that gave birth to the game of soccer. My proposal is not a new one. Its origins go back to 1968 when the first Chester report was published, and possibly before that. Its concept was endorsed by the Royal Commission on gambling 10 years later. It has many advocates both in the soccer world and in the House, as my list of sponsors will demonstrate.

It is undoubtedly true that soccer has moved on since Chester and Rothschild produced their reports. It continues to be a fact that football is in a parlous financial state. That is not helped by successive Governments' greed in levying taxes on the sport. The Bill would bring about a practical solution to many of the game's problems, in line with a philosophy that should commend itself to the Prime Minister football helping itself.

There can be little doubt that the football pools' organisations are part of the football industry. The Government should be pleased that both exist, as the Government, against the advice of the Royal Commission on gambling, among others, increased its share of football's cake to 42·5 per cent. by way of betting duty in 1982. That was far in excess of that derived from horse racing or any other sport. The Rothschild report thought that a 40 per cent. tax was unfairly high. The yield to the Exchequer last year from such a levy was £221 million. That is certainly unfairly high.

A crisis is in the sport, and that is recognised by the Government. In fact, the Government's voice is probably among the loudest voices telling football that it must cope with its many problems but without doing much to assist it. The football world has moved on since Rothschild and Chester. Notably, and thankfully, the Football Trust and the Football Grounds Improvement Trust have been born. Both have done a great deal to fill a considerable part of the gap described in those reports. Both trusts are well respected. Many of those who support my proposal might have had second thoughts if the proposed levy board did not embrace the talents of those who currently administer those trusts. They should have no fears about that. I have no desire to impose on the sport a bureaucratic body with a structure that might be insensitive and costly to administer.

The pools promoters are anxious lest the current generous level of funding is used by a Chancellor of the Exchequer to fund the proposed levy board at the expense of their direct and indirect contributions. I recognise those fears. I would not wish to injure the genuine friends of football who over the years have done so much for the game. If we are to have a thriving football industry, Governments must not be greedy in their taxation policy, as they currently are. This measure would probably have been unnecessary if, over the years, Governments had not discriminated against the football pools punter.

Surely it cannot be right that the football pools alone have to pay the Chancellor 42·5p in every pound collected before expenses and prize money are taken into account. I envisage the board's funding coming from gambling on football. I hope that the Government will reduce the level of duty to help fund the board. If the Government reduced the level by 2·5 per cent. the extra duty imposed in 1982, four years ago about £5 million would be made. If the Chancellor eliminated VAT on spot-the-ball competitions, £4·5 million would be provided. Copyright payments for the use of football fixture lists would yield another £5·6 million. Without infringing overmuch on existing sources of funding, the football levy board would have more than £15 million to do what we all know is needed to enable our national game to survive into the 21st century.

Football has not enjoyed the same popularity within the higher echelons of Government as horse racing. Horse racing has an exclusive source of revenue through the Horserace Betting Levy Board, which does a good job for the sport. Soccer may not be the sport of kings, but it is our national sport, and it needs a shot in the arm.

The Horserace Betting Levy Board receives an income of about £21 million a year from the levy on bookmakers. Since 1980 the total income for that sport has been £96 million. There is a 10 per cent. betting levy on horse racing. Betting turnover is about £4 billion a year. It follows that horse racing is a much larger business than the football pools business which in 1984-85 had a turnover of £520 million, more than £200 million of which went back to the Exchequer.

One could argue that there would be less need for my Bill if the Government recognised those facts. It is undoubtedly true that the Government take more from football than they put in. As a branch of the entertainment industry, football makes a substantial net contribution in VAT payments. Some clubs small in number pay corporate tax on profits. All make PAYE and DHSS contributions for their employees. Those payments plus the rates to local authorities and the cost of policing are a tidy sum. None of those payments is unique to football. What is unique is the high level of betting duty on the football pools money which is considered by those involved in football to be the football industry's money.

Football is being discriminated against, and is under-helped in relation to horse racing and the needs of football and wider participation in the sport. About 1 million play the game and more than that number watch it. We believe that our national game deserves a better deal. If the Bill is passed, we shall look to the football levy board to assist football to overcome many of its problems and to adopt a 21st century approach. We all want improvements with respect to grounds, the covering of terraces, the installation of more seating and adequate refreshment facilities. We need at least 12 new football stadia which are showpieces along 21st century lines. Imagine the World cup hosted by Britain. A national stadium in each home country is necessary. We have been told that, once more, Wembley will be given a facelift, but we shall believe that when we see it. We need closed circuit television on all grounds to combat the hooligan element.

I hope that the House will accept the arguments that I have outlined, not least because it is my birthday today, and that it will support my Bill.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Tom Pendry, Mr. Denis Howell, Mr. Peter Pike, Mr. Tony Banks, Mr. Roger Stott, Mr. Stuart Bell, Mr. John Cartwright, Mr. John Carlisle, Mr. Jim Lester, Mr. Robert Hicks, Mr. David Knox, and Mr. Michael Knowles.

Football Betting Levy Board

Mr. Tom Pendry accordingly presented a Bill to establish a Football Betting Levy Board with powers to impose levies on football betting and to allocate such moneys for the benefit of association football: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon 4 July and to be printed. [Bill 172]

Orders of the Day

Education Bill [Lords]

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. Speaker: Before I call the Secretary of State for Education and Science, I must announce to the House that I have selected the amendment in the name of the Leader of the Opposition. A large number of hon. Members are seeking to take part in this debate, and I therefore intend, between 7 o'clock and 9 o'clock, to impose the 10 minute limit on speeches.

3.47 pm

The Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Kenneth Baker): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

Before referring to the Bill, I would like to pay tribute to my predecessor, my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, North-East (Sir K. Joseph). During the tenure of this office he instituted major reforms in our education system, many of which have been widely welcomed by the educational world. To his credit stands the GCSE and the reform of initial teacher training. But above all his contribution was the White Paper "Better Schools" in which he raised to the very centre of the educational debate the whole question of standards and quality of teaching and pointed a way forward. He made a remarkable contribution to the education policy of our country.

Education has now become more important than at any time in the past. To a large extent, our national future depends on it. The pressure of international competition and the relentless advance of technology make it inevitable that we demand more from our education system. It needs to perform better because our situation requires it. Fortunately, there are many points of strength in our system. Many schools do admirable work. But it is now essential that that should become true for every school. We have no choice but to make it the aim of our policies. The Bill is important because it takes these polices forward.

The Bill is based upon the White Paper "Better Schools". It is an important Bill, because it gives new impetus to the Government's policies for raising the standards achieved by all pupils in our schools. Those policies are all concerned with quality — that is, what pupils actually achieve. We are working to provide every pupil, of whatever ability, with an education which fits him or her for adult life in today's world.

Three major steps forward are in hand. First, on the curriculum, we want to provide for all pupils a curriculum which develops their talents and prepares them for responsible citizenship and for finding a job in a competitive technological age. Secondly, we are reforming the examination system — the GCSE, which will be introduced this autumn and will make the 16-plus examination better serve the needs of pupils, teachers and the employers and raise standards of attainment. I want to return to that examination later. Thirdly we are improving teaching quality. The newly established council — the Council for the Accreditation of Teacher Education—is setting in hand a radical reform of initial teacher training.

These are the steps which are in hand. We operate through a decentralised school system; and I believe in such a diffusion of power. It is right to devolve responsibility even in a national service such as education. I have been asked frequently during the past few days whether I favour adopting the French centralised system. I want to make it clear that I do not. I think that all of society, not just our education system, can be happier and more stable if more is done at the rim of the wheel and less at the hub. This process, however, can go further, beyond the level of the local education authority to the level of the school and the community served by each school. At present, we have not got right either the balance of responsibility between central and local government or, more importantly, the balance between the LEA and all those other interests that give life to a school. Moreover, the present distribution of responsibilities varies in a haphazard and rather bizarre fashion from place to place and it is often unclear, even to those most closely concerned. The diffusion of power no longer works properly. Diffusion has become confusion.

The Bill gives a new vitality and a new clarity to our decentralised system of school education. The Bill does not change the features of the system that are working well. It preserves the particular nature of aided and special agreement schools. Such schools already have that separate identity which is a prerequisite for effectiveness. For that reason, the Bill affects neither the composition of their governing bodies nor, except for some additions, their functions. Those schools work well, and we should leave well alone.

The first main purpose of the Bill is to change the arrangement for governing bodies of schools so that parents and local community interests have a greater say. In that way governing bodies will have real identity and that sense of purpose which was always the intention of the Education Act 1944 but which has not happened. I remind the House that the 1944 White Paper said:

"Every school of whatever type or category must have an individual life of its own as well as a place in the local system".

The 1944 Act intended each school's identity to pivot round an effective governing body, but the practice has been far from the ideal. In county, controlled and maintained special schools, governing bodies are dominated by people appointed by the LEA, their powers are unclear and often ineffective, particularly in relation to the LEA, despite the valuable start made through the Education Act 1980, governing bodies do not yet adequately inspire or harness parental concern for their children's progress, the relationship between the governing body and the head teacher is often unclear and unfruitful.

The Bill therefore radically changes the composition of those governing bodies. It also gives the governing bodies new duties, powers and responsibilities which will apply to all of them. As regards the composition of such governing bodies, part II of the Bill ends the dominance of the LEA — no single interest will predominate; gives equal representation to elected parent governors and to governors appointed by the LEA; preserves existing rights of representation of the head and other teachers, voluntary foundations and minor authorities; and provides for a new category of co-opted governors.

The new category of co-opted governors is important. Co-opted governors allow a governing body to become more broadly based and reflect the interests of the wider community served by the school. I am particularly keen to get more business men and business women interested in the schools that serve their community. Many hon. Members on both sides of the House will have heard business men and business women criticise the school system and say that the children whom they are turning out are not numerate or literate. I always respond robustly to such comments, and ask the business men and women when they last went into a school and discussed with teachers what was being taught and discussed with the children what they were learning. I recognise that many business people serve as school governors, but the governing body of every school should have on it someone from the local business community. Therefore, we shall introduce amendments to ensure that local industry and commerce are represented on governing bodies.

Having more elected parent governors is good, but not sufficient. In addition, all governors will have to report to the parent body. Clauses 26 and 27 require the governors to prepare an annual report and to submit it to a parents' meeting. At that meeting the parents as a whole can make known their views about standards and other sensitive issues, which individually they may find difficult to put forward. Individual parents will also have a right to be informed about what their children are being taught. They will be involved in much wider issues such as the possibility of political bias, the nature of the sex education that is being provided, and the wider question of crime prevention. Parents will, therefore, be able to influence the way in which their children's school develops. That is a powerful extension of parental choice, and I hope that it will lead to a much greater understanding between schools and parents.

I now deal briefly with the duties and responsibilities of the governing body and the duties and responsibilities of the head teacher. Those two are critically important parts of the education system. Under clause 15, the governing body will be responsible for the general conduct of the school. Under clause 21, it will have general oversight of discipline. Under clauses 30 and 37, the governing body will be involved in the selection and dismissal of staff and, in particular, the crucial appointment of the head teacher. Under clause 17, the governing body will be obliged to publish a statement of its policy for the school's curriculum. The governors must consider the local education authority's curricular policy, but they may, for the purposes of this statement, modify it as they judge right, after receiving advice from the head. Under clause 25, the governing body will be given both information about the school's running costs and power to spend the money which the LEA will be required to allocate to it for books, equipment and stationery. For the first time the governing body will have a financial statement before it. That is a tremendous step forward.

Mr. Ken Weetch (Ipswich): Before the Secretary of State leaves the point about the power and authority of headmasters, will he consider the point that if a headmaster excludes from his school a pupil who is recalcitrant and difficult, under these clauses the local education authority can compel him to take that pupil back, although the school could be disrupted and his authority wholly undermined? Does the Secretary of State intend to retain that provision, or will he alter it?

Mr. Baker: I shall deal directly with that point in about two or three minutes when I deal with discipline.

To return to the financial position, a financial statement will be prepared which the governing body will have and which will also be made available to the entire parent body. The governing body will also be able to spend money on specific items such as books, equipment and stationery. The LEA will also be free to increase this discretion to other items, and I intend to encourage that. The experiments made by such LEAs as Solihull and Cambridgeshire of devolving more control to the school is a pattern which I would like to see extended. In connection with these finance provisions, I should like to pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Bedfordshire, South-West (Mr. Madel), whose private Member's Bill last Session foreshadowed some of these proposals.

The Bill makes an important change concerning the appointment of head teachers. There will now be a selection panel which examines the candidates. It will no longer be possible for an LEA to foist upon a governing body the head teacher which the LEA may particularly want. I am keen to increase the role and influence of the head. Under clause 17 the head will determine the curriculum for the school, which must be compatible with the curricular policies of the LEA or with the policies as modified by the governors. He will be solely responsible for organising the curriculum which he has determined. Under clauses 30 to 37, the head must be consulted on all matters affecting his staff, and he will have real responsibilities, under clause 21, for discipline. I hope that this will enhance and increase the role of the head teacher in our schools.

Discipline cannot be separated from education. Without discipline in a school, no learning can take place. The Bill deals with discipline, and accepts the fact that one cannot leave discipline to the elected councillors on the education authority – it is the special prerogative of the head and the governing body. I should like to deal with two aspects of discipline: first, corporal punishment, and then the expulsion of pupils. The House of Lords in its debate amended clause 21 with the intention of abolishing corporal punishment in the state sector. The Bill does not completely achieve that, and there would have to be drafting amendments to achieve that purpose fully.

Each hon. Member will have his views about whether corporal punishment should be retained as a sanction available to the head in maintaining order in his school. Corporal punishment is now used much less than it used to be. In Scotland abolition has long been the policy. As a result corporal punishment has largely disappeared there. About a quarter of the English authorities have a policy against the use of corporal punishment. But for many schools the head and the governing body believe that it should be retained as a sanction, and it is strongly felt that to deny them this would weaken their position. Taking account of all the circumstances, we believe that the whole House should decide whether corporal punishment should be retained and my right hon. Friend the Patronage Secretary proposes that Members on this side of the House should be allowed a free vote on the question. If the decision is for abolition, that would extend also to Scotland.

However, as Secretary of State for Education, I think it would be appropriate for me to make my personal views known. I think that the retention or the abolition of corporal punishment should essentially be a decision for the governing body, the head and the parents and if they wish to retain it in a particular school they should be allowed to do so. They would have that denied to them should the House decide to abolish corporal punishment altogether in the state sector. Accordingly, I intend to vote for the retention of corporal punishment on the understanding that it will be decided at a local level. Should that view prevail in the House, I would expect the new governing bodies in England and Wales, which of course will now have much higher parent representation, to agree with the head a suitable arrangement which would recognise the finding of the European Court of Human Rights that the philosophical convictions of any parent should be respected. I would monitor these arrangements closely, and if philosophical convictions are not being respected I should then have to consider giving parents a legal right of exemption. I do not believe for one moment that corporal punishment is the ultimate sanction in a school, but there have to be sanctions against bad behaviour otherwise a head and a governing body have no power. Children need to work within a formal structure. If that structure collapses, no learning can take place and the children themselves are confused and bewildered.

The ultimate disciplinary sanction is expulsion. I come to the point made by the hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Weetch). The House will recall the Poundswick school case where the headteacher decided to suspend five boys who were alleged to have painted graffiti attacking and undermining the teaching staff. This led to a dispute between the governing body, which did not want the boys readmitted, and the LEA, which eventually forced the governors to readmit them. What is at issue is not only the LEA's duty to see to it that each child finds a place at school but also whether the school can educate a child so placed at it without damage to all its work.

Under the Bill as drafted the governing bodies have a right to exclude a pupil, which can be overridden by the LEA. I intend to strengthen the position of the governing body in such a case where there is a difference of opinion between it and the local education authority. I intend to introduce an amendment to propose a right of appeal for the governing body or the parent. [HON. MEMBERS: "Appeal to what?"] To the appeal committees which will be set up and which will operate locally on the admission of and selection of schools for children.

Mr. Fred Silvester (Manchester, Withington): This is an extremely important matter in Manchester. Will my right hon. Friend be clear about this? I thought that the appeal committee was, in fact, substantially under the control of the local education authority. Therefore, we are going round in circles. I thought that it was understood in another place that the amendment was intended to be a reference to the Secretary of State.

Mr. Baker: I will certainly consider what my hon. Friend has said. Although the appeal committees are appointed by the LEA, none the less they reject between a third and a half of the appointments made by the LEA. They have established a degree of independence, but if there was a further strengthening of that independence I would be happy to consider that in Committee. I am keen to ensure that there is a clear appeal procedure against the right of the LEA to assert its position when the standing of the head or the governing body is in question.

Mr. Cyril Smith (Rochdale): I back strongly what the hon. Member for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Silvester)

has said. I have had considerable experience of appeal bodies on admissions. The hon. Member is correct in saying that the teachers are appointed by the local authority and, while a proportion of the cases are rejected, I urge the Minister to consider whether that proves what he says it proves. I do not believe that it does.

Mr. Baker: If there is disquiet about this, I shall respond sympathetically in Committee. I am keen to establish an appeal system. We may have to establish a separate appeal system, and I am prepared to consider it on that basis.

May I deal now with another matter that was introduced in another place, the clauses relating to political indoctrination, clauses 16 and 39? The principle is not in dispute. There is no place for political indoctrination in our schools. But it is inevitable that issues of a political character will arise in many areas of the curriculum; and it is right that these should be dealt with responsibly and objectively so that our children are helped to be good citizens. We owe it to our children to ensure that the Bill is in this respect as effective as it can be in preventing political indoctrination.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough and Horncastle): Is my right hon. Friend aware of the concern in some quarters that the rightful insistence that politically contentious matters should be dealt with in a non-partisan way may lead to the erroneous impression that discussion of parliamentary democracy should be balanced with advocacy of anti-democratic, Fascist or Marxist views? Can my right hon. Friend confirm that that is not his view and that the Bill will not allow this to happen?

Mr. Baker: My hon. Friend has referred to clause 39 and not to clause 16. Clause 16 provides the important protection and clause 39 is concerned with balance. I sympathise with my hon. Friend, and I can do no better than quote what my right hon. Friend the former Secretary of State said to the National Council of Women on 3 March 1984:

> "Schools have, among other tasks, the job of familiarising pupils with the values which define our society. We are surely right to expect our schools not to encourage pupils to take a favourable view of notions which are wholly alien to our society — for example that Government should be other than Parliamentary or that the rule of law should be abrogated."

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): Does the right hon. Gentleman intend to leave in these two clauses, which were introduced in the Lords, or seriously to modify them?

Mr. Baker: My intention is to leave them in.

Mr. Nicholas Baker (Dorset, North): When my right hon. Friend considers these clauses, will he carefully study the information which is put about by the British Youth Council? I am sure that my right hon. Friend will agree that it is right that young people should study how a society is organised, the politics of it, and how political parties are organised. The literature which I have before me encourages young people to study the politics of minority pressure groups, and indeed the politics of protest. Surely that is not part of political education.

Mr. Baker: I am not familiar with that literature, but I should be grateful if my hon. Friend would send it to me. If the literature is on the lines described by my hon. Friend, it has no place in the operation of schools.

I come to another matter which was introduced in the House of Lords, clause 24, which requires sex education to be provided, as far as is reasonably practical, in a way which encourages > "pupils to have due regard to moral considerations and the value of family life".

I am very glad that this clause has been added to the Bill. There has been sex education in schools now for a number of years and I have no doubt that it has been generally beneficial, but it is very important for us to remember that sexual relationships should be taught and understood only as an element of wider personal relationships. It is not enough just to teach the knowledge of the physical mechanics of sex or the hygiene of sex. It must also involve loving, caring and sharing. I recognise that many schools have set sex education in a moral framework, but this does not appear to have happened in all cases.

It is crucial to emphasise the moral dimension as well as the value of family life. I recognise that this is a difficult task for teachers, and parents must be involved. We will shortly be publishing a draft circular on sex education at school. It will emphasise that parents should be given the opportunity to see for themselves the teaching materials to be used. I also think it is very important that pupils should be helped to recognise the physical and emotional risks of sexual promiscuity.

I recognise that it is very difficult to legislate in this matter, but I think that it is important for the House of Commons and the House of Lords to give a clear signal reinforcing the institution of marriage as the foundation of a healthy family life and the very bedrock of our civilisation. And we really owe it to the next generation to do everything we can to build up the children's respect for a happy family life. I hope that this clause will do that.

What really matters is what is said by the teacher in the class to his or her pupils, both boys and girls, but I draw some encouragement from the statement made by Lord Denning in the other place when he said of this amendment:

> "It is not merely a pious aspiration, it is a duty which can be enforced by law if need be. I hope it never has to be. But this is a valuable provision to have". — [Official Report, House of Lords, 2 June 1986; Vol. 475, c. 568-72.]

May I deal with one other matter which was debated in the other place—the difficult but very important issue of safeguarding freedom of speech in higher education. The House will be aware that an amendment was tabled by the Government on this matter, but that it was not proceeded with in the other place, after a commitment to bring forward an amendment in this House. I think that there is considerable public unease about the way in which certain people have been denied the right of freedom of speech at some universities and polytechnics.

I am aware that such occurrences touch only a small proportion of the many meetings that take place on campuses, but many people find unacceptable the infringement of free speech in a university or polytechnic. Universities are rightly regarded as the very quintessence of intellectual freedom. Indeed, I have been told that one of the reasons why there should be lifetime tenure for dons is that this ensures them the intellectual freedom and independence which they need to pursue their lives in the universities. They cannot demand it for themselves if it is not provided for other people, and there is no doubt that the no-platform policies of certain student unions have denied the right of the freedom of expression to certain people. Members of this House have been excluded from universities and physically threatened and attacked. A Jewish society has been denied access to the rooms and facilities of a student union on the ground that the society supports Zionism, and Zionism is alleged to be racist.

Such campus censorship is unacceptable. We propose to move amendments which will safeguard freedom of speech in higher education. The House will then be able to consider the various issues of principle and practice which arise. I have already discussed with the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals, the directors of polytechnics and others the form of the provision that might best secure and further our objectives. But I have made it clear that present circumstances are not acceptable.

Mr. John Carlisle (Luton, North): Will my right hon. Friend give the House an absolute assurance that his and his colleagues' resolve on this extremely important matter will not weaken? The measures that he has announced will be welcomed on the Conservative Back Benches. Will he ensure that vice-chancellors understand the deep distress that has been caused to hon. Members and others by the antics of these hooligans and that it is in their self-interest to stiffen their disciplinary procedures, which must include the expulsion of students if necessary?

Mr. Baker: The speeches that my hon. Friend has not been allowed to make could fill volumes.

Mr. Mark Fisher (Stoke-on-Trent, Central): Nobody would want to read them.

Mr. Baker: Whether people want to read them is not the point. The point is that my hon. Friend should be allowed to speak if he wants to. We must remember what Voltaire said—

"I disapprove of what you say, but I will defend to the death your right to say it."

That principle becomes all the more important when it is denied in our universities and polytechnics.

Mr. Clement Freud (Cambridgeshire, North-East): Does the Secretary of State agree that it seems strange to people outside the House that, with the consent of the Patronage Secretary and the Prime Minister, an hon. Member was denied the freedom of speech on Thursday night, but the right hon. Gentleman is now campaigning for it in the universities? What is the difference?

Mr. Baker: That is the first intervention I have heard from the Liberal spokesman on education since I have held my present office. I only hope that the quality of his future interventions is better.

Mr. Tony Baldry (Banbury): My right hon. Friend referred to student unions banning free speech, but we must also consider vice-chancellors. Is he aware that, some 15 years ago, I and other students at Sussex university had to hire the corn exchange to enable our local Member of Parliament, my right hon. Friend the Member for Brighton, Pavilion (Mr. Amery), to speak to us because the then vice-chancellor, now Lord Briggs, refused to allow us to use a room in the university? Some vice-chancellors say that we should leave it to them. We have left it to them for the past 15 years, and they have done nothing to guarantee free speech in universities.

Mr. Baker: That is what I said to the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals when I saw it last week. I assure my hon. Friend that, when the amendment is tabled, it will address that point about duty and responsibility.

I want now to consider the training of teachers and the GCSE. Before doing so, I should remind the House that the Bill deals with such matters as recoupments and the abolition of the two central advisory councils and the cessation of the publication of a retrospective annual report.

The Bill contains two important provisions which will improve the effectiveness of teachers. They relate to appraisal and to in-service training. The impression is sometimes given that only the bad things in schools are worth commenting upon, but all hon. Members know from first hand in their constituencies the good work which is done by teachers and children in their local schools. It is my sincere hope that we shall soon be able to restore the spirit of partnership, rather than recrimination, to the relationship between those who teach and those who set the framework and secure the resources for the education and teaching profession. In doing that, we must obviously continue to point out where improvements still have to be made and where existing practices and procedures should be changed to raise standards.

Local authorities' key role in managing the teaching force can be fully effective only if it is informed by the regular and systematic appraisal of teachers. The purpose of appraisal is to help all teachers realise their full professional potential by providing them with better job satisfaction, and appropriate in-service training and better planned career development. None could argue with these objectives.

It is my strong hope that agreement will be reached voluntarily on a national framework for appraisal in the current ACAS talks. It may, however, be desirable—and it may prove necessary—for that national framework to be provided or supported by statutory regulations. Clause 40 consequently provides for the holder of my office to make such regulations. I should leave the House in no doubt about the intention that appraisal should be secured by agreement. I look upon this as very much a reserve power.

I turn to the subject of training. Every curriculum improvement needs appropriate in-service training. To meet all of these needs effectively, a sharper financial mechanism is required. The Secretary of State does not at present have financial powers which match his many statutory responsibilities. There is an imbalance here. That is why the Bill proposes, in clause 41, that in-service training shall generally be financed through a new specific grant.

I am pleased to say that details of the proposed administrative framework for the new scheme will be issued for consultation very shortly. As to resources, the funds to be made available for next year will have to be determined as part of the overall LEA expenditure settlement for 1987-88. The Government's intention is that most types of expenditure on in-service training, including those currently eligible for assistance through the present pooling and grant arrangements, including TRIST — TVEI-related in-service training — should be eligible under the new scheme.

[Mr. Baker]

I should like now to consider the introduction of the GCSE. My predecessor announced in 1984 the Government's intention to go ahead with the reform of the school examination system at 16-plus, and that decision was welcomed by virtually everyone concerned with education in our schools.

Since 1984, there has been systematic and thorough planning for the introduction of the new examination system. Pupils will begin their GCSE courses in September of this year, and the first examinations will be taken in the summer of 1988.

We have made it clear that the purpose of the GCSE is to raise standards. The examination, which combines the O-level and CSE grades, will build on, and so reinforce, what is good in the curriculum in each subject. It will be designed to help all pupils — the lower attainers, the average, the above average and the ablest — to show achievement in positive terms.

Some people have expressed anxiety about the availability of GCSE syllabuses. I am glad to tell the House that the Secondary Examinations Council has to date approved 271 syllabuses. All subjects and all examining groups are well covered. many of these have reached the schools, which have had them in draft for some time, and the remainder are following in a steady flow. All are expected to be in schools this month.

Training for the new system is vital. We have committed £10 million towards in-service training for the GCSE, and we have allowed schools to close for two training days this term. We will see that our future arrangements for in-service training fully reflect the importance of the GCSE. Of course, pupils need books and equipment. We have already said that we will pay education support grants for extra books and equipment for the GCSE up to total expenditure of £10 million in 1987-88, and at least a further £10 million in 1988-89.

Over and above the substantial provision that has already been made, I have been considering whether it would be right to provide additional resources for books and equipment for GCSE courses. Local education authorities have already budgeted to spend some £40 million on books and equipment this year for this purpose. As one example, my own authority, the Surrey education committee, decided last month to spend £1 million to support the introduction of the GCSE. Therefore, resources have already been provided by local education authorities.

However, I am satisfied that, in addition to the funds that have already been committed, a further increase in expenditure is needed. I have considered this carefully and I have decided that a further £20 million on books and equipment should be spent in the current year. This is new money for the education service over and above present plans. Some £15 million will be an addition to relevant expenditure for local authorities in England and Wales and will be supported by education support grant at the rate of 70 per cent. Grant-related expenditure will be raised to take account of the 30 per cent. contribution made by the LEAs. My right hon. and noble Friend the Secretary of State for Employment is making £5 million available through the Manpower Services Commission for the provision of scientific and technological equipment.

The House will recognise that in proposing to use the mechanism of education support grants I am going beyond the undertaking offered by my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, North-East last December to keep expenditure for education support grant, apart from midday supervision, within the original ceiling of 0·5 per cent. The consequences of that which I am proposing today will take the expenditure beyond this figure but within the ceiling of 1 per cent. permitted by the Act. I think that the House will agree that that increase should be approved.

The additional expenditure now proposed amounts to over £4,000 per secondary school and over £30 for every fourth year pupil. It demonstrates the Government's commitment to the successful introduction of the new examination system. Taking account of the £10 million being made available for training this year and the £40 million which local authorities have committed in their budgets, a total of £60 million to £70 million is now being targeted to the introduction of the new examination. This represents a substantial commitment by both central Government and local government. I am confident that our decision will be welcomed not only by local education authorities which have pressed me for this and which I met this morning and by parents whom I met last week, but also by the teachers. I now look to the teachers to match the Government's commitment by taking their full part in the remaining phases of training for the new system and by giving the new examination the best possible start in September.

Making GCSE a success is important, but even more important is to make a success of school education as a whole. I remember one of the letters I got from a rather aging uncle. In it he said that H. G. Wells wrote that the race is "between education and catastrophe". That transcends political considerations and is a wise observation. The Bill creates the conditions which will powerfully promote the objective of improved education. It will do that by strengthening the position of the school, increasing the influence of parents, and promoting effective teaching. That is why it is important. It deserves a Second Reading.

Mr. Giles Radice (Durham, North): I begin by congratulating the Minister once again on his appointment. As he knows, his job is vital, not just for his party's prospects at the next election, but for Britain as a whole. I understand that the right hon. Gentleman was especially anxious to be appointed Secretary of State for Education and Science. That is a necessary but not sufficient qualification for a job. I hope that in his case his desire for the post is not merely because he sees education as a useful stepping stone on his way to the Tory party leadership. If he is thinking about the famous precedent for such translation, the Prime Minister, I advise him to forget it. His party is far more likely to turn to a younger man or woman — for example, his Minister of State.

Mrs. Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): Get on with the Bill.

Mr. Radice: I am glad to welcome the hon. Member for Lancaster (Mrs. Kellett-Bowman) to the debate. I hope that she will contain her impatience. Education, and therefore the job of the Secretary of State for Education, has never been more crucial for the future of Britain. As many studies have shown, in relative terms we are a badly educated and badly trained nation and, as the Minister said, we have to put that right. Commitment to education must be the right hon. Gentleman's first and basic premise. We are told that he found favour with his leader because of his presentational skills. The Prime Minister may well think that the medium is more important than the message. It is fair to warn the right hon. Gentleman that he will be judged not by how well he sells himself or his party, but by the effectiveness of what he does. To quote a political slogan associated with his former mentor, the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath), what is now needed is action, not words.

When the Bill was first published, the publicity machine of the Department of Education and Science characteristically, but unwisely, proclaimed it the most important piece of legislation since the Education Act 1944. It is certainly a big Bill in the number of its clauses, lines and words, but the real test of importance is not the size of the Bill, but how far it tackles the great education issues that face the country.

Whatever else may be said about the Education Act 1944, which was the product of a coalition Government and was introduced by a distinguished Conservative Secretary of State, Mr. R. A. Butler, it did a number of things that were crucial in the context of the time. It laid down a relationship between central and local government that has lasted for over 40 years. It underwrote a historic compromise between Church and state over education. For the first time it provided free secondary education for all. Above all, it was accompanied by a new attitude to state education and to the provision of adequate resources for that education. The Bill is simply not in that league.

Let us consider the context in which the Bill is being introduced. Many people have described that context as one of acute crisis. Certainly most observers would agree that education is in a mess which is largely of the Government's creation. First, in a number of key areas our schools are desperately short of cash. Secondly, our teachers are underpaid and demoralised. Thirdly, far too many of our pupils are being deprived of adequate educational and training opportunities. Fourthly, we need to do much more to raise education standards.

I do not apologise for stressing the need for more resources. Of course money is not the whole answer and resources must be more effectively managed. As the Audit Commission points out, that includes the Secretary of State as well. As the Secretary of State's own inspectors warned in the week in which he was appointed, we shall not be able to overcome the crisis in our schools or meet the demand for raising standards without substantial extra funding for buildings, books and equipment, teacher training and for teachers' pay amongst other things.

We are told that, unlike his predecessor, the new Secretary of State will fight in Cabinet for more money for education. We welcome that and wish him well in his battle. As he knows he will have to overcome determined opposition from the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Prime Minister, who have made quite clear their hostility to realistic increases in public spending and their preference for pre-election tax cuts. The Bill contains no significant extra resources for those or any other matters.

I congratulate the Government and the Secretary of State on the decision to announce more resources for the GCSE examinations. The local authority organisations, teachers' organisations and the Labour party have been arguing for this for some time, and I congratulate the Secretary of State on having listened to us and accept our case. I hope that the GCSE examination will now go ahead without the trouble that has so far been experienced.

Mr. Richard Hickmet (Glanford and Scunthorpe): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the additional resources that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has announced for extra books and equipment so that the GCSE can be properly funded are adequate for the introduction of the examination?

Mr. Radice: If the resources are for this year, they will be adequate. That is a useful addition.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): Next year the Opposition will want £100 million.

Mr. Radice: We asked for £20 million, as the hon. Gentleman will notice if he reads the Order Paper. There is now £20 million more for this year, and we congratulate the Government on providing that money.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): The Government may feel that they have provided adequate financial resources for next year's GCSE courses, but have they not left the schools with remarkably little time to ensure that the new examination is implemented effectively?

Mr. Radice: We have said that this has been a rush job and that there has been inadequate preparation. However, the Government are going ahead with the examination, and in those circumstances more resources are needed. We have argued for that, and the Government have listened. We congratulate them on that. We want them to produce more resources for the years ahead.

We should also look at how the Bill improves teachers' morale and ensures that they are properly paid. The short answer is, not at all. These are crucial issues. Every week I visit schools in different parts of the country — a practice that I recommend to the Secretary of State. Morale in staff rooms is at an all-time low. There is a strong case for appraisal, and it is true that one cannot get progress in education without good quality teachers, but I warn the Secretary of State that unless the Government ensure that teachers' efforts are properly appreciated — and properly rewarded — all the clauses in the Bill designed to improve teacher quality will prove ineffective.

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Bristol, East): Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that teachers are, on average, £800 a year better off than they were in 1979?

Mr. Radice: I cannot confirm that, because I do not carry such figures in my head. I can confirm what I have already said. Teachers believe that they are badly paid. I have heard Ministers agree that that is so, and I should like the Government to accept the further point, that teachers are demoralised.

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: Thanks to the NUT.

Mr. Radice: It is not thanks to the National Union of Teachers or to the National Association of Schoolmasters, but thanks to what teachers are thinking. If the hon. Lady doubts me, I invite her to join me in some of the classrooms in her constituency and in Lancashire, where I was yesterday.

The Minister of State, Department of Education and Science (Mr. Chris Patten): Following the intervention of my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, East (Mr. Sayeed), I may be able to help the hon. Gentleman. I think

[Mr. Chris Patten]

I am right in saying that, following the pay increases that they have received since March, teachers will now find themselves on average 15 per cent. better off than they were when the Government came into office. Roughly translated, that is in excess of £1,500.

Mr. Radice: The Minister states that as a fact, but we shall have to check it. During other debates, I have been given "facts" by the Government that have subsequently proved to be inaccurate. I accept what the Minister says, for the time being, but I shall check it.

In sharp contrast to the 1944 Act, the Bill does nothing to contribute to widening educational opportunities. For example, there is nothing in it about ensuring that all three and four-year-olds whose parents wish it should have a nursery place, despite the demand for increased nursery provision. There is nothing about providing comprehensive education for all —

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman Hear, hear.

Mr. Radice — even though, wait for it, authorities such as Gloucester and Devon — hardly burning Socialist areas — are now pressing to be allowed to become comprehensive. There is nothing about assisting more young people to stay on at school after 16, although the percentage in full-time education has fallen significantly. [Interruption.] I am surprised that the hon. Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) is not more concerned about the fact that the percentage in full-time education has fallen significantly in the past two years. I should have thought that that fact would worry him, and that he would be concerned that the Bill does nothing about it.

There is nothing about giving a more secure basis for further adult and continuing education, despite the need to re-equip and re-skill our population. All these advances will be necessary if we are to do what the Secretary of State said and compete with our competitor nations, which are already providing such services.

Even on the question of raising educational standards, which has been the great cry of the Conservative party for at least 10 or 15 years, the Bill does not contribute much that is constructive. We strongly support the increase in parental representation on governing bodies proposed in the Bill.

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman rose—

Mr. Radice: I shall not give way.

Some good may also come of the teacher training provision, but only if the Government provide the cash, as the Secretary of State was careful not to do today, and if they take local authorities with them.

Mr. Greenway: Give way to my hon. Friend for Lancaster (Mrs. Kellett-Bowman).

Mr. Radice: No, I shall not give way. I have given way three times already, which is more than the Secretary of State did.

There is a strong case for appraisal, but not if it is imposed from the top, as envisaged in the Bill. I recognise that the Secretary of State would much prefer this to take place voluntarily, but I do not see why there should be reserve powers in the Bill.

There is little in the Bill to encourage greater involvement by parents in the education of their children, and nothing to ensure that parents' complaints are properly dealt with.

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury): What about annual meetings?

Mr. Radice: I am in favour of annual meetings, but the hon. Gentleman, with all his experience, knows that annual meetings are no substitute for close involvement by parents in the education of their children. There is nothing in the Bill that will help to ensure that all local authorities provide adequate minimum standards of provision. It is a significant sign of the Government's complacent attitude that the Bill repeals the requirement laid down in the 1944 Act for the Secretary of State to make an annual report to Parliament. While the Government are putting obligations on others, they clearly want to remove their own responsibilities.

For all the hype, when it started its journey and before it went to the other place, the Bill was about the composition, organisation and function of school governing bodies. Of course this is an important topic, but it will not change the education system in this country overnight. The right hon. Gentleman would not claim that it would. However, school governing bodies can and should have a significant influence on schools. I do not think that these bodies can ever be more important than teachers, pupils or even parents in their day-to-day relations with schools.

The movement for reforming the composition of these governing bodies began with the Taylor report prepared under the previous Labour Government. I am surprised that the Secretary of State, unlike the Ministers in another place, did not have the generosity to pay tribute to the pioneering work of the Taylor committee. The Labour party strongly supports the increase in the number of parents' representatives. We believe that the formula contained in the Bill is far superior to the Green Paper's original proposal because it increases the number of parents without placing them in the majority. This is an improvement but it still does not do enough to recognise the need for partnership and balance so strongly recommended by Taylor and emphasised by local authorities, parents, and teachers' representatives.

Teachers are under-represented. This is contrary to the formula put forward by Taylor, and there is no provision for pupil representation. I do not believe that the Bill contains adequate provision to ensure that those involved in industry should be more closely involved in the governing of schools, and there is not adequate provision for community representation.

These matters should be corrected in Committee. Unfortunately, one of the problems that we have seen during the Bill's progress through the House of Lords is that the Government have not been prepared to listen to arguments. We also believe that the Government have failed to reach a formula on powers and functions over the curriculum, discipline and appointments that can achieve a genuine partnership between local authorities, governing bodies and head teachers.

There is ambivalence and a confusion of wording which reflects a confusion of thought which the House must resolve with the passage of the Bill. Despite a number of amendments in the other place, there has been little movement by the Government during the Bill's passage. The Government have been prepared to move only when pressure has been brought to bear on them by their hard Right.

A number of amendments were carried in the other place. I hope that the Secretary of State will listen to me when I tell him that I am disappointed in what he had to say. He appeared to be attempting to appease the Right. The first amendment moved in the other place by the Cox and Marks machine related to political indoctrination. Clause 16, in subsections (3) and (4), puts the obligation on local authorities governing bodies and head teachers to forbid the promotion of partisan political views and activities in schools.

That sounds unexceptionable, but how do we define partisan in its practical application? In its strict definition, neither the Secretary of State nor I would be allowed to talk about our political beliefs or policies in schools, but surely such views should be part of the general education of young people. They should be aware of the views of political parties on matters of public concern. We must examine that problem.

Clause 24, on sex education, was inserted into the Bill literally at the last moment in another place by an amendment moved on Third Reading. The clause puts the obligation for sex education on authorities to ensure that "It is given in such a manner as to encourage those pupils to have due regard to moral considerations and the value of family life."

That seems to be a statement of the obvious. Clearly sex education ought to be, and as far as I know is, always taught in a sensible manner. The Secretary of State did not give any examples to the contrary, and I have not heard any. I would be interested to hear any examples of where it has not been taught in a sensible manner, where it was wrong and not in the best interests of pupils. I do not believe that a general clause of this kind helps to ensure that sex education is properly taught in schools. Is this not a matter that could better be dealt with by the Secretary of State's inspectors, who could issue proper advice and ensure that it was carried out?

There was also a fiasco over the new clause on the freedom of speech in higher education establishments, again introduced by the Government on the hoof on Third Reading. The chairman of the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals has warned the Secretary of State that although the universities are unequivocal in their support and defence of freedom of speech and lawful assembly—as are the Opposition—the clause as drafted would led to vexatious legislation and could actually inhibit freedom of speech. Yet the Secretary of State is still intent on introducing a new clause in Committee. He has not shown so far that he is aware of the warning from the vice-chancellors.

More generally, there is no guarantee that if the Tory Right has its way, a host of other amendments will not be put forward in Committee or on Report. Having heard some of the sedentary noises this afternoon, I am sure that amendments will be made.

The Observer was correct to warn:

"The Education Bill, hailed as the most important piece of legislation since Butler's 1944 Act, is beginning to look like a resting place for floatsam and jetsam from whichever pressure group happens to be pressing at the time."

Mr. Nicholas Baker: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Radice: I shall not give way. I have give way three times already. I know that other hon. Members wish to take part and I must complete my speech and allow them to make their speeches.

The House will be aware of the background to the issue of corporal punishment. A ruling was made by the European Court of Human Rights in February 1982. It ruled that where a person holds a conviction against corporal punishment, it amounts to a philosophical conviction which is protected by the European convention on human rights. In response to that the Government introduced the Education (Corporal Punishment) Bill, which was designed to give parents the right to exempt their children from corporal punishment. The Bill was widely condemned in both Houses of Parliament as unworkable, and it was abandoned when a key amendment was introduced in the other place.

The problem is that most local authorities currently leave the decision with the school and that practice continues in direct contravention of our obligations under article 2 of the European convention on human rights. We did no hear much on that point from the Secretary of State. To remove that contravention and produce a workable and humane system of discipline, an amendment was carried in the other place which effectively abolished corporal punishment. They may have been defective in their wording but that was the intention of the amendments in another place

Mr. Silvester: As a Conservative Member who voted against the Education (Corporal Punishment) Bill, may I ask why it is that the decision of the European Court cannot be met by the local authority providing a choice of schools so that a person who has an objection can choose a school in which corporal punishment does not operate? Why should that apply to all schools?

Mr. Radice: That is theoretically possible, but I believe that it would be unworkable in practice. That is the short answer. The Secretary of State said that the Government would be prepared to allow a free vote on the issue. Having listened to the Secretary of State, how free will that vote be? What will the payroll vote do? We have heard the Secretary of State's view—

Mr. Kenneth Baker: A free vote is a free vote is a free vote. I made my position clear. I am the present holder of the office of Secretary of State for Education and Science, and I thought it right to make my personal position clear to the House and to all those who are engaged in education, but that does not bind any other member of the Administration.

Mr. Radice: The Opposition will vote for abolition, as we did on Second reading of the Corporal Punishment Bill —[HON. MEMBERS: "A free vote?"] We have heard the Secretary of State's view — he spoke with all the authority of his office—that we should continue to leave the decision about corporal punishment to the schools. He has said, in effect, that we should continue to remain in contravention of the decision of the European Court of Human Rights. That is the consequence of what he has said. Basically, that is a cop-out. I believe that the right hon. Gentleman has been yielding to the pressure from No. 10. We know that the Prime Minister has made her views clear in the newspapers. The Secretary of State has yielded to the pressure of the Prime Minister and to that of Conservative Members on the Right wing.

[Mr. Radice]

What position are the Government proposing to adopt in Committee? This is a crucial issue. Do the Government intend to move amendments in Committee? What will they do? If the subsection is removed in Committee, it will be difficult to restore it on Report. I am not satisfied by what the Secretary of State has said so far.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Whatever may happen in Committee, an opportunity will be provided on Report for the House to come to a decision on this issue. I re-emphasise that Conservative Members will have a free vote.

Mr. Radice: I am glad about that. However, the right hon. Gentleman has still not answered my question.

Mr. Jerry Hayes (Harlow): On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. We have heard from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State that the Government will not be imposing a Whip on this matter. The hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) has been asked repeatedly what his position is and it seems that he is not able to answer us. Would it be proper, in the circumstances—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. The hon. Gentleman is raising a debating point and not a point of order.

Mr. Hayes: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I ask that the shadow Leader of the House be brought before the House to make a statement so that we know what the Opposition's position is.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I repeat that the hon. Gentleman has raised a legitimate debating point, but not a point of order for the Chair.

Mr. Radice: I have made it clear on a number of occasions that the Labour party is against corporal punishment. I do not know what the problem is. It is good to see the hon. Member for Harlow (Mr. Hayes) in his place and listening to the debate. I am sure that he is glad to be with us, though he has only recently entered the Chamber.

Mr. Sayeed: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Radice: No.

I have learnt over the past few years that, with Britain's responsive system of decentralised local government, educational advance must be based on consensus. The greatest failure of the previous Secretary of State for Education and Science was his inability to create the necessary consensus for action. That was his problem. If the new Secretary of State is to succeed, he must bring teachers, local authorities and parents together. That represents a difficulty for the Government, because everyone knows that "consensus" is a dirty word in Thatcherite circles.

I remind the Secretary of State that the 1944 Act had a wide measure of cross-party and non-party support both within and outside Parliament. That was the position with the Bill until certain amendments were introduced in Committee in another place. Mr. Stuart McClure's book on education documents refers to the 1944 Act and states:

"This Act was the result of prolonged negotiations with interested bodies of all sorts, including the churches, in which R. A. Butler and Chuter Ede, then respectively President of the Board of Education and Parliamentary Secretary in the wartime coalition Government succeeded in achieving a large measure of agreement."

That is what the new Secretary of State must try to do. Despite the consultations over governing bodies, and despite the Bill having been introduced in another place, it is rapidly becoming extremely divisive. I have already referred to the efforts of the reactionary tendency to introduce all its pet prejudices into the Bill by the back door.

Another serious problem is that the Government are not prepared to listen to sensible ways of amending the Bill to improve the balance and quality of representation on governing bodies or to reduce the potential conflict between local authorities and head teachers.

It was to try to create the necessary consensus behind the Bill that the Opposition proposed adopting the Special Standing Committee procedure, which, like a Select Committee, would enable interested parties — local authorities, parents and teachers — to put evidence before the Committee and to be questioned upon it. Such a procedure would enable Members to come to a decision based on the hard experience of practitioners and not on their prejudices or on DES blueprints. Above all, it would show that the new Secretary of State is serious about creating consensus and agreement. Unfortunately, the Government have failed so far to respond to our representations. I urge the Secretary of State and the Minister of State to reconsider the position and to tell us this evening that they have changed their minds.

The trouble with the Bill is that it fails to address the real educational problems of underfunding, poor morale, inadequate opportunity and the need to raise standards. Judged by what is really needed, it is a poor mouse of a Bill. A number of half-baked and pious clauses have been added to it, or are proposed, that do nothing and will do nothing to help solve our educational problems, and could make them worse. The truth is that the Bill is in danger of becoming Baker's "half-baked" Bill, and I therefore advise my colleagues to decline to give it a Second Reading.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (Derbyshire, West): I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for calling me in this debate. I am even more grateful to the people of Derbyshire, West, for giving you the chance to do so. The House sat for a long time last Thursday, but that sitting did not seem to be as long as my election day, which was four weeks earlier. After an all-night count, an all-night sitting was not too bad. I would not recommend any all-night session for anyone, especially if his wife is five months pregnant.

I draw some comfort from the fact that what was probably the longest count took place in Derbyshire, but in the north-east and not in the west, during the general election of 1922, when the count commenced at 10 am on Thursday and was not completed until 1 pm the following day due to three recounts and four adjustments.

The Duke of Devonshire was one of my predecessors in the House. The story is told that one day he turned to a colleague and said, "Oh, how I hate having to make a speech," to which his companion replied, "I don't mind a bit, I just can't bear listening."

It is custom for a maiden speech to follow a set pattern in paying tribute to one's predecessor. This I can do with tremendous sincerity on this occasion for my predecessor,

Matthew Parris, was seen as a man of independent mind and was well respected, from what I have been able to gather since I have been in the House, on both sides of the Chamber. He had served the constituency in a very conscientious manner. Indeed, his is a very difficult example for me to follow, but I will try my best for the people of Derbyshire, West. It makes a refreshing change to see somebody going by choice from this House into the world of interviewing. Many go when they have been rejected at the ballot box, but not many by choice.

At one press conference in my campaign, I was interviewed on a barge on the Cromford canal. There a television interviewer from "Newsnight" — that is the programme that keeps getting the polls wrong — said that Matthew was somehow bettering himself. Well, Mr. Hannah would say that, would he not? However, I am sure that all hon. and particularly right hon. Members will wish Matthew well in his new and challenging job. I say, particularly right hon. Members, because they will face the excellent cross-examination that I am sure he will give them in weeks to come on a Sunday television programme.

I am of the opinion that I have the honour to represent one of the most diverse yet beautiful constituencies in the country, from its rolling hills, its unique villages and its industrial areas, to its agricultural heartland. It has lush agricultural areas, bleak moors and hill farming where people work very hard for long hours to make a living. It is, of course, well known for its various kinds of food. Its Bakewell pudding featured on television more than once during the campaign. When Lord Whitelaw was seen eating one, a lady said that she thought that the Prime Minister would not take kindly to noble Lords eating it in public, but he commented that excellent food could be eaten anywhere. In addition, we have Hartington Stilton and Thortons confectionery. Ashbourne water is famous throughout the country, but not, it seems in Brassington, a few miles from Ashbourne, where one village inn sells only a French substitute, nor at certain functions in the House of Commons where only the same French substitute can be seen.

Politically, Derbyshire, West is known for its by-elections. One newspaper said that it was the seventh in the last 100 years. I truly hope that there is no need for another one for quite some time to come.

Having just arrived from a by-election campaign, I should like to place on record my thanks to the Officers of the House and staff for their great help and assistance in my first few weeks.

It is an honour and privilege to take part in the debate on a subject that was frequently mentioned in my campaign. I should like to thank my right hon. Friend the Minister of State and the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science, my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Walden), who came and helped in the campaign. Of course, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State came also, but in a different capacity.

A number of people were extremely concerned about education. There was no doubt that a great number of very good teachers were concerned about the way in which their profession has become demoralised. I hope and trust that we shall do all that we possibly can to ensure that the teaching profession is rightly rewarded for the difficult and essential job that teachers have to do.

It is essential that we ensure that teaching staff feel that they have a profession because, although there are some bad teachers — and we need to ensure that there are ways of retraining or removing them from the teaching profession — the vast majority of teachers are excellent and dedicated and need their reward.

However, just throwing money at the problem is no answer and no solution. There are without question many problems facing local education authorities, and I accept that the fall in school rolls means that there are some difficult decisions to be made. I hope that these decisions can be taken without political bias creeping into them.

Education became such an issue in my campaign that I have taken the opportunity in the last few weeks to visit a number of schools in my area, including Queen Elizabeth grammar school in Ashbourne, which, without question in my opinion, needs more money to be spent on refurbishment. Yesterday, although it seems a long time ago, I visited Ecclesbourne comprehensive school, from which the county council is currently considering removing sixth form facilities. The school has what can only be described as an excellent record in its sixth form achievements. Fifty-five per cent. of the pupils stay on into the sixth form. I believe that this figure is considerably higher than the national average. The school has another 20 per cent. going into further education.

These figures and these statistics are, indeed, a great credit to Ecclesbourne comprehensive school. It would be a great pity and a mistake if the sixth form was to be closed. Indeed, it would cost a considerable amount more to bring in a tertiary system for the school. I hope that the county council will not attempt to close the sixth form at Ecclesbourne — although, if it were to do so, it would lead to a major campaign, which I certainly would support, to ensure that the sixth form remains.

In my election campaign, Highfield school in Matlock had the rare honour of visits by the right hon. Member for Islyn (Mr. Kinnock), the Leader of the Opposition, the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) and a famous author, the deputy chairman of the Conservative party. The school was, indeed, very well served in the campaign. I hope that the pupils learnt a lot from the experience of having been visited by such senior politicians.

In welcoming the Bill, I believe that it gives a fundamental shift to the governing body in the management of the school for which it is responsible. I very much welcome the balancing out of the school governing body. I also think that clause 25, which will ensure that extra information, statistics and facts are available to the school governing body, is to be welcomed. I believe that it is essential that schools are seen to be not political instruments but places where one can receive school studies without the addition of political indoctrination. The Government must ensure that proper provisions are made for training and some thought given to the way in which we elect the governing bodies of schools.

I am a product of state education. Some may say that this proves that some improvements are needed. I believe that the Bill makes valiant strides in that direction. I wish it well, as I wish well the future of state education.

5.7 pm

Mr. Clement Freud (Cambridgeshire, North-East): It gives me great pleasure to speak after the hon. Member for Derbyshire, West, (Mr. McLoughlin), who won such a memorable, if marginal, victory against our candidate, who gave him such spirited opposition throughout that campaign. I want to tell him that, now that the ordeal of the maiden speech is over, it goes uphill from here on, and we shall all look forward to hearing further and other contributions from him during his stay in Parliament.

I want first to welcome the speech of the Secretary of State for Education and Science, and particularly the new input into GCSE, especially as this will be new money for which we have always asked and which he has now given. On behalf of the alliance, I want to say that £20 million seems to us the right sum; we shall stop saying, give us more money, and undertake to be content with this input.

The Minister has persuaded us that GCSE must come this year and now the Secretary of State has enabled the finance to be made available. I wish him and the GCSE well.

When the Bill was conceived and published there were many issues that we thought it proper for the Bill to cover. We thought it essential that there should be legislation to deal with such matters as Poundswick, Honeyford, and the fact that LEAs sometimes abuse their powers by packing boards of governors with their political appointees. We needed legislation to stop the delays in determining closures and re-organisations, and to implement the Taylor report, nine years on. We think that there is also a good argument for introducing fixed terms for headmasters and for making greater provision for nursery education.

But in 55 clauses and five schedules we have something that the former Secretary of State for Education and Science described as while Mr. Tyrell Burgess, writing in The Guardian, described it as teaching one's granny how to suck eggs in 70 pages. In truth, the Bill is somewhere between the two. It is something of a ragbag, although, in common with the 1944 Act, it is ambigious. Half of what we needed has not been included, and the rest is not as clear as it might have been. The Bill is likely to create more confusion than it solves, and will be of greater benefit to the legal profession than to educationists.

"the largest and certainly one of the most significant pieces of legislation since the Butler Act of 1944",

If one is to prescribe every detail, it is essential to get it right. This Bill is neither sufficiently general to give guidance and leave some discretion, nor sufficiently clear to end contention and confusion. We shall vote for the Second Reading hoping that in Committee we can make the Bill clearer and thus create a more helpful measure which we can continue to support at later stages.

On Second Reading, however, I want to discuss some specific issues with which we are not satisfied. The Government seem to believe that there is a simple mechanistic link between formal parental involvement and better education, as if parents had a sort of monolithic entity in defence of the traditional curriculum. The right hon. Member for Leeds, North-East (Sir Keith Joseph) used the term "parent" to denote not a concerned father or mother—and certainly not a single parent—but a neo or closet member of the local Tory party. When he spoke of a parent, he meant someone on whom he could rely for support.

We argue that good education is less likely to emerge from parental involvement, than from an ongoing community-based partnership between parents and teachers, or from tinkering with the structure of school governing bodies, which will make only a limited contribution to that partnership. The Taylor report recommended equal representation for staff, parents, the community and politicians. I am very sorry that in this Bill, "staff" have become "teachers," and that they are not there in numerical equality other than in small schools. As Lord Taylor said in the other place:

"When power is being shared the easiest principle to operate and justify is the simplest; namely, equality."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 10 March 1986; Vol. 472, c. 436.]

I want the Secretary of State to think carefully about the difference between staff and teachers. I make it a practice never to go to parent-teacher association meetings unless they become parent-staff association meetings. The caretaker, the school cook and the lollipop lady have considerable relevance to the well-being of an educational establishment. In Committee, I hope that this will be considered and that people other than those who are strictly academics will be eligible to take part in governing the school.

If education really is about partnership, which the Government espouse whenever they are accused of centralisation, and which the Liberal Benches at least take seriously, that partnership must be based on equality of respect and input. As it stands, the two deviations from Taylor turn the Bill away from valuable experience in the form of non-teaching staff, and contain the seeds of the Bill's failure in alienating the teaching force. We argue that the Government cannot legislate against teachers; they need their consent.

I am also sorry about pupil governors. In Committee, we shall seek to amend the Bill in that regard. I do not know what the Government have against young people. They cut their eligibility to benefits, close their access to apprenticeships, eliminate their protection under the wages councils, and then assume that they should take it all lying down by denying them opportunities to take part in the running of their schools. Is that consumer-led education policy? Is that what the former Secretary of State meant when he said:

"I believe in consumer power"?

We want the Bill to be amended so that pupils aged over 16 can be non-voting school governors. When I was rector of Dundee university, students sat on the court of the university. They did not have a vote and, rightly, were not involved when we discussed staff misdemeanours or salaries. Why, at the age of 16, should young people not be in attendance and learn how schools are governed, especially their own schools? I should like to ask the Secretary of State what will happen to those pupil governors already in place who are, by all accounts, doing a good job. What will happen when the Bill is enacted? Will they be instantly kicked out? That would be very unfair.

We have heard much about the functions of the governing body and about the discipline and the curriculum. Despite the Lords amendments, the Bill remains dangerously muddled, leaving a head in the invidious position of effectively choosing either the LEA or the governing body. Those clauses must be tidied up so that the lines of responsibility are clear. The hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Weetch) made a most important intervention: there should be an independent appeals tribunal. The local education authorities and boards of governors may frequently not see eye to eye and it is not good enough to have a local education authority-appointed tribunal to look into such failures to agree. As my hon. Friend the Member for Rochdale (Mr. Smith) pointed out, they are not independent.

If the system of appraisal is to have any chance of working, it must have the consent of those using it—the teachers. We would rather that the provision giving the Secretary of State power to oppose appraisal was not in the Bill, but if it is to remain, we demand at least that it is amended so that non-teaching duties are excluded. Above all, I question the wisdom of forcing through that clause at such a delicate time and in such a clumsy way, over-riding caution and the natural relations between employer and employee.

The Secretary of State made much of the fact that there would be reports from the governors and reports from the local education authorities. Yet clause 49 is sadly and surprisingly entitled:

"Discontinuance of Secretary of State's duty to make annual reports."

Will the Minister explain why everyone must report on what happened with the exception of the Secretary of State?

I am sorry that the Secretary of State did not much like my intervention on the subject of the famous clause introduced on Third Reading in the other place. I maintain that it ill becomes a party that filibusters to gag a motion criticising the Government in the House of Commons to come out for free speech in our universities.

We consider the amendments regarding sex education and political bias to be unnecessary if the clauses on the powers in the curriculum are put right. One cannot legislate for a broad distribution of power between the LEAs, the head teachers and the governing bodies and then lay down two areas where the Government are to have effective control. That is a contradiction that is unnecessary and irrelevant.

I was sorry to hear the Secretary of State's contention that sex education should deal heavily with the family. It is right to take sex in the whole context of love and affection, but to speak too much about the family, when an ever-increasing number of children in our schools have no family, is unhelpful. I hope that he will think again. Let us widen the concept of family to include relatives, even if they have got away from, hid from and run away from each other.

This Bill is little more than window dressing, diverting attention from more important educational questions such as teachers' pay. The Bill shows that people are not to be trusted, for all the clauses therein would, in the best of all worlds, be settled by good practice. I am sorry that in this case we need legislation and to some extent more effective legislation—so we must clear it up. I am sure that we shall argue for many weeks in Committee on many of those points.

Let me end as I started. I wish the Secretary of State well. I am deeply grateful to him for removing the country's overriding fear that the GCSE examination, which we all support, would not take off because of insufficient funding. He has found the money and he has our good wishes, for his term of office and for an improved Bill.

5.20 pm

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg (Hampstead and Highgate): This is the first time in 16 years that I have had the chance of congratulating a colleague on his maiden speech. As one ex-underground miner to another, it is appropriate to offer my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr. McLoughlin) my warmest congratulations. We worked in the same coalfield, in the east midlands. I know the sorts of seams in which he worked. I agree that deep down the average miner is a staunch conservative, with a small c, and will support the defence policies of the leader of the Social Democratic party, not those of the Liberal or Labour party.

I compliment my hon. Friend on a moderate, modest and knowledgeable speech. It was clear that his local government experience was of great help to him. I know that when we hear from him again he will join us in some rather more robust speeches when he attacks the Opposition.

I also welcome, not merely in trite terms, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, who is also my old campaigning friend. He does a superb job wherever he is asked to perform. We are fortunate that in education he is now fighting hard.

We have listened to the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Freud), but it is sad that we do not see the SDP education spokesman.

Mr. Gerald Bowden (Dulwich): Nobody knows who he is.

Mr. Freud: His is here.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: It is fascinating if he is here because no one knows who he is. I wonder whether we heard Liberal policy or alliance policy. Whichever it was, it was no policy. It was picking up a bit of an item here, looking at it and saying, "Well, if we had suggested it, it might be a good idea, but coming from this Government it cannot be." That was all that we heard in a rather strange speech. The hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) copped out in his inability to tell us whether his colleagues would have a free vote on the issue of corporal punishment. He said, "But, of course, it is Labour party policy." This means that there will be a three-line Whip to make Labour Members vote for the retention of the clause or the abolition of corporal punishment. I hope that the public will take that into account.

I want to concentrate on three points. I welcome the principle of assessment. I also hope that it will come into operation by agreement, but if it has to be brought in by regulations, so be it. Assessment is common in industry —those of us who are personnel specialists know that it is fair and practical. It is long overdue.

Those of us who have visited British schools over many years and have been governors and managers know that there are some appalling teachers and some superb teachers. Why should they get exactly the same salary? Why should children be subject to a lottery of which of those two types of teacher they receive? I wish to see the poorer teacher helped to attain the standard of the better teacher. That is what assessment is all about.

I am delighted that in Committee the Government will introduce an amendment that will allow free speech at universities. As a former governor for 25 years of the Polytechnic of North London, I saw the successful efforts over many years to deny free speech to visiting speakers, and that was monstrous.

[Sir Geoffrey Finsberg]

We need to keep an eye on student unions. Should they still be compulsorily financed? Should they be financed by those who do not wish to join such unions? The continuation of that policy is hardly in line with the freedom of choice that Conservative Members support.

On 2 May I was unable to conduct my normal monthly surgery for a variety of reasons. I received a letter dated 29 April from the president of the university of London's union which said that she was coming to my surgery. I had her telephoned at once because there were fewer than three days before my surgery to say that I was sorry that I could not be there. It is well known that I am always delighted to see people by appointment.

It was subsequently reported to me that there was a mini-demo at my surgery by students. I deprecate that, because that is not what advice bureaux are for, but there is something more sinister. Someone from the university of London sent me a poster which states:

"No housing benefit next year. Demonstrate against your local Tory MP in Hampstead and Highgate. Meet Friday, 2 May . . . go to his surgery and disrupt it."

That is no different from disrupting free speech. When a surgery attended by elderly people with their problems is disrupted, they are scared. It is worse than that, because the poster has on it "Union approved poster". It is approved — this speaks for itself — by Ms. Liz Davies who is said to be a member of the Labour club and is its education and welfare officer. Why does such a poster have the union's official stamp on it?

I have three questions. When my hon. Friend the Minister replies to the debate, will he say simply whether he joins me in condemning this monstrous attack on the advice bureaux which we all hold and where we are pleased to see constituents, of any political persuasion, with their individual problems? Will my hon. Friend condemn that absolutely? Does the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) join me in that condemnation, because I would make the same condemnation if any Conservative students put up a poster telling people to come and disrupt a Labour Member's advice bureau? Is this now Labour party policy as it was approved by someone from the Labour club?

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: I make it clear that I deprecate anyone setting out to disrupt a Member of Parliament's advice bureau. It is another matter if someone wishes to demonstrate, but to suggest, as that poster does, that anyone should disrupt proceedings, is to be deplored. However, I make it clear that there is a great deal of feeling about the board-and-lodging elements and other such matters. It would be helpful if at some point in the debate the Government would tell us whether they are backing off the housing benefit issue, as rumour has it that they will do.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: That is the sort of answer that I would have expected from the hon. Gentleman. He is an hon. Gentleman and I felt that he would condemn that roundly. As I said earlier, I am always delighted to see people who ask to see me and I try to fix a mutually convenient appointment. However, people must realise that it does their cause and case no good to behave in that childish and stupid way.

I also want to know the opinion of the president of the university of London's student union and the president of the National Union of Students, and I shall be writing to them to ask. I hope that I shall be given a straight answer. I also hope that I shall find out why somebody authorised that sort of poster.

The Bill is important for a variety of reasons. I welcome what my right hon. Friend said about additional resources for the GCSE. I hope, as has been made clear by the hon. Members for Durham, North and for Cambridgeshire, North-East, that the NUT will respond positively at once by giving its wholehearted support. I hope that it will not isolate itself on this issue as it did on pay until its veto was removed.

Finally, I welcome the fact that the Bill will give more parent power to those with children at school. This, if I may say so to the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East, is community involvement. Parents are there as part of the community. Local authorities are there as part of the community. We do not want any other representatives in that sense, as I think the hon. Gentleman put it, to represent the community.

The Bill also gives more power to governing bodies and lessens the growing politicisation practised not just by some teachers, alas, but by many Socialist local education authorities, which are removing Conservative governors from governing bodies. That is not right. Nor should Conservative local education authorities remove Labour nominees. I served on governing bodies in the days when London's education authority was always Labour controlled. Until recently it practised the principles of fairness and gave seats in proportion to party strengths. That does not apply any more, but the Bill will put that right.

All that I shall say, apart from telling my hon. Friend the Member for Shipley (Mr. Fox), who is Chairman of the Committee of Selection, that I do not wish to be selected, is that I wish the Bill well and hope that it proceeds rapidly on its passage and soon becomes law.

5.32 pm

Mr. Derek Fatchett (Leeds, Central): I hope that the hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Sir G. Finsberg) will forgive me if I do not respond immediately to some of the points that he has just made.

I want, on behalf of my right hon. and learned Friends, to congratulate the hon. Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr. McLoughlin) on his maiden speech tonight. It showed a keen interest in his constituency, and I suspect that before too long we shall hear a much more robust contribution from him. It is appropriate that he selected education as the topic for his maiden speech. I suspect that on the morning of 9 May the hon. Gentleman's numeracy increased somewhat and eventually he was able to count up to 100 with a clear lead over his Liberal opponent. I congratulate him on that result in one sense. He was always able, during the course of that by-election, to state clearly and with principle his party's policies, and that is a course that all candidates in all elections should try to follow rather than seek to deviate for the sake of short-term popularity.

I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not mind if I make one further point. Our paths nearly crossed because I was asked to be the minder — if that is the appropriate modern term—for the Labour candidate in the Ryedale by-election. Perhaps I was fortunate not to go to West Derbyshire, but I am sure that the hon. Gentleman and I had one experience in common and that is that we found in both those by-elections a growing and keen interest in education. That is why it is appropriate that he should speak on that issue this evening.

I found that more and more parents are anxious about the quality and quantity of education provision. They find it difficult to believe, whatever statistics the Government bring forward, that the quality of education has not deteriorated markedly over the past few years. They expressed that anxiety in relation to their children and in many cases in Ryedale, and I suspect in West Derbyshire, in relation to their grandchildren. There was a real feeling that there was a need to look again at education and to provide the necessary and adequate resources that are so important to maintain standards in education. I was disappointed that the Secretary of State, in his maiden contribution on education, scarcely addressed the question of resources. Whether we like it or not, resources are crucial to an improvement in education standards.

Her Majesty's inspectors recently published a report on the effect of local authority and expenditure policies on education provision in England. It is clear enough from page 6, paragraph 8, that Her Majesty's inspectors accept that there is a link between resource allocation, expenditure and standards. They said:

"Though the relationship between the quality of work and levels of resources is acknowledged to be complex and direct causal links impossible to make, the data and its analysis confirmed that there is a statistically significant association between satisfactory or better levels of appropriate resources and work of sound quality, and between unsatisfactory levels of resources and poor quality work."

The evidence is clear. We need more resources to improve the quality of work. If one looks at the detail of the inspectors' report in relation to the provision of books and the scandalous condition of so many school buildings in Britain, it is no wonder that parents in Ryedale and West Derbyshire and in many other parts of Britain were worried about education standards and provision.

Those worries will not be eased by bringing in pious clauses such as those in the Bill. Those worries will be eased only when the Government have the commitment — not the public relations — to provide the necessary funding and resources to make sure that each and every child in Britain has an acceptable and decent standard of education. The Government, and the Secretary of State in his speech this afternoon, show no commitment towards that objective.

I want to make three detailed comments on the Bill as it stands, or as it may stand after its Committee stage. First, I want to comment on the relationship between local education authorities and school governing bodies on the curriculum. We are running tremendous risks in the Bill if the final responsibility for determining curriculum is vested in school governing bodies rather than local education authorities. I raise that concern with the Minister and I hope that he will respond to it when he replies.

My concern is simply that at a time of scarce resources, when it is clear that in so many schools parents are buying not just luxuries but essentials, it may be possible, if we give the final decision to governing bodies, that those in the more affluent areas of a local education authority, or in a more affluent local education authority, will decide that they want to fund privately, external to the education system, an additional course or teacher. If that power is with the governing body, it will create an unacceptable differential between schools. I hope that that is not the Government's intention in relation to the powers that are given to governors in terms of the curriculum. I feel that the final power in curriculum matters must be and should be vested with the local education authority.

I turn to the proposals that the Bill makes in terms of the relationship between teacher, local education authority, governing bodies and the Government. The Secretary of State said, in opening, that he would like to see an educational partnership. I am sure that all hon. Members would like to see that. I fear that the Bill does little to enhance the possibility of partnership between teacher and Government in two respects. One is of lesser importance than the other. Of lesser importance is the strong argument for giving teachers a greater say in governing bodies. Questions of proportion may need to be debated and decided. It is clear that the Government are not committed to extending the teacher's voice regarding school governing bodies.

I turn to the possibility of introducing teacher appraisal by way of legislation. I feel strongly that appraisal can work only if it is positive rather than negative — positive in the sense that it encourages teachers to improve standards, to have self-appraisal, and to develop self-confidence in the classroom. If the purpose of appraisal is to weed out inefficient teachers or teachers who do not easily fall into a mould, appraisal as a technique will be self-defeating and will create many problems in our education system.

If we are to introduce appraisal by way of regulation and legislation, the consensus that is so important for that partnership to which the Secretary of State referred will disappear. The teachers are close to a possible agreement at the Advisory, Conciliation and Arbitration Service regarding appraisal. Appraisal imposed by the Government would be much more difficult. I think that teachers of all unions and of all political complexions will resist and resent the Government imposing appraisal on them.

I turn to a matter that is not in the Bill as it stands but to which the Secretary of State referred — that is, a clause to ensure the freedom of speech in higher education institutions. As one who wholeheartedly supports freedom of speech, I fear that the Government are likely to make the problem worse rather than better. We must recognise that there is no such thing as an absolute freedom of speech. Parliament and legislators have always taken the view that freedom of speech must have conditions and limits. When Conservative Members look as if I have come forward with some profound revelation, it is no such thing. The libel laws have always limited our freedom of speech. For instance, Parliaments have limited freedom of speech in respect of racial comments and racial incitement.

Mr. John Carlisle rose——

Mr. Fatchett: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman in a few moments.

We are not talking about an absolute freedom of speech. It is much more difficult to draft a concept that is not absolute. I fear that drafting a non-absolute concept will lead to the difficulties to which my hon. Friend referred. I shall give way to the hon. Member for Luton, North (Mr. Carlisle) because he may wish to respond to my comments. It would be unfair not to allow him a bite at the cherry at an appropriate point for him.

We have never seen freedom of speech as absolute. If we provide freedom of speech, we have a responsibility not to abuse it. I think that there is plenty of evidence to show that freedom of speech is deliberately and concertedly being abused by members of the Conservative party to provoke violence and reaction on university and polytechnic campuses. I shall cite my evidence, which is fairly substantial. I refer to an article which appeared in The Guardian on Saturday 31 May this year. The article said simply:

"A leader of the Federation of Conservative Students wrote to an organiser of the British National Party proposing joint 'direct action' to disrupt the meetings of left wing students."

Where are the voices raised in the Conservative party on such issues? Will the Minister and the hon. Member for Luton, North condemn those tactics?

Before the hon. Gentleman gets to his feet and condemns them, he might refer to the guide produced by Gordon Libby, another member of the Federation of Conservative Students. The document, entitled "The Gordon Libby Guide to Disrupting NUS Conference", was published in 1984. Obviously, it is essential reading for all the hard men of the Right wing of the Conservative party. It is worth while looking at the tactics set out in Gordon Libby's guide because they have been repeated on university and polytechnic campuses in this country. The guide included thoughtful recommendations such as:

"Always be provocative. Remember you are not here to persuade the closed minded leftists, you are here to wind them up so much they lose control and disrupt the conference".

It is suggested that they should shout out things like "You red fascist scum." [Interruption.] I am glad that the hon. Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle (Mr. Leigh) is much amused by those comments. When members of the Conservative party talk about free speech, they must dissociate themselves from the tactics and behaviour of the Federation of Conservative Students.

I have provided the chairman of the Conservative party, the right hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit), with a full dossier on the behaviour tactics of the FCS and details of what it has done to disrupt the principle of freedom of speech. He has not done so. When the Tories get rid of that element within their party, they can come to the House of Commons and talk abour freedom of speech.

There is one other aspect on the freedom of speech that I wish to mention.

Mr. John Carlisle rose——

Mr. Fatchett: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman in a moment.

I feel strongly that freedom of speech must be exercised with responsibility. In the spring of this year, the hon. Member for Luton, North planned a visit to Leeds polytechnic, which is in my constituency and which is part of a multiracial community. The hon. Gentleman tried to go to Leeds with a blaze of publicity and said that he was defending freedom of speech. The hon. Gentleman wanted to speak at Leeds polytechnic. Nobody denied him that right. I have a simple view that, without publicity, nobody would want to listen to the views of the hon. Member for Luton, North. I am quite happy for him to have a telephone box meeting at Leeds polytechnic.

However, I disagree most profoundly—I feel that the hon. Member was responsible for it—with the literature that was put around regarding the meeting. It was scandalous, provocative and racist. It was designed deliberately to stir up trouble at Leeds polytechnic and, I suspect, in central Leeds as well. The hon. Gentleman has a responsibility in that respect. I shall listen to him only when he distances himself from the disruptive tactics and the scandalous propaganda and literature put out about that meeting. When he does that, he can lecture me about freedom of speech.

Mr. John Carlisle: As a vice-president of the Federation of Conservative Students, may I say that the federation completely deplores the disruptive tactics, which the hon. Gentleman described, that are alleged to have been used by members of the FCS. We do not employ the tactics employed by our opponents on the far Left. I dissociate myself and the association from such tactics.

I was somewhat heartened to hear the hon. Gentleman say that he upheld the right of freedom of speech, but he went on to qualify it. Will he confirm that at the time he was quoted correctly by a newspaper and gave advice that a democratically elected Member should not come to his constituency to speak because of the large ethnic population in that part of the country? Will he confirm that he supported the no-go area policy for Members simply because there were members of the ethnic population in that community? Even if we believe the hon. Gentleman's sincerity with respect to freedom of speech which I doubt how can he possibly extol that freedom, yet say to other Members, "You are not welcome to come to my constituency because your views might offend members of the ethnic population."? Is there now a no-go area for Members of Parliament?

Mr. Fatchett: The hon. Gentleman has raised two points. First, it comes as no surprise that he is a vice-president of the FCS. I suspect that its tactics are close to his politics. I would take him much more seriously if action were taken to get rid of those disruptive elements. There has been no action by the chairman of the Conservative party or by the vice-president of the FCS.

Secondly, the hon. Gentleman quoted only part of my comments, which did not surprise me. At that time, I and the director of the polytechnic said that we felt that it was inappropriate for the meeting to be held in the spring of this year, because we felt that the hon. Gentleman was clearly and deliberately using that platform as an opportunity to create provocation, violence and difficulties in a sensitive inner-city area. The director of the polytechnic and I are on record as saying that we would welcome the hon. Gentleman to the polytechnic in conditions and at a time that were more suitable. We suggested that he should come back in the autumn of this year. I should have thought that, if the hon. Gentleman contacted the authorities of the polytechnic to say that he wanted to come on another occasion, an invitation would be issued to him. If the hon. Gentleman wants to come on another occasion, I ask him to distance himself from the disgraceful literature and the tactics that were used to advertise the previous meeting.

Mr. John Carlisle: Will the hon. Gentleman give way? He has just made a serious accusation.

Mr. Fatchett: I shall not give way. I have answered the hon. Gentleman's point clearly. He will have an opportunity to make his own speech later.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford) rose——

Mr. Fatchett: I do not intend to pursue this point further, except to say

Mr. Carlisle: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it in order for an hon. Member to attack another hon. Member with blatant untruths and then not give him the opportunity to put the record straight?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That must be a matter for the hon. Member who has the Floor.

Mr. Fatchett: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Carlisle: Will the hon. Gentleman now give way on that untruth?

Mr. Fatchett: I do not recognise any untruth.

Mr. Carlisle rose

Mr. Fatchett: The hon. Gentleman will have the opportunity to make his own speech later. I fear that he is bringing his ECS disruptive tactics to the Chamber. That is unfortunate.

Freedom of speech is not an easy topic. The Conservative party, through its student movement, has a bad reputation. I am afraid that, in drafting legislation, we shall not support the principle of freedom of speech but shall make it that much more restrictive.

The Secretary of State will regret the legislation. It is not in any sense fortunate for the right hon. Member for Mole Valley (Mr. Baker) that his first major intervention as Secretary of State for Education and Science is one that brings forward this Bill. The legislation is flawed in many respects. The Bill and the right hon. Gentleman's speech go no way towards solving the substantial difficulties in our education system. Until resources are found, all the sweet words and all the proposals in the Bill will do little to improve the education provision for our children.

Mr. John Carlisle (Luton, North): I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for calling me to speak after the disgraceful contribution of the hon. Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett) and the aspersion that was cast on an hon. Member. I am grateful for the opportunity at the start of my speech to put the record straight about the meeting at Leeds polytechnic. It involves a former hon. Member, Mr. Christopher Price, who is well respected by both sides of the House. The meeting at Leeds polytechnic was cancelled — as the hon. Member for Leeds, Central should have had the courtesy to say — because the booked room was unsuitable. A new venue was found later.

I welcome the Bill in principle. It is needed by the education system. We welcome the fact that there will be greater parental involvement and that funds will be made available for the GCSE. We welcome the monitoring of our education system which will be undertaken by those who are not involved with the local education authorities. We especially welcome the disciplinary measures. I welcome the comments of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on corporal punishment. They will receive majority support among Conservative Members. We welcome also the other measures and wish the Bill a fair wind.

I should like to confine my remarks to the new amendment at which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State hinted and which presumably will be tabled in Committee. That important amendment on freedom of speech will allow Members of Parliament, whatever their party, to go to places of learning — which should be the homes of free speech — to give their views without fear or hindrance and, perhaps, more importantly, will allow others to make their views known to hon. Members.

The saddest aspect of what I and many others have suffered is that those who wanted to hear us speak — in many cases they have not been of our political persuasion or been in agreement with what we might say — were prevented from listening to us, and more importantly, from making their views known to us.

I was especially distressed that the president of the National Union of Students, Phil Woolas, declared after the Bradford incident — when I was knocked to the ground and physically attacked by people at a meeting — that the provocative nature of my speech made the attack plausible. I did not say a word at the meeting. That type of irresponsible comment by a man who purports to represent thousands of students should be noted by the House.

The amendment on freedom of speech has been tabled following violent attacks on various visiting speakers. It is necessary because many meetings — in my case, five of the past seven — have been prevented from taking place, for various reasons. The amendment is necessary because certain universities and colleges of further education persist in passing no-platform policies — no platforms for racists, however they are defined and no platforms for anti-semitics, and even ladies like Mrs. Victoria Gillick have been denied a platform at certain universities.

The background to the amendment is one of rooms being cancelled at short notice. Indeed, some colleges and universities have prevented rooms from being booked. My hon. Friends the Members for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) and for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) have faced that problem.

Mr. Cash: Has my hon. Friend had an opportunity to consider whether those universities and polytechnics have provisions in their charters that preclude the type of activities that he has just described? If my hon. Friend has not had an opportunity to look into that aspect, perhaps he will draw the attention of the Minister to it so that it is considered. It would be a serious offence to break with the provisions of a charter in a material respect.

Mr. Carlisle: I concur with that point. Only this week I received a letter from an academic at Oxford university which confirmed that view. The universities and polytechnics are breaking their charters by preventing these meetings from taking place.

The amendment is necessary because of violent picketing which has meant that visiting speakers, including me, have feared for their physical safety and that of not only the students who wish to come to the meetings but of the security officers, the police and everyone involved in the meetings.

The weasel words of the hon. Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett) said that there are limited forms of freedom of speech, and accused the Federation of Conservative Students and others of stirring up the problems that had arisen and of using the tactics and literature that he thinks could incite violence. The type of literature which has been surrounding me at the meetings I have had to attend has been quite disgraceful. The literature was inflammatory and almost crossed the laws of libel. The literature was virtually the same style throughout the meetings I have attended. That is why there is no doubt that it is inspired by the Left and within that I would include many Opposition Members.

No Conservative Member is frightened of vigorous heckling or opposition to our meetings. However, we object to physical intimidation of those who want to go and express their views. This part of the Bill is necessary for various reasons. Unfortunately, one reason is the incredibly weak response by the vice-chancellors and principals of further education colleges to the events which have taken place. I must say to them and to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, who will be very involved in this, that the basis of the various edicts and statements from the vice-chancellors is just not good enough.

The hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) said in another context that words are not enough and that we need action. I endorse that sentiment. We need action from the vice-chancellors and we certainly need an absolute guarantee that they will do all in their power to ensure that platforms are available for people, from whatever political hue, to be allowed to express their views. That has not been the case over the past few months, possibly even over the past few years. If the Bill stiffens the vice-chancellors in their determination to allow meetings to go ahead, and if the security at the meeting can provide the speakers and those attending the protection that they need, the Bill will certainly have achieved something.

I was concerned when the vice-chancellors, under Professor Shock, put forward their own guidelines to various vice-chancellors and talked about meetings perhaps having to be postponed or cancelled because of controversial speakers. No definition of a controversial speaker was suggested, and as long as those speakers speak within the laws of the land, which are comprehensive, there is no right for anybody in a place of academic learning to deny a platform to those who wish to use it.

The Bill is also necessary because of the weakness of vice-chancellors and others who take virtually no action against those who offend. You will be aware, Mr. Deputy Speaker, of the recent events at Bristol university where Professor John Vincent's lectures were abandoned because he was physically attacked and the meetings ended in mayhem. The students who came before the court were merely fined and slapped on the wrist. They were not expelled from the university. The taxpayer has the right to ask whether such students should be able to continue their studies at the taxpayers' expense when they are intent on disrupting meetings.

At the university of East Anglia, which I attended recently, the meeting was again prevented by the antics of the far left. Video cameras were on hand to show pictures of those who offended, which I believe included two members of the academic staff. I was especially concerned that no action was taken against those offenders. That is why this provision is necessary in the Bill. I say to those vice-chancellors and to the Members of another place that if they had the courage to accompany me to some of the meetings and to the universities and colleges and see what I and others have had to experience, perhaps they would understand the full extent of the problem we are facing.

The Bill is also necessary because of the vicious nature of the opposition shown towards speakers, the violence which I and others have seen first hand from those who can only be called the Fascist Left, and the disruptive and disgraceful literature which has been circulated before meetings inciting people to physical violence to try to prevent them. My right hon. Friend the former Secretary of State for Education and Science was right when he described such people as barbarians. Their intent is obvious. They wish physically to prevent meetings from taking place and physically to prevent hon. Members and others expressing their views and, perhaps more importantly, perhaps prevent others expressing opposition to the speakers. There is no doubt that that opposition is politically inspired and, I believe, supported by many Opposition Members. I believe that it is inspired by the anti-apartheid movement in my case, the anti-semitic movement in other cases and by the Marxists and far Left. I hope that when the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) replies to the debate he will join me in complete condemnation of those extreme political groups which have certainly disrupted meetings.

The Bill is also necessary because of the physical attacks upon students at university, especially members of the Federation of Conservative Students. I shall not list again, as I did in a recent Adjournment debate, the sort of attacks that some students have suffered at the hands of the far Left. I shall not list the meetings that have been denied to the FCS by massive amounts of money being extorted by students unions in terms of freshers evenings by being told at the last minute that facilities were not available, by the physical attacks on and off campus that members of the FCS have suffered and by the inability of many students unions to provide rooms in which to hold meetings, especially for the FCS. Those students now regrettably need the protection of the House to uphold the right of freedom of speech in the same way as we need the protection of the House.

We must hope that if the Bill is passed—I hope that it will be passed with the full support of those who uphold this right—there will be a new determination by the vice-chancellors to ensure that the disgraceful scenes which have taken place at universities never happen again in this country. I do not want to see police forces and policemen on university campuses, nor does any hon. Member. However, if we have reached the stage where there are students who are intent on violent disruption we must demand the protection of the law and the vice-chancellors must stiffen the protection they give as well as stiffening the discipline they exercise over those who offend. I say to the vice-chancellors, through the medium of the House, that there should be no doubt that when the offenders are caught, which they will be and are being, there should be no alternative but expulsion. I think that the House and the Government would demand that.

The University Grants Committee must seriously consider withdrawing funds from the universities which offend because that may be one way in which we could get the message across. The saddest fact of all is that many universities are concerned that this is taking place on their campuses because it puts off prospective students. My hon. Friend the Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Hickmet) was very concerned about his own university in Hull. Because of the problems, parents are bound to be dissuaded from recommending their children to attend such universities.

I speak with deep and bitter personal experience because of what I have suffered over the past few months, which has been shared, unfortunately, by some of my hon.

Friends. I welcome this initiative by the Government. I know that it has been called a dog's dinner in legislative terms and that there may well be difficulties, but it shows that the Government have a spirit and a determination to stamp out, once and for all, the opposition to the freedom which we uphold in this place more than in any other, the freedom of speech and the right to be heard. For that I welcome the Bill.

6.9 pm

Mr. Martin Flannery (Sheffield, Hillsborough): We have just heard a long speech on one subject, but we are dealing with a big Bill. All those of us here who have participated in education debates—there are quite a few who have not—know that.

I should like to read part of the motion in the name of my right hon. and hon. Friends, which will bring us back to the rest of the Bill. The parliamentary Labour party believes that the Bill "does nothing to widen educational opportunities nor to raise educational standards for all pupils; fails to provide the additional resources necessary for the improvement of standards of provision and achievement in education; and, like many previous and current Government proposals, is a totally inadequate response to the crisis in our schools brought about by the Government's policies."

Those are the realities with which we are contending. The Bill is a feeble and backward attempt, in line with many other feeble and backward attempts, to prove that the Tory party is not responsible for the crisis and chaos in our schools when everybody knows that it is.

An unnecessary turmoil in education has been thrust upon our country by the Conservative Government. In their attempt to bring back the elitism of the past, to which they constantly hark back and from which they cannot get away, and in order to have the best for themselves and their children, there are no depths that they will not go to. The Minister yawns because he has heard it before, but we have heard and seen before the antics of Right-wing Tories such as those who have just been speaking, and of Tory Governments, when it comes to the education of our children.

As a valuable by-product of the onslaught launched against it, education has been brought to the centre of the stage. I said to the previous incumbent of the Secretary of State's office that he had done things that united the teachers against the Government. Although the Government did not want education to be in the centre of the stage, as a result of what they did, they brought it there. Now they are panicking, because what happened in Ryedale and Derbyshire, West and, previously, in Fulham, and what is now happening regularly, has frightened them. They can see power eluding them and they feel that somehow they must cling on.

We have had the assisted places scheme. We have almost had the voucher scheme, which many members of the Government still believe in. We now hear something about Crown schools, whatever they are—centres of excellence, we are told. The children of fairly well-to-do people will go there. Parental choice has been pushed to the point when it means that certain schools will attract middle-class parents, and have all sorts of virtues, and then there will be the downtown schools, in the state in which the Government have placed them.

Now we have from the other place a Bill that the former Secretary of State boasted was the most important measure introduced in England and Wales since the Education Act 1944. God preserve us when that comes from a Minister who has plunged the whole of our education system into a deep crisis. What does he know about the Education Act 1944, having left us to face all the realities of what is now happening to our children? The Bill might be important to a Tory Government who have wrought havoc on state education for seven years to save money at the expense of our children and the teachers, in particular.

Sadly, the Bill is a missed opportunity to tackle the real problems facing schools and education today. It grapples with none of them. The hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Sir G. Finsberg) made a speech earlier, and it was a godsend to him that some nitwit encouraged people to demonstrate outside his surgery. One would have thought that the whole Labour party was encouraging them. My hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) had to put the hon. Gentleman right. The hon. Gentleman spent 99 per cent. of his speech on that subject and never dealt with anything in the Bill.

Only one subject came out of the speech of the hon. Member for Luton, North (Mr. Carlisle). We have had two one-subject speeches. Meanwhile, the whole Bill is under consideration. [Interruption.] You should not start telling me to go steady. I shall make the speech that I want to make. You stopped us speaking last Friday morning, you free speech people. That is the reality.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. I have not stopped anyone speaking.

Mr. Flannery: I know that, but Tory Members do, and they did last Friday, those free speech wallahs.

The Bill offers no positive suggestions for improving the lot of our children, our teachers or our schools. It suggests no clear way of improving the quality and standard of the curriculum or of teaching itself. It fails to outline any strategy for revitalising the weakened profession and the education system that it has planned so carefully.

What does the Bill do? It shifts the emphasis in the management of schools from the local education authorities, which have been democratically elected and which have a partnership with parents, teachers and governors, to the governing bodies in partnership with Government. The Government talk about favouring local government, but they are strengthening central Government and weakening local government through that partnership.

Mr. Key: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that one of the problems that we face, particularly in shire counties with hung councils, is that the local education authorities are not representative of the people who elect the councillors to those authorities? We find that the balance of power is held increasingly frequently by co-opted members.

Mr. Flannery: Of course I do not agree with that. The hon. Gentleman knows that I hold him in considerable respect, but not when he talks rubbish such as that.

Secondly, the Bill increases the influence of a central Government determined to impose their own ideological educational imperatives on the schools, and it guarantees the alienation of precisely those people whose support in delivering the education service is absolutely necessary. In other words, it is a continuation of the attack on the teaching force, without which no Government can educate our children. That force has been demoralised by the Government, and they are continuing that demoralisation in the Bill. The Bill shows not one iota of recognition of what has been done to the teaching force by the Government holding down their wages, saving money and handing out £0·25 billion to their friends in Johnson Matthey Bankers when they could have given it to the teachers. The Government should have done that instead of giving the money to useless people like that.

The Bill downgrades the importance of the professional input of the teachers into the good management of the schools. The passage of the Bill through the other place enabled the most backward supporters of the Government to rubbish the teaching profession. That is precisely what the Bill aims to do. Those Government supporters spread misinformation about the teaching profession. Such misinformation has resulted in fundamental parts of the Bill. The political assumptions of the Bill and the public image of schools and teachers that it promotes will have to be countered. The hard fact is that any amount of manipulation and distortion of our education system cannot go on any longer, and the Tory party knows that.

The Bill was in being before the Government knew the results of the by-elections. A start had been made on it, and now they are landed with it. It is an impossible Bill. Everybody knows that it is useless and should be thrown out. I am sure that many Tory Members who are educationists realise what they have been landed with. It is similar to when the ridiculous Bill on corporal punishment was produced as a result of what happened in the European Court of Human Rights. It said that some children in a class could be caned and others could not. So the teacher would have to say to a child, "You are misbehaving. Can I cane you or can't I?" What utter nonsense. I served on the Committee of that Bill and the chaos was unbelievable. It was similar to the chaos that the Government have produced in our education system.

The Government are worried that the electorate has now seen through it all. The game is up. [Laughter.] Conservative Members may force their laughter, but the Conservative party is in a frightful dilemma and does not know which way to turn. They must face up to the opinion polls, which show a 40 per cent. following for the Labour party and only 30 per cent. for the Conservative party. The Government are getting ready to provide more money, not because they think it is moral and right to do so, but because they must in order to survive.

The Bill is a throwback to the gang of Black Paperites who began their attack on education 10 years ago. They were ennobled by the Government for their efforts to roll back the great democratic advances that had been made, particularly in comprehensive state education. That cannot be done. Those advances cannot be rolled back by rubbishing the state education service or starving it of funds.

The Conservative party does not understand the state system of education. It deplores in its very bones the fact that the system is educating our children to higher levels than ever before. That is why Conservative Members try to rubbish the examination results achieved through state education which are massively higher than they have ever been in our history. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has a right to be heard.

Mr. Flannery: Thank you for protecting me, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but this hon. Gentleman will certainly insist that he is heard.

The hon. Member for Luton, North made a speech which, for sheer hypocrisy, was almost beyond belief. He——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman knows that we cannot tolerate the use of that word directed to an hon. Member.

Mr. Flannery: I did not call the hon. Gentleman a hypocrite, and I am allowed to say that.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is not entitled to allege that another hon. Member is indulging in hypocrisy. He should find an alternate way of expressing his view.

Mr. Flannery: I find it hard to find another word that fits the hon. Gentleman. He supports——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before the hon. Gentleman finds some other way of expressing his view, he should withdraw what he has already said.

Mr. Flannery: I shall withdraw it if I must, but I have used that word before and not had to withdraw it.

The hon. Gentleman visits South Africa frequently at the expense of South Africa house. He upholds the way of life of the South African Right wing against black people. I cannot understand how he dare lecture us about democracy.

Mr. J. F. Pawsey (Rugby and Kenilworth): I was not surprised to hear the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery) say that we had heard his speech before. He was right, because he makes the same speech every time. He described the Bill as impossible, and he was as wrong on that as he is on most matters.

I welcome my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to his new responsibilities and congratulate him on his splendid speech and on the Bill. It will do a great deal to remedy the acknowledged defects in the education system and to improve both the quality and standards of education in our schools.

The hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) described my right hon. Friend as being half-baked——

Mr. Radice: No, I did not.

Mr. Pawsey: Then he described the Bill as being half-baked. It is a real baker's dozen, and I can assure the hon. Gentleman that there is plenty of icing on this cake.

I was pleased to hear what my right hon. Friend said about the GCSE. He gave a clear commitment that it would go forward this year and mentioned an additional £20 million of new money, which would amount to about £4,000 per secondary school. The Government are to be congratulated on the depth of their commitment to this important new examination.

The hon. Member for Durham, North made an unfavourable comparison between the Bill and the Education Act 1944, and he was less than his normal generous self. He will come to accept, as most other hon. Members already do, that this is a major educational reform and that it will do a great deal to answer what the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) described as "the great debate". The agonising is over and the time for action is now with us, and the hon. Gentleman will see that action during the coming months and years.

The Bill is both imaginative and practical. It encompasses a range of measures from curricula to discipline and from school governing bodies to better training. They are all important and underline the Government's determination to improve education.

In the past we have been accused of being long on rhetoric and short on action, and it has been said that parents' and teachers' expectations have not been fulfilled, despite the best pupil-teacher ratio ever and the highest level of per capita spending. The Bill gives my right hon. Friend a marvellous opportunity to build on the foundation that was well established by our right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, North-East (Sir K. Joseph), who is to be congratulated on all that he has done for education. In the years that lie ahead he will come to be regarded as an outstanding Secretary of State. He has laid a solid foundation of which this Bill will be the first major stone. It will prove to be a watershed in education policy.

As many hon. Members wish to speak, I shall concentrate on two main issues: governing bodies and teachers. However, I shall first touch briefly on two other items: political indoctrination and corporal punishment. I was once sceptical about political indoctrination, but now I believe that it does occur. What is more, it is becoming increasingly prevalent. It is damaging to both teacher and pupil because it reduces a teacher's standing when that teacher is seen to be partial in the classroom towards the pupil. It is regrettable if, as the result of biased teaching, they develop a false sense of values or understanding. That is not education; it is indoctrination.

Mr. Greenway: Will my hon. Friend join me in picking up the argument advanced by the hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) that neither the Secretary of State nor he could state our political position in schools? Does my hon. Friend agree that that is complete nonsense? Obviously I could enter a school and state my political position on anything. Providing I state alternative political positions, I would be putting forward a balanced view and would be enabling pupils to choose. That is what education is about, and it is time that the hon. Gentleman learnt that.

Mr. Pawsey: I am grateful for that useful intervention, and I look forward to my hon. Friend developing that theme during his speech.

I was pleased to hear my right hon. Friend's clear commitment to retaining corporal punishment, and I was delighted to hear him say that we would have a free vote on this issue. That compares favourably with the attitude of Opposition Members who, despite questioning, have still failed to say where they stand on the question of a free vote. Will the Opposition allow their hon. Members a free vote or will they be whipped into the Lobbies? [Laughter.] The hon. Member for Durham, North finds that amusing, but he will have cause to laugh on the other side of his face because this is an important issue and the public will see it as such. This is an issue on which a genuine free vote should be allowed. I am disappointed that Opposition Members do not share our concern about this.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: I am absolutely amazed. Twelve months ago the hon. Gentleman went through the Lobby whipped on a Bill on corporal punishment, yet suddenly he thinks it is great to have a free vote. The hon. Gentleman should make it clear that the free vote is an attempt to get the Government off a difficult political hook. He should stop trying to make a virtue of it and accept that it is political expediency. On this side of the House we stick to our principles: we are against corporal punishment in schools.

Mr. Pawsey: If the hon. Gentleman wishes to stick to his principles, there should be a free vote. If he believes all his colleagues will vote in the way that he thinks they will, he should put that to the test. I challenge him to give the issue a free vote, but I am sure he will not take it up.

I regret the decision taken in the other place. Corporal punishment has a respectable place in Britain's schools. It is not frequently used, and it is more of a deterrent than anything else. The decision reached in another place was not helpful and there were no suggestions as to what should take the place of corporal punishment. Other countries have been quoted, but it is forgotten that in France, for example, when a child is suspended from school, social security benefits are also stopped for that child. The Lords should have devoted a little more thought to this issue.

The Bill re-emphasises the parental role in schools and recognises that education is a partnership between teacher, parent and child. It reinforces the belief that, in the overwhelming majority of cases, parents know best what is right for their children. For far too long parents have been bystanders, helplessly watching while their children's education has become less relevant to the practical world. The proposals in the Bill will ensure that parents are given a voice equal to that of the LEA nominees. Henceforth, each school will have an annual meeting when the governors must answer to the parents for the way in which the school is run. Nothing so concentrates the mind as being answerable and subject to cross-examination by one's peers in public. That in itself will help to ensure that schools are more closely aligned to the practicalities of the job market.

When parents are in a position to influence schools they are less likely to tolerate second-class subjects in second-class schools. The Bill will ensure that great emphasis is placed on what is recognised as the core curriculum—those subjects necessary for people to obtain employment and to enjoy a reasonable standard of living. It will be a case of peace studies out and technical studies in.

I do not suggest that this single measure will automatically unlock the door to better standards and improved quality. I recognise that, in some areas, it may be difficult to get parents to participate. I am convinced, however, that those areas will be in the minority and that, in general, parents will be anxious to participate in the running of their youngsters' schools.

Parents recognise the importance of education and that is why this debate is taking place. Parents know that, like the love of a good woman, education is indeed beyond price.

Mr. Weetch: Ah.

Mr. Pawsey: I thought that that might interest the hon. Gentleman. He is always keen on good women!

[Mr. Pawsey]

The debate is a direct response to parental disquiet about schools and the education system. Most parents care about education and the Bill attacks some of the proven inadequacies.

Clauses 3 to 14 relate to school governing bodies. There will be four categories of governors — parents, LEA representatives, teachers and those co-opted by the other governors—and they will serve for four years. The hon. Member for Durham, North—I am sorry that he has left the Chamber—was a little disparaging about this. I believe that governors are important in the life of schools, and the Bill will do much to underline their importance. It will ensure that they have a much greater part to play in the administration of schools.

The LEAs will continue to determine policies for the overall management of schools but, henceforth, the governing body will be able to determine policy within the school. Clause 25 makes provision for the LEA to pass funds to the governing body to cover the cost of books and other items which it believes desirable. In short, it gives more autonomy to individual governing bodies and head teachers.

Schools will be able to respond quicker to the perceived needs of the pupils. They will be able to decide for themselves whether funds should be spent on new video equipment or on books. This is a measure of devolution and must be welcomed. The LEAs must also provide each school with a statement of its running costs. Effectively, the LEA will have strategic powers, but the governors will decide the policy to be adopted in their schools. Henceforth, schools will be a triumvirate, with the LEAs, parents and heads coming together on the basis of near equality.

I wish to enter one caveat—perhaps my hon. Friend the Minister, when he replies, will comment on it. It is essential that parents are able to obtain relevant information which will enable them to make a sound judgment on the running of the schools. The Bill also seeks to help heads and provides them with a better legal basis than at present. This should be widely welcomed because the head is the key figure in any school. I have long held the view that where there is a good head there are good staff, and a good staff equals a good school and sound education.

Let me return to the make-up of the governing body. I said that governors have the power to co-opt. When that power is used wisely, any shortage of expertise or knowledge within the elected governing body can be made good by specific co-options. If the governing body lacks the expertise of an accountant able to examine the LEA's figures on the school's running costs, that accountant could be co-opted. The additional co-opted members could represent industry to the advantage of business—a point made by my right hon. Friend in his opening speech.

All these measures confirm the importance attached to the new reformed governing bodies. The new powers will encourage more people to come forward, providing a better range of expertise and knowledge, which, in turn, will improve the quality and relevance of education.

The Bill will also ensure that teachers enjoy a professional status by ensuring professional standards, and that means appraisal. For that reason, reserve powers on this issue will be introduced. A fair system of appraisal will be introduced which will bring with it better promotion prospects for the good classroom teacher. There will be an improvement in the opportunities for in-service training. These measures are long overdue.

I refer to an excellent speech made by my hon. Friend the Minister of State at Leicester on 17 March in which he said:

> "In the end the benefits our children get from being at school are primarily the achievement of their school teachers. All the other educational facilities are simply a means of helping teachers in their work. The first and most essential need of any school is good staff and very little can be achieved unless we have enough teachers of the right quality."

That is a clarion call for professional standards in a professional teaching force.

If I may digress for a moment, hand in hand with professional standards goes a professional salary. That is why I have argued in the House and elsewhere that the £1·25 billion available for teachers' pay over a time scale of four years should be concentrated into a narrower period and, what is more, it should be front-loaded. I am not saying that this funding, which is over and above any normal increases in teacher remuneration, should be unconditional. In addition to appraisal, teachers would be required to accept those duties which have long been taken for granted but which came into question during the dispute. Appraisal will improve career prospects for the good classroom teacher, and that is important at a time of falling rolls when promotion is no longer as swift as it was. I welcome the provision which will enable the Secretary of State to respond to local authority bids for in-service training, provided that they clearly underline the benefits of such training.

I welcome the Bill. I believe that it will prove to be a turning point. It is a positive move to reform schools through their governing bodies. I believe that it will be applauded by parents and teachers as a major step towards improving the quality and standards of state education.

Mr. Ken Weetch (Ipswich): I consider all Education Bills from the point of view of a practitioner. Before I came here, I did 20 years in the trade—10 as a schoolmaster and 10 training teachers. Examining the Bill purely from the point of view of a practitioner, I find some useful things in it.

The trailers for the Bill implied that it would be one of the most important pieces of legislation since the Education Act 1944. It is hardly that, but it says some significant things. I am sorry that it has become a cookpot for people's prejudices. They have thrown their prejudices in as they have passed by. I notice that The Times described the Bill as a Christmas tree on which everybody hung something as he went by. That is true. The Bill set out to redefine the responsibilities of local education authorities, governors and the teaching profession.

Mr. Chris Patten: Like the hon. Gentleman, I read with interest the Times leader to which he referred. Is he also interested in the fact that a fortnight before, in another leading article, The Times had advised us to hang yet more things on the Christmas tree? Perhaps the consistency of The Times leader writers is not now what it always was.

Mr. Weetch: I am surprised about that. Although I thought that The Times was a little Right wing, I thought that it was consistent from week to week. I shall look up the Minister's reference, as I am a little surprised.

My point still stands, however. The Bill started out as one thing, and it is rapidly becoming a series of others. It is right to involve parents much more in the nation's schools. It has always surprised me how little influence parents have brought to bear since the war. Local education authorities have always been well organised, as have teachers' organisations and the Government bureaucracy, but parents never have. They have been organised late in the day. I welcome the fact that the Government have done something to strengthen parents' influence. After all, it is their children who are being taught. That is often forgotten. Parents care a great deal about what happens and know what their children are, or are not, getting. Parents are much wiser on these matters than many people suppose.

It is also forgotten sometimes that, through rates and taxes, parents pay for it all. If they pay the piper, they should be able to call some of the tune. A sound relationship between parents and schools can have a profound and constructive influence on the performance of the school and the teaching profession, for the good of education as a whole.

I regret the fact that for much of the post-war period parents have not been as involved in education as they should have been, as they have frequently been unwelcome when they have attempted to bring their interest to bear. I know of some schools where parent-teacher associations are still not very welcome. That is to be regretted. Parents have not been well organised as a pressure group, but I hope that that will change. The Bill's central aim of involving parents is constructive, although the relevant provisions should be amended in Committee.

It is right to clarify the functions and responsibilities of local education authorities, governing bodies, headmasters and staff. There has been confusion about responsibilities from time to time. No one interest should predominate. It is also desirable to define the powers of governing bodies and how they can be exercised in regard to matters such as the curriculum, discipline and standards of schools.

The Secretary of State said that good discipline and the ability to keep order and a peaceful atmosphere in schools were the key to good education. He is right. If there is not reasonable discipline and order, one will never teach anything. The critical question is whether the Bill will achieve that aim. In several respects, however, the answer is no.

The Bill proposes the concept of balanced representation on school governing bodies, no interest allegedly being predominant. It is surprising, therefore, that the representation of teachers is underweighted as schools get bigger. That is a critical mistake. I shall not quote figures, as that would be more appropriate to a Committee speech than one on Second Reading, but as a school increases in size, teacher representation gets proportionately worse while that of other categories such as parents increases. There is no balance in that. Moreover, the arrangement undervalues the section of representation that has day-to-day responsibility for good education and for promoting good teaching. That is an unfortunate way in which to start off the concept of balance in the Bill. If I am on the Committee I shall try hard to have that clause amended, because it is clearly wrong-headed.

The second example relates to conduct and discipline and is about who bears responsibility. If a school has no discipline within its walls, little of any account will be taught there. I say that as a former practising schoolmaster who still thinks like a schoolmaster. If there is no order in a school, there is no education either. I am alarmed about clause 21 and hope that the Secretary of State will be a good deal more resolute about the appeals procedures than he seemed to be in his speech. I taught in difficult schools in inner-city areas, where weak discipline schools did not survive. It was as simple as that.

The sting in the tail of clause 21 is quite vicious. It says that in the last resort the local education authority can order a headmaster and staff to take back individuals or groups whose behaviour could have been violent, anti-social in the extreme or akin to disruption. It will be able to force the headmaster and staff, against their better judgment, to take back such people. That is not right, and if such a course of action is forced on the headmaster and staff we can say goodbye to discipline in our schools. Who is taken back should be a matter for the headmaster and staff, and no decision should be forced on the headmaster. If that happens, the headmaster and staff will be humiliated and lose their authority.

I listened carefully to the Secretary of State's remarks about the right of appeal. I hope that we shall not be fobbed off with a paper exercise and that the right of appeal will be genuinely independent. There should not be any right of appeal at all and the headmaster's word, if supported by the governors, should be the end of the matter. This is because the headmaster has the day-to-day responsibility at the sharp face for keeping order and for teaching. He should not be buried under a mountain of worthless paper that detracts from his position. If there is to be authority and good standards in our schools, the headmaster and his staff must be supported at all times. There should be no political interference from a local authority which wishes to smooth over a difficult situation — not to get justice, but simply to get a convenient settlement and to sweep the difficulties under the carpet.

I should like to speak in more detail about teacher appraisal. I spent 10 years in that field looking at people teaching in schools of one kind or another. The practice of teacher appraisal is fraught with difficulties. It is difficult to appraise the performance of a teacher, and the first key question that one must ask is: what is the teacher being appraised for? Is it to find out basic things about his professional standards and whether he is fit to continue in classroom teaching? If that is so, Governments have been falling down on their responsibilities for the last 50 years. A professional teacher leaves college or university with a qualification and is then on professional probation. In many cases that probation is pathetic. Nobody cares whether the teacher sinks or swims, and I have seen many young teachers driven out of the profession. Before the Government embark on a new series of measures, they should consider whether they are trying to work the old measures with any degree of consistency.

I read a recent speech by the former Secretary of State. Speaking to the Industrial Society, he said that the idea of linking appraisal to salary had been given up. Perhaps when the Minister winds up the debate he could tell us whether that is the case, or appraisal will be used as a factor in determining salary. In his speech the former Secretary of State said that he did not want appraisal aligned to any scheme of pay or to any scheme of instant reward. I am not encouraged by the clause in the Bill, but it is encouraging to note that the former Secretary of State said that appraisal was to be introduced voluntarily. That is the only way in which it will work.

Mr. John Powley (Norwich, South): I take the point that the hon. Gentleman makes about teacher appraisal. Does he agree that every time a teacher is promoted or is moved up the scale, or moves from one school to another, he or she is appraised in some way before entering another grade with better remuneration?

Mr. Weetch: I accept that point. If anybody in the teaching profession aspires to promotion and wants to get into the higher reaches of the profession and become a headmaster, along the way there must be some element of appraisal. In our present system of education people are promoted for some weird and wonderful reasons. I would rather have a regularised system of appraisal, provided it is done in a proper way, than the hand-to-mouth system that exists in some of our schools now. I accede to much of the spirit of the intervention.

I should like to make two further points, the first of which is about two clauses in the Bill. One point is about sex education, and the other is about political education. If there is to be political or sex education, it should be carried out in a professional, balanced and constructive way. Those should be the ethics of the teaching profession. In my experience, indoctrination is often counter-productive. When one tries to influence young people to go in one direction, more often than not they will go in the opposite direction. Nevertheless, the point about balanced and constructive education stands. We should have political education in schools, because such education is part of citizenship training.

Has the Minister any substantial body of evidence to show that the course of political education is being widely, in detail and substantially perverted? The answer must be, "No, not on a widespread scale." The vast majority of teachers in ordinary schools are teaching in a professional way. There are exceptions. One can go into some inner-city areas where a Wendy house is sexist, and Janet and John books are too heavy an emphasis on being heterosexual. One should not adapt legislation to iron out small lunatic sections when the vast bulk of teaching is fair.

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): Does the hon. Gentleman accept that it was Members of the Labour party who, in the other place, proposed a whole series of amendments that would have much the same effect as the clause that he is criticising, and produced plenty of evidence to support them?

Mr. Weetch: I cannot answer that question. I never follow the events of the other place, which fill my head with fog. I accept the hon. Lady's point. However, the Government should be careful before they use the heavy hand of legislation to interfere in a professional matter which, in the majority of cases, is being properly conducted. They should examine their conscience on that point.

With that, I give a cautious welcome to large sections of the Bill, although in Committee many of its discrepancies will have to be ironed out.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind the House that the 10 minute limit on speeches came into effect at 7 o'clock.

7.1 pm

Mr. Robert Rhodes James (Cambridge): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Weetch) for talking about the Bill, using his profound knowledge. I express gratitude to the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Freud) and other hon. Members for their reference to the admirable maiden speech made by my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr McLoughlin). The hon. Member for Cambridge, North-East, like me, came to the House through a by-election, so we know what the experience is like.

The Bill places the House in a rather surprising and surprised position. What began as a modest and almost uncontroversial measure to implement the proposals of the White Paper "Better Schools", has, in its progress through the other place, assumed a quite different character. If all the rumours that we hear are true, the Bill seems destined to suffer further expansion before reaching the statute book. I express my warm admiration, affection and regard for the former Secretary of State, my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, North-East (Sir K. Joseph). Although our paths diverge on many matters of policy, my admiration and our friendship have not ended.

From what force came the inspiration for the amendments moved in the other place? They have extended, and have sought to extend further, the scope of the Bill. New clause 16, which forbids the promotion of partisan political views in the teaching of any subject, is the classic example of what my former headmaster used to describe as ingenious but idiotic. My hon. Friends might applaud the abolition of teaching of Marx and Marxist economics in schools. I would also cheer if we sought the removal of Hayek and Friedman. That would not distress me too greatly. However, would it then be illegal for me to give courses on Lord Randolph Churchill, Mr. Gladstone, Ramsay MacDonald——

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: Or the monarchy?

Mr. Rhodes James: Or, indeed, royalism, an evil and worrying thing. Would we have to follow the Russian example, in which new histories of the second world war completely omit any reference to Stalin? I suggest that, in the long catalogue of legislative nonsense, this clause is in the Edward Lear class. I hope that my hon. Friend and the Committee will look hard at this clause as amended in another place.

Mr. Leigh: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Rhodes James: No, I will not.

On the failed Lords amendments on the freedom of speech, I have more sympathy with the Government and my hon. Friend the Minister. The orginal wording produced in the other place was too wide and hopelessly impractical. Lord Beloff, among others, was quite right to express criticism of it. It was wise of the Government to withdraw it. Nonetheless, there is a problem, one magnified recently by the fate of a constituent of mine, Mrs. Strachan, who, when working at the North-East London Polytechnic, was beaten up in her own classroom. The appalling organisation of the polytechnic would not even, beyond a mild reproof, deal with the students who did it. Any institution that cannot protect even its own staff, let alone visiting politicians, deserves censure and opposition. Although I do not agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North, (Mr. Carlisle) on many things, I do on this subject.

In 1971 we had in Cambridge what is known as the Garden house affair, in which deplorable things were done

—ironically, under the leadership of Professor John Vincent. Sentences were passed and it was made abundantly clear that students and academics are as subject to the law of the land as the rest of us. Since then, we have had no trouble. I ask my hon. Friend, although I sympathise strongly with the motivation of the amendments, to consider whether this is necessary. The fact that we may have craven and inept vice-chancellors and principals does not affect the fact that the law is there. Again, this is a matter for the Committee to debate, because often what we need is enforcement of the present laws rather than the creation of new ones.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bath (Mr. Patten) knows about the proposals, under the European Commission regulations, for the employment of women in universities. I do not care particularly whether my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science or my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Employment destroys the proposal. I earnestly suggest that it should be destroyed. It is already difficult enough for women to get employment in higher education. If there were an amendment to section 51 of the 1974 Act, that could become even more difficult.

The Bill deserves "modified rapture", and my hon. Friend will know the origin of that phrase. However, I hope that the my right hon. Friend The Secretary of State and the Committee will address themselves seriously to the points that I and other hon. Members have made.

7.8 pm

Mr. D. E. Thomas (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy): The Bill addresses itself to the structure of the education system at local and school level, to its content at local level in terms of the development of the curricula and to the financial management of resources at school level.

I welcome the participation in the structure of education by parents, the LEAs and the teachers. It is a model that I have always believed should be followed in all public services, in that one should look for co-operation between the deliverers of the service, its clients and the authority that has statutory responsibilities for the services.

The point that most concerns me about the proposed structure for the governors of schools is the proposals for the grouping of schools under clause 9. I mention this particularly as the Welsh Office Minister responsible for education is listening. He is well aware of the issue of schools in areas where the LEA has a bilingual policy, but has not established bilingual schools. I refer in particular to the case of Gwent. Schools that are grouped together should represent the linguistic diversity of the communities and schools or units which are part of the grouping. That also applies to the curriculum.

The sections of the Bill which will deal with the school curriculum need to be read in the context of the latest document on local authority policies for the school curriculum. That is contained in the response to the 1983 curriculum review which was published earlier this month.

The review makes it clear that the Government regard it as important that > "The Secretaries of State, the LEA and the school each need a curricular policy in order to discharge their respective functions."

In terms of the governors' role in developing curricula, that is clearly the most specific statement that we have had on the need for a community-based approach to curriculum. I welcome that principle.

Clause 17 (2)(a) stresses that representations made by persons in the community that is served by the school should be taken into account when developing the curriculum. That is a key factor for language provision in Wales and for the provision for cultural and multi-cultural diversity in inner cities and communities throughout Britain.

It is important that that aspect of community representation must be read as including provision for ethnic minority communities to allow them to make representations and for the issue of community languages in both primary and secondary schools to be included in the curricular discussion. I am not suggesting that the governors of schools should be wholly responsible for deciding that languages other than English should be provided for within the curriculum. However, as representatives of the community, the governors should have that role in curriculum development. It is essential that these aspects of curriculum development in the locality should be seen alongside paragraphs 52 and 53 of the local authority response to the curricular review and the response to Swann.

I was encouraged to see that more than one third of the authorities responding to "Better Schools", gave detailed attention to the issue of a multicultural approach to the curriculum. I would expect that within the context of the new structure proposed for curriculum assessment at governor level much progress can be made in the communities.

I remember hearing Sheila Browne, a former chief inspector of schools, stress to the Select Committee that it was important that each school should assess its contributions to its community each year. The governors should be able to to do that under the Bill.

Clause 24, which deals with the provision of sex education, is controversial. It might appear to be a form of bias in favour of one sexual preference. It states that > "those pupils to have due regard to moral considerations and the value of family life."

That might be a form of propaganda for heterosexuality. I say that in the mildest possible way because I do not want to excite Conservative Members on this issue. However, we must accept and understand the issues of homosexuality, lesbianism and other varied sexual preferences in a tolerant society. The clause would or could undermine equality of approach to that matter. That may be what some hon. Members would want.

Finally, I would like to consider the financial controls on schools as set out in clause 25. Here again I welcome the structure that we are offered. For the first time it gives the responsibility for financial management of schools to the local education authority. We accept that the school budgeting may be managed by the governors. All that structure on financial management at the chalk face is rendered redundant if we read the other two relevant documents about the financing of schools published in recent weeks—the HMI reports on England and Wales. They show that there is a disparity of provision between schools and LEAs, which means that the provision in various areas is deteriorating. The 11 to 16-year age group in particular is less well provided for than later age groups. Both reports give careful consideration to the appalling position of many school buildings and of the school environment which is affecting teaching in schools. The English report states at paragraph 16 that the school sector is the one causing most concern:

"It is getting by and providing satisfactorily for most pupils in many places by robbing Peter to pay Paul; doing less; or with the help of sizeable contributions from parents."

Parental contributions are crucial to many schools. However, they can lead to broad discrepancies between areas and within individual LEAs. Schools in higher-income areas benefit from funding from parents while those in more deprived areas do not.

The warning I issue is that although we may welcome certain of the structural changes and regard them as not essentially partisan, the Bill does not tackle the major issue about the education system: the overall provision of resources. It is in that area that anything which is done at the chalk face will be completely undermined.

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury): I start by declaring an interest in the Bill, first as a parent with children in the independent and maintained sector in the ratio of 2:1, and, secondly, as an ex-teacher and former member of the Assistant Masters and Mistresses Association and consultant to that body.

It is broadly fair to say that, until the Government took office in 1979, the national education debate was dominated by the comprehensive versus grammar selective argument, and I regret that that is still true in Salisbury. My right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, North-East (Sir K. Joseph) has had little credit for moving the debate forward from that issue. The central issue now has become the quality of education and how that can be improved for the majority of pupils in the schools that they attend.

The potency of this issue, recognised now in virtually all parts of the House, was not exclusively the discovery of my right hon. Friend the former Secretary of State. The right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) must be given some credit. However, his Ruskin college speech, which was intended as an agenda for action, became dissipated and blurred in the Shirley Williams debates that followed. They were intended to identify areas of concern, secure agreement and concensus and produce a programme for policy initiatives. Instead, they became little more than a public relations exercise with no identifiable outcome. The media coverage generated by the Williams roadshow did not solve anything. It publicised yet more criticism and discontent. It sharpened the sense that something needed to be done, but whatever it was, it was not happening. The debate became a warm-up for my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, North-East.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, North-East activated powers long latent in the Education Act 1944. Whereas my right hon. Friend's predecessors had been content to tiptoe in the secret garden of the curriculum, he seized upon his powers to redesign the landscape—his power to co-ordinate.

The Green Paper that preceded the Bill some time ago stated that the curriculum had been overloaded so that the basic skills of literacy and numeracy — the building blocks of education—had been neglected. Schools had been over-ambitious, embarking on new subjects and new methods of teaching without ensuring that teachers knew what they were teaching or whether that was appropriate to the pupils' capacities or the needs of their future employees.

The Green Paper suggested a review, and the author hoped that pupils would end up with "a basic understanding of the functions of our democratic political system, of the mixed economy and the industrial activities, especially manufacturing, which create our nation wealth."

My right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, North-East did not say that. It is contained in the 1977 Green Paper "Education In Schools", which was produced by the Labour party. However, it has taken 10 years for my right hon. Friends the Members for Leeds, North-East and for Mole Valley (Mr. Baker) to deliver the goods and to do what everyone said needed to be done and produce a timetable for that.

The teaching profession, at a time of falling rolls, low pay and restrictive career opportunities, has been coping with massive reform. The reform of the examination system, with the propsect of appraisal, will, I hope, be resolved by ACAS rather than through powers in the Bill.

The Bill reflects, and converts into legislation, the concern that has been widely felt for some time that parents should not have bureaucratic barriers placed between them and the schools that their children attend. The emphasis that it places on consumerism is essentially democratic and it is hard to see how anyone can argue convincingly against conferring new rights upon parents, or argue that it is against the interests of education for parents to be more closely involved in the running of the schools that their children attend. I am pleased that local community interest will be represented in a balanced way on governing bodies. As ever, there is a balance to be struck.

It has been said this afternoon that the Bill is a Christmas tree that was grown in the House and sent to the other place for decoration. It has acquired some pretty odd and heavy baubles in that place and it will need some gentle handling if it is not to keel over altogether. Let us be careful about clauses 16 and 39, on political indoctrination. I find them acceptable, but I believe that we must guard against over-reaction, which would deny the very balance that we are seeking to achieve.

I applaud the declamatory exhortation in clause 24, on sex education—few would clamour against it—but if we are going down that road I would wish to see added a responsibility towards education on substance abuse—for example, drugs, alcohol, tobacco and solvents. Adding such clauses puts considerable extra burdens on teachers, LEAs and the Department, and all of them have resource implications.

My views on corporal punishment are well known. I find it extraordinary that at a time when society is attempting to come to terms with violence we respond by insisting that the only answer is violence inflicted by adults on children. That is extraordinary and bizarre.

The hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) said that my comments on clauses 26 and 27 — the annual report to parents—were mistaken. I accept that we cannot rely solely on an annual meeting. I would go further and say that what worries me about the annual report or meeting between governors and parents is that it might turn into a kangaroo court for individual complaints against teachers in a public forum at which teachers cannot answer back. That would worry me very much.

It is not true to say, as some still argue, that all our education problems are about quality and not money. However, anyone who has so much as dipped into the Audit Commission's report of last month on the management of secondary education must understand that huge sums are being wasted in the system at a time when we are so obviously short of money in so many areas of school life.

That is a challenge that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State must face squarely, just as he must face the challenge of presiding over an increasingly hard-working Department which is so obviously and chronically understaffed and under-resourced. It is incapable of coping with the burdens that are now being put upon it. Education Ministers' letters win the snails' race in the life of a Member of Parliament, and Select Committees wait a year for a Government response. One example is the report on the science budget. The baubles throw into question the basic competence of the Department to cope with the job that it is being asked to undertake.

The new-found power of the Secretary of State has been taken, mistakenly, for centralism. I have heard my right hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley, the new Secretary of State, twice say that he wishes power to move from the hub along the spokes to the rim of the wheel. That is surely what the Bill is all about. It breaks new ground and creates new relationships between consumers and the providers of education. It addresses itself to the international comparisons, which we disregard at our peril.

I wish my right hon. Friend well at the start of what I hope will be a long and successful tenure of office. Parliament can set the tone and background for our education system, and the Bill will be a milestone. If children are to recapture the great educational birthright that is traditionally theirs, my right hon. Friend must achieve two prerequisites. He has re-entered the Chamber just in time to hear the two prerequisites which he must recognise.

First, in answer to my parliamentary question on 19 May, my hon. Friend the Member for Dartford (Mr. Dunn), the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science, produced alarming figures that showed that in the past seven years for which statistics are available the number of head teachers retiring early has trebled, that the number of deputy heads retiring early has doubled, that the number of senior teachers retiring early has quintupled and that the number of scale 4 teachers leaving has doubled. The profession at its senior end is voting with its feet, and that is in nobody's interest.

When ACAS has done its work, when we have done ours on the Bill, and when good faith has been restored, my right hon. Friend knows that he must always go to Cabinet to fight his corner and to wrestle for his Department the money that will be a necessary component in raising the status of the teaching profession. Most important of all, my right hon. Friend must set out to create a peaceful and stable education world if he is to create the framework for real progress.

Mr. Jack Thompson (Wansbeck): I apologise to the House for having entered the Chamber only recently. I have been committed to other business in the House of similar importance. I intend to refer to only three issues which concern me especially. As I have explained, I have missed the earlier part of the debate.

Those who are involved in education in my constituency and county are looking for great things from the Secretary of State. Things have been so bad in the past four or five years that miracles are expected from the new incumbent of the office of Secretary of State for Education and Science. There are some doubts, however, about whether his magic wand will be made available to him or whether it will be removed from him.

The letter that we received from the Secretary of State's predecessor, the right hon. Member for Leeds, North-East (Sir K. Joseph) in response to the school inspectorate's annual report was astonishing. In my short experience in the House, it is the first time that a Secretary of State has responded in such a way to a report from the inspectorate. That surely indicates the dire and difficult situation that education faces.

When I mentioned to my constituents that the Bill's Second Reading was to be debated today, their reaction was, "Are there not more important issues to consider in the light of the present state of education?" My response was, "Fair enough, that may be, but currently the Bill is before the House for consideration."

I am fully in support of parent governors. I say that with some authority because I first became a school governor as a parent governor about 20 years ago. It is not a new concept for me. When my child left the school of which I was a governor, I became a local education authority governor. I am now a co-opted governor of the same school and I have the honour of being the chairman of the governors. Continuity is important and one of the dangers will be the breaking of parent governors' continuity under the Bill. Difficulties will arise.

There is a three-tier system in my county. We have the five to nine-year-olds in the primary or first schools, the nine to 13-year-olds in the middle schools and the 13 to 16-year-olds in the high schools. If parent governors are to have a four-year tenure of office, there will be difficulties. For example, some children will not be in the same school for four years. Secondly, a parent will probably not want to be involved as a governor of the school which his or her child attends for the first year that the child is at the school. The parent will become interested in the role only after the first year has passed. The parent will become a parent governor eventually and by the time that he or she has his or her feet under the table and is taking an in-depth interest in the governing of the school, the child will have left.

If we are to talk about parent governors in the right context and in proper terms, they must be the parents of children who are attending the schools of which they are governors. The parent governors of my board serve while their children attend the school of which they are governors. There is an arrangement through the parent-teacher association and the parents' organisation that provides that when a governor's child leaves the school, the parent leaves the board of governors. That seems eminently sensible, but that will not happen under the Bill. There must be flexibility for the education authority. It must be allowed to make some arrangement in the interests of parents and children that is suitable for the requirements of the school.

There are other difficulties. I note that in one paragraph it is suggested that the person or persons who appoint the governor can then remove him. I cannot see how that can work in terms of a parent being appointed by the parents of a school on a ballot—I assume that there will be a postal ballot—as a parent governor. The problem will arise if the parents wish to remove that governor. What do they do? Do they call a special meeting and cause problems between one group of parents and another? There will be all sorts of problems. While this should not detract from the idea of having parent governors, there should be a more flexible arrangement than that suggested in the Bill.

With regard to the curriculum, I find it difficult to understand the proposition in clause 16:

"It shall be the duty of every local education authority—

(a) to determine, and keep under review, their policy in relation to the secular curriculum for the county".

Clause 17 provides:

"The articles of government for every county, controlled and maintained special school shall provide for it to be the duty of the governing body to consider—

(a) the policy of the local education authority . . .

(c) how (if at all) the authority's policy should in their opinion be modified in relation to the school".

It goes on to say that it is the duty of the head teacher "to have regard—

(i) to any representations which are made to him, with regard to the determination or organisation of the secular curriculum".

I find that very worrying and complex. The system that is operated in all the schools in which I am involved is that the Department lays down general principles about the curriculum and the local education authority considers this in the context of its responsibilities. Indeed, this Friday evening we will be discussing in detail one aspect of the curriculum sent to us by the local authority, and the visiting governors will be considering that aspect of the curriculum when they visit. Conclusions will then be reached that will be relevant to the local education authority's policy and to the Department's policy. I see nothing wrong with that system. What is now suggested will cause some consternation and problems as to who determines the curriculum.

Clause 42 on recoupment will cause some problems in my county, as I imagine it will in many other shire counties. In essence, it means a free trade of further education students. The proposition will significantly affect the activities of shire counties closely associated with metropolitan areas. In my county of Northumberland there is a prime example. We have about 351 students now in establishments outside the county in an arrangement with other authorities which works quite well. They are in Newcastle or north Tyneside. The cost is about £600,000 a year. The students are taking courses that are either not available or are over-subscribed in Northumberland. That seems an eminently good arrangement. The suggestion is to change this so that students will be able to attend a college of their choice, irrespective of the subject that they are studying. The limited facilities for further education in the county—ours is predominantly a rural county—will be seriously affected by the students who are going out to nearby areas, as will the costings.

I cannot understand why clause 49 is included in the Bill. It is proposed that the schools report to the local education authorities and the parents, which is right and proper, and that the areas report to the Secretary of State, but not that the Secretary of State reports to the House. There ought always to be an opportunity for the House to discuss education across the board.

I look forward to detailed consideration of the Bill in Committee.

7.35 pm

Mr. Spencer Batiste (Elmet): It is with pleasure that I add my congratulations to my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr. McLoughlin) on an excellent maiden speech which amply reinforces both the decision and the good judgment of his constituents in electing him.

It was also with pleasure that I listened to the Secretary of State present his first major Education Bill. I am delighted, as I am sure are all my hon. Friends, by the grasp and good sense that he has shown after so short a time in office. That is bad news for the Labour party, but good news for anybody who is concerned about the future of education.

A good education system is an essential asset for a modern technological society. Yet there is widespread concern that our system has fallen behind those of our main competitors and a recognition that, while my right hon. Friend and neighbour the Member for Leeds, North-East (Sir K. Joseph) as Secretary of State developed strategic policies that will do much to redress the balance, they must now be implemented quickly and effectively.

Of course adequate, well-directed and properly managed funding is an essential ingredient in the success of those policies. I am delighted with the announcement today about the GCSE and the extra £20 million. I hope that everyone will note the rapid agreement of the Opposition parties that the new examination system is now properly funded, that the delays and disruption in introducing it can now be swept away, and that this important new measure can come into being quickly and peacefully. Equally, there are other major problems that require funding such as the recruitment of science teachers. In many parts of the country, this has become almost impossible.

However, providing extra money alone is not in itself a solution. The recent Audit Commission report highlighted the hundreds of millions of pounds of waste in current spending. This comes as no surprise to us in Leeds—I am delighted to see that the hon. Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett) has now returned to the Chamber—where the Labour-controlled local education authority has an unenviable record of bad management, of waste and of generally giving education a low priority. We have, for example, the second lowest level of spending per pupil on education of any metropolitan district in the country, and £100 per pupil below the average. Moreover, when the local education authority was finally forced into addressing the problems posed by falling rolls, it did so in a doctrinaire and insensitive fashion that has aroused concern and despondency in my constituency and elsewhere in the city.

Last year that concern was well articulated by the governing bodies in certain comprehensive schools in my constituency. They organised a very successful campaign against the original plan put forward. The price that they paid for that within a very short time was the complete reconstitution of those governing bodies and, on the most vocal and successful, the imposition of an absolute majority of Labour party nominees.

Nor is it a coincidence that in Leeds, as in other Labour-dominated local education authorities, strong and independent head teachers and public servants are under increasing pressure to toe the Labour party line or become isolated and take premature retirement.

This undesirable politicisation of our schools and the unnecessary over-centralisation of their budgets must be addressed quickly. The Bill does not go as far as I would like it to go in tackling these structural problems. I accept the lesson of our very successful industrial relations legislation when we proceeded step by step, bringing public opinion along with us at each stage and ensuring the widest possible acceptance for each action that we took. The bugs were ironed out at each stage. I accept that as an approach.

What then are the objectives that we seek in the Bill? The most important for me is the shift of power from the local education authorities to the governing bodies and the striking of a more representative balance on those bodies. It is a good Conservative instinct to devolve power to those most closely affected by its exercise.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State described his policy as trying to devolve power from the hub to the rim of the wheel. He should pursue that and trust his instincts because it is a sound policy. I should like to see the maximum possible devolution to schools of responsibility and budgetary power for the fabric, for the provision of facilities and materials, for discipline and curriculum and, above all, for the choice of staff, including particularly the head teacher.

Good leadership is just as vital to the goals and success of a school as it is in other aspects of life. That is why the selection of head teachers is crucial and should be free from political interference, as the head teachers themselves should be free from political interference in the proper performance of their duties.

Reference has been made to an effective appeals procedure against disciplinary decisions by head teachers. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will look further at that. Some colleagues will be familiar with the guidelines for members of governing bodies which have been produced by various militant organisations that prefer to remain anonymous. They have been widely circulated in many parts of the country, and are circulating now in schools in my constituency and elsewhere in Yorkshire. It is important to listen to exactly what is being said. Hon. Members may well see the very same tactics being employed in schools in their constituencies. I am talking about a comprehensive set of guidelines on how to disrupt a school's activities.

The guidelines deal with governors' meetings, the head, teaching and non-teaching staff, and pupils. Those guidelines refer to governors' meetings and say:

"Action at these meetings will depend on whether members are in a majority or not. . . . When in the majority — ensure Chair and Vice are members and continually press to a vote. . . .Always meet as a group prior to the Governors' meeting, decide points to be raised and who raises them. The aim is to act as one while seeming to act individually . . . Increase the numbers of meetings to two or three per term. If non-members find attendance difficult so much the better . . . Pick awkward times for meetings— 5.30 pm, 9 am. . . . Always raise pre-planned, 'unexpected' points."

The guidelines become even more sinister when they deal with the head. They say:

"The Head is the single most powerful person you have to deal with in the school. His strength lies in his separateness, although this can be turned to your advantage . . . The head's main weaknesses lie in remoteness from some of what happens in the school, rarely having decisions questioned, and a feeling of rivalry towards other Heads and schools, especially in the falling roll situation."

The guidelines then make a series of specific suggestions:

"(a) Constantly question statements made by the head.

(b) Imply concealment of information.

(c) Seek to isolate the Head from staff and Governors.

(d) Visit school unannounced . . .

(e) Ring up and question Head on any and all matters . . . The Objective is to keep the Head off balance, undermine confidence in policies, make staff, parents and students suspicious of Head's motives and create tension in and around Head."

The guidelines identify one particular policy. They see the retention of sixth forms as being the most crucial means of undermining the head teacher. That sounds ludicrous, but it is happening in a school in my constituency, and in many others elsewhere. I am sure that my hon. Friends will also have seen other documents.

There is an article about the police in schools that makes all sorts of absurd suggestions and that is widely circulated. It talks of the police as being the natural enemies of children, who should be warned. It says:

"The police 'helped' kill Blair Peach, a teacher, and too often beat up Black youths in cells and many of the children know this. It is essential that children are aware of their rights."

I have another document that has been produced by the Bradford and Leeds lesbian teachers group. Mention has been made of the need to be sensitive towards the problems of homosexual teachers. I accept that, but I do not think that I am alone in finding blatant proselytising by homosexual groups in schools unacceptable and offensive. This document states:

"At every level of the education system students are misinformed about lesbians and denied the opportunity to explore anything other than the very conventional heterosexual relationship. Young women are forcibly directed and channelled into heterosexuality".

It is, indeed, a very sad day if heterosexuality has become a crime.

Worst of all is the corrosive effect of persistent propaganda on young minds. I have with me a leaflet that is financed by a local education authority. A group of young girls were taken for the day to an Afro-Asian centre, given a lecture by the people there, and then asked to write poems. The poem of one young girl is set against a picture of two people in black masks with their arms raised in the air in clenched fist salutes. The last part of the poem reads:

"They don't care what happens
They've got the power
They know they can't get caught
I hate them!
They should be removed from this world.
They are supposed to help people."

That document was produced in a school and its publication was financed by a local education authority. I do not object to the balanced teaching of party politics; indeed, I welcome it. Nevertheless, I have anxieties about clause 16. But I object to the teaching of subversion, violence, lawlessness and distorted values.

[Mr. Spencer Batiste]

The Bill goes a long way towards meeting my concerns, but if it is to succeed more parents must take a greater part in their schools' activities. With that proviso, I welcome the Bill and commend it to the House.

7.45 pm

Mr. Michael Hancock (Portsmouth, South): As my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Freud) said, many parts of the Bill can be welcomed, and which represent the correct course for the development of education in England and Wales. However, to describe it as the most significant piece of legislation since the Education Act 1944 is, as has been said, pushing credibility to the extremes and is seriously misleading.

Much of what Conservative Members have said does not stand up to scrutiny. I wonder whether the Government think that by including a mass of detailed regulations in the Bill education will automatically improve. Indeed, despite attempts to clarify relationships between different education organisations, such as the relationship between the local education authorities and schools over the curriculum, the issues are further confused by the Bill, and we shall seek to clarify those and other matters in Committee and during the remaining stages of the Bill.

In the few minutes at my disposal I shall try to draw out some of the points and to elaborate on those raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East. For a long time hon. Members and the public have been concerned about the composition of governing bodies. There is now a consensus on both sides of the House that there should be increased parent participation in school governing bodies. However, when it comes to the overall composition, I would prefer—and the alliance generally would prefer—to see the Lord Taylor model of equal representation on governing bodies being adopted. I believe that parents would like more teachers as governors of schools, and I believe that in all but the smallest schools non-teaching staff have a role to play on those governing bodies. It is important that we try to include those with expertise who are not teachers, but who have a role to play and who are dedicated to seeing that the school is run properly.

I shall draw attention to what else is wrong with the governing bodies of schools. For 16 years I have been a member of a local education authority, and every year the thing that causes most concern at the annual meeting is the proportion in which school governorships are given out. It is ludicrous that in a county such as Hampshire, which is the largest spending local authority in Great Britain, some councillors sit on four or even five school governing bodies. They do so solely to exercise some sort of political control. Incidentally, I am talking not about a Labour-controlled authority, but about, until quite recently, a heavily Conservative-controlled authority.

I deal now with what parent power can mean to a school. Along with parent power, we must try to introduce some community power. We must allow schools to open up more than at present. In my constituency space is at a premium, and it is ridiculous that playing fields should be left unused for so many hours. We must break down the prejudices of head teachers and allow the community into our schools.

Now for some of the clauses that deal with the curriculum. I believe that the Government may have laid a minefield for themselves to walk into. I sincerely hope that the Government will look closely at the drafting of clauses 16 to 19, and allow amendments in Committee to make clear which responsibilities lie with the local education authority and which with the governing body. As drafted, I am sure with many head teachers will find themselves in a difficult position, standing between their employer and the wishes of the governing body, if there is a disagreement on curriculum policy. At present there is a vague area.

Some Labour peers argued in another place, and some hon. Members, especially Labour Members have argued again this afternoon, for the main responsibility of the curriculum to lie with the local education authority. However, if we are to have more effective governing bodies, and therefore better schools, they need sufficient local autonomy to adapt to local community wishes.

However well the clauses on the curriculum are drafted, there is bound to be a grey area where responsibilities are divided between the two groups. There needs to be an appeal procedure to adjudicate between the two. That procedure could also be employed in a school such as Poundswick. The appeal mechanism needs to be visibly independent, and above all needs to be able to make decisions quickly. In the past, education has suffered badly from the length of time that delays were allowed to continue and undermine the confidence of the teaching profession.

The question of discipline once again raises many doubts about the best way to deal with it. Clarification is needed in the clauses to separate the roles of the head teacher and the governing body, but more important is a properly set up appeals procedure independent of the LEA and the governing body. Such a mechanism is needed. It should not often be used, but it should exist and be in place soon after the Bill becomes an Act. The proposals in clause 22 for the appeals procedure are inadequate and may not necessarily exist when an incident occurs. I hope that in Committee hon. Members will reconsider the clauses dealing with this part of this involved and complex legislation.

Once again corporal punishment needs to be thoroughly considered. One cannot simply cane schools into becoming better and more profitable. The use of canes in schools will achieve nothing. At least one Conservative Member, who is strongly against the use of the cane, said today that he sees no rhyme or reason, at a time when we are trying to discourage people from violence, for introducing corporal punishment or indeed allowing it to continue in our schools. It solves no useful purpose whatever.

The provisions on teacher training are some of the most important to the teaching profession. I urge the Secretary of State and the Government most strongly not to introduce heavy-handed regulations, but to try to bring about their objectives by consent. The last thing that schoolchildren and teachers need is for old wounds to be reopened by a ham-fisted attitude of the Department of Education and Science hell-bent on forcing through appraisal against the wishes of the teaching profession when progress can be implemented in a more constructive and consultative manner.

Industrial relations in the teaching profession have improved of late. It would be wrong to see that improvement undermined by thoughtless regulations being forced through. I seek a commitment from the Minister of State when he replies tonight that he is not prepared to see such an attitude persist. I hope that he will not embark on a system of appraisal that will further demoralise an already punished profession, as the teaching profession sees itself at present.

There is a consensus that more needs to be done continually to train and update teachers in new methods and techniques. That is something that meets with the approval of hon. Members on both sides of the House. The real test of the Government's sincerity in this area will be the resources that they are prepared to put in. This is the one part of the Bill that requires a lot of money. As the Bill is only enabling legislation in this respect, I shall be interested to hear how much money will be allocated specifically for this purpose—not old money, or money redistributed in the education budget, but new money that will be brought into the budget for the specific purpose of upgrading the in-training facilities that are to be offered to all teachers.

I add a note of caution. The grant-aiding power gives the Secretary of State direct control of the curriculum by allowing him to be the arbiter of the courses for training or re-training to which the resources should go. The Secretary of State may decide to favour one subject to the detriment of others. This could affect the power of the LEA and the school governing bodies to determine their priorities within their areas. In addition, it is not fair on teachers whose subjects the Government choose not to favour. This is another aspect of the Bill that needs to be thought through carefully, with all interested parties being involved in the discussion.

It would appear that once again I have not had very much time to elaborate on the purposes or the thoughts that need to go into the Bill. It is important that the Government have taken the first of what I hope will be many steps to improve the education system. Much of the Bill goes a long way to dispel the fears about the problems that the country is facing, but it would be a mistake for any Secretary of State to believe that the Bill, by seeming to cast a spell over education, will by some form of magic, solve the problems of education. The problems go far deeper than that, and I hope that in Committee the Christmas tree which the Minister of State described on more than one occasion will grow into such proportions that it embraces the thoughts and ambitions which hon. Members on both sides of the House have for the education service.

Mr. Gerald Bowden (Dulwich): I am grateful to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for seeking constructively to redefine the relationship between the local education authority, its teachers, its parents and its governors. I should declare an interest, because at different times in my life I have fulfilled all four of those roles, sometimes two or more simultaneously, within the Inner London education authority. During those years there has been no doubt that within that relationship ILEA has played a dominant part and has adopted a patronising approach not only to its teachers but to its governors and parents. I welcome the Bill because it seeks to enhance the status and importance of governors and parents for the benefit of the children whom the local education authority is there to educate.

I first became a governor of a primary school. It was noticeable in that school that ILEA sought to belittle the governing body, indeed in a literal way. The governors' meetings were held in the library of the school. The library tables and chairs were designed for six or seven-year-olds. The governors sat around the small tables on the small chairs. In an immediate sense, that was the way in which we were given a sense of our small importance.

Within the framework of the agenda, ILEA dictated what should be on it. It put on matters of substance which it said must be discussed by the governors and which it required them to take note of, and report on. The Bill will reduce the importance and the dominance of the education authority in its relationship to those it serves. That would take effect in several ways.

I welcome clause 25, which provides that the governing body shall have a financial statement from the local education authority on how money is being spent in its school. I hope that that financial statement will be a detailed statement. It is of little help to governors perhaps not versed in business affairs to know whether a global sum for transport or a global sum for maintenance or for any other allocation for the school represents value for money. It would be helpful to the governing body if it had a breakdown of, for example, the cost of providing a coach week by week to take children to the sports field and back again. With that sort of breakdown the governors can judge whether the service provided by the education authority and the transport division represent value for money or whether resources spent on the transport department could be better spent at the chalk face.

Likewise with maintenance. Those of us who have served on governing bodies over the years have seen the protracted negotiations necessary to get even the smallest job done—for example, a wash basin fitted in an art room where children are painting and need to wash their hands rather than go to the cloakroom. The time that has been spent by the architects' department and other parts of the organisation as represented in overheads and cost to the authority would horrify those who are of a practical turn of mind and who would know what would be in the outside world the cost of providing such a facility. Therefore, I hope that clause 25 will enable governing bodies to have a precise breakdown of how the money is being spent, even to that detailed level if necessary.

I welcome my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State's suggestion that an amendment would be made in Committee to allow governing bodies to co-opt to their number people with experience in reading balance sheets who could interpret financial and business statements. A lay body will need that sort of assistance when it comes to make a judgment on the financial statements before it. That would be a great help in ensuring that governors are truly responsible for the welfare of the school and was seeking the best value that it could from the resources available. The requirement of holding annual meetings and producing reports would be a way of ensuring that the governing body felt that sense of responsibility to the pupils, parents and community.

The report should not only quote the school's financial situation and set out its budget, but should set out its priorities. We have already discussed whether a school should decide in what direction money should be spent. With such a statement before them the governors would be in a better position to decide whether they needed to augment teaching or another aspect of the school's work.

[Mr. Gerald Bowden]

The report should also state achievements in other areas —academic, sporting, music and social. A statement of policy is essential for a governing body to know how it is succeeding in its direction or control of the school. It is even more important for parents who are choosing a school to know what policies are in the minds of the governing body and in the forefront of the school's objectives. That would give parents a far better choice in choosing the school that they think best for their child.

Statements should make clear the school's policy on discipline. It has always surprised me, when we come to debates or discussions in the House and corporal punishment is mentioned, that a group, rather like the Pharisees of old, put on that holier-than-thou expression which says, "I am virtuous. Unlike other men I do not believe in corporal punishment."

I do not regard myself as being on the Right wing of the party or indeed on the Left wing. Nor shall I be labelled as being on any particular wing or part of the party. However, I know where I stand and I have no wish to see my children beaten or to see other children beaten. But I would have a greater sense of reassurance if they were in a school which had that sanction. It would not be beyond the wit of any governing body or draftsman to make sure that legislation can meet the requirements of a wider community as well as those of the immediate community, so that parents have a choice. If a school's policy statement says that corporal punishment is an available sanction, it would be for parents to choose whether they wanted their children to go there. They should not be dictated to by those who sit remote from violence in the classroom, in this House enjoying a sense of moral virtue in making such statements.

The Bill produces a framework in which parents can make a choice. When parents can make a choice, there is some sense of progress in education. In London, the quota system which says that schools must be held down to a limit to ensure that all have an equal spread is wrong. If schools were allowed, on their policy statement and on the statement of their achievements and their report, to recruit to their capacity rather than to the quota laid down, there would be some sign of an improvement in education by it being parent-led.

I welcome the Bill because it is a step in that direction. I was going to describe it as a modest step, but it is a firm step, although not too stretching a step. I am sure that it will be for the benefit of the children who grow up in Britain and require the support of our education system in the years to come to prepare them for life that lies ahead.

8.4 pm

Mr. Fred Silvester (Manchester, Withington): On 11 February I and several of my hon. Friends introduced a private Member's Bill to try to bolster the right of free speech in universities. I am delighted that in another place the Government have now decided to accept that principle. Our Bill is better than the amendment proposed in another place and if they are having difficulty I suggest that they look at it. However, I welcome that and I shall say no more about it other than that it is good to see it on its way.

The crucial element in the Bill is whether we are prepared to put our trust in the new system of education provision in Britain. We are, as I understand it, trying to bring to bear on the government of schools the coalition of the parent, the teacher and the lay governor. That triumvirate will essentially be the engine by which a particular school makes its way. Therefore, schools will develop in various ways with various advantages and disadvantages and from that series of decisions will come the choice which people in the state system can enjoy.

If that is our objective, the one fear that I have about the Bill is that we are not carrying our faith through. On a number of points in the Bill we do not seem to be trusting the new governors as much as we should. The point about discipline has been admirably described by the hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Weetch) and I shall not go over that again. My hon. Friend the Minister knows the difficulties that have arisen with the Poundswick school in Manchester. They have simply brought to the surface the basic problem of whether the headmaster and the governors have the right to determine how discipline shall be enforced in schools. That responsibility must lie with those who wish to determine a school's ethos and to enforce it. Anything which is done to take away that right will undermine the value of a school and the power to make it a good school.

I opposed the Education (Corporal Punishment) Bill, as I said when I intervened earlier, because it was a pig's ear of a Bill. It contained the nonsense of people registering to show whether they wanted to be caned. It was a daft Bill. I still think that my proposal, which was rejected by the hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice), is the one that we shall end up with. However, on the same principle, if I believe in the triumvirate running schools, whether I believe in caning in schools or not, is immaterial. What is important is whether the people running the school believe in it and think that it will enhance the value of a school. The parents and governors make that decision and I would leave it to them. Therefore, my right hon. Friend has made exactly the right decision.

I am a little worried about the curriculum. As I understand it, under the Bill the local education authority is to set out document A on curriculum. It can then be topped up by the Governors in document A2. It can then be varied a little by the headmaster, provided that he carries the Governors with him, with document A3. That could be a recipe for some difficulty. I can foresee that in a nice local authority where everything is sweetness and light, that would be fine, but in some of the heavier city authorities, that could lead to a great deal of conflict.

When my hon. Friend the Minister is putting the system to the test in his mind, I urge him to play one of those end games and see what would happen in ILEA or Manchester where conflict might arise. I urge him to put the rights of the governors in respect of the curriculum on a level with those of the headmaster, pre-eminent above those of the local authorities. That is of great importance.

I add to that another area which is not covered by the Bill; that is the problem of admission to schools. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State kindly said that he would pass appeals on discipline over to the appeal system for admission to schools. That does not give me much confidence, because I am not happy with that system either. At the moment, the local authority has the power to decide which children should go to which schools according to the catchment areas it defines.

In Manchester—I am sorry to be parochial, but it is an obvious example—there has been a switch of children to the south of the city and the difficulties experienced between authorities are now being experienced within the city boundary. One area of the city is expanding, leaving behind empty schools in another part of the city. The local authority is not prepared to switch resources from the rattling area to the full area. The governors ought to have power, if necessary, to put in a portakabin, or whatever is necessary, to take children from their area.

I urge my hon. Friend to say something about clauses 43 and 44. The Bill seems to provide a means whereby schools can apply to become aided schools and, as such, acquire additional powers. That has always seemed an admirable way to proceed. It might be worth considering whether they should have to buy themselves into that system as proposed by the Bill. At the moment, they must find the money that the local authority found previously. I should like to see some experiments in which the Government would pay the money to the local authority to get a few switches over, without cost to the governors of the schools. I do not suggest that we do that on a grand scale, but it would be an experiment worth trying.

I shall emphasise the basic point of the Bill. In the debate, analogies and similes have been made about Christmas trees, and so on. Let me stick with the analogy of the Secretary of State about the rim and the hub. We do not quite know who is on the rim and who is on the hub. In my picture book, it is quite clear that central government is on the hub and the parents, governors, teachers and schools are on the rim. I am not quite certain where to put the local authority. The problem about the education system is that none of us is clear about where to put the local authority. The Bill must face up to that. Central Government carries the can. Local people make education by building schools, to which they send their children, raising money, and doing all the things that make a good school. If we must squeeze somebody, let us squeeze the local authority.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): This is an auspicious day for the Secretary of State for Education and Science. Unfortunately for him, I believe that the Bill is inauspicious. However, I have no doubt that the Secretary of State, with his customary flair, will make the necessary political mileage out of it. In my view, the Bill is a miscellany of a number of relatively small and uncontroversial statutory administrative adjustments. Many matters are causing concern in the educational world.

The Bill attempts to tackle the concerns by legislation. Hon. Members may know that before I became a Member of Parliament I spent 14 years in the classroom. I do not believe that the Bill will do the trick, because I do not think that the concerns are susceptible to improvement by legislation. Indeed, legislation may complicate matters a great deal. Court actions can be taken. Lawyers will become busy. Case law can be established. A whole new —dare I say it—administrative bureaucracy may arise around those statutes.

Clause 24 relates to instruction on human reproduction. Clause 40 relates to appraisal of performance of teachers. Having been involved in both those subjects in the school classroom, I can assure hon. Gentleman that good will, understanding and sympathy are the things which make those work. Law is a long way from that. Certainly, we require money as a basis for education. Certainly, we require law. But good will in the school and good will between all those involved, especially parents and teachers, is what makes things tick. It is not only good will but confidence based on performance. I do not say that in the narrow, Josephite way of the former Secretary of State.

Clauses 48 and 49 are susceptible to legislation. The clauses would remove two duties laid clearly on the Minister, and now the Secretary of State, in the 1944 Act. Clause 48 removes the statutory injunction to appoint two advisory councils for education. Clause 49 removes the obligation on the Secretary of State to make an annual report to Parliament in respect of his powers. Those are two classical matters and duties that are susceptible to legislation.

I am sorry that the Secretary of State, in his opening remarks, did not refer to the abandonment of obligations placed on him by Parliament. Parliament placed the obligations on the Secretary of State in 1944. The Conservative Government were looking, at that time, to the future of post-war reconstruction. The debates on those clauses are important. I have read them. They were non-party debates. The then Mr. R. A. Butler outlined the need for advisory councils to deal with many of the ills that exist today. He foresaw many of the relationships with which we are grappling now. There was full-hearted accord in the House—it went across every party—for the inclusion of key clauses 4 and 5 in the Education Act 1944.

As a professional teacher, I was appalled when successive Secretaries of State from both parties failed to carry out the injunctions of those parts of the Act. On 22 October 1971, I raised, with notice, an Adjournment debate. The then Minister for Education, who is now the Prime Minister, pointed out that she had failed to obey an injunction of the House regarding section 4. In the House, she refused to comply with it. She said:

"The background is completely different and it is against this background that the position of the C.A.C. should be viewed now."—[Official Report, 22 October 1971; Vol. 823, c. 1197.]

The right hon. Lady was arrogating to herself that part of an Act of Parliament which, as Secretary of State, she had the duty to comply with.

I was astonished to learn that any Member of Parliament, any democrat, could blatantly make such a statement. I do not believe that the officials of the Department would have advised her to do such a thing. I do not think that the most skilful Sir Humphrey could have succeeded. It was part of the attitude of the right hon. Lady to Parliament and to education. Therefore, nothing that has happened since and nothing that the right hon. Lady has said or done since has surprised me. If she could have done that, what could she not do?

On 17 July 1984, I raised the matter at Prime Minister's Questions. The right hon. Lady said:

"I do not think that I was ever taken to task for refusing to obey the law in the Education Act 1944."—[Official Report, 17 July 1984; Vol. 64, c. 168.]

In subsequent correspondence, the right hon. Lady would not admit that she had done so. I say that almost by way of example, because it typifies the Conservative party's attitude to education. It wants to put into education some of the inadequacies which it may correctly see, but it believes that it can be done by statute, coercion and bargaining. That was the hallmark of the right hon. Member for Leeds, North-East (Sir K. Joseph).

[Mr. Nigel Spearing]

The Government want to get rid of the provision that the Secretary of State must report annually to the Parliament on the discharge of his statutory duties. I suggest to the Secretary of State that, in Committee on the Bill, he should read those sections of the 1944 debate in Committee relating to the function and purpose of the central advisory councils, and the importance of an annual report to Parliament by the Secretary of State—not only on the activities of the central advisory councils which have the power, under section 4, to bring any matter they think fit to the Secretary of State, and to consider why they have not been used by successive Secretaries of State of all parties. I suggest that it would be a good idea—turning over a new leaf in the Conservative party's and the Government's educational history—for the right hon. Gentleman to reconsider clauses 48 and 49 and to maintain sections 4 and 5 in the Education Act 1944 which, under R. A. Butler and a united House, laid the successful foundations for our current educational system.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): I add my congratulations to those already offered to the hon. Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr. McLoughlin) on his maiden speech and to my right hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley (Mr. Baker) on his comprehensive and valuable first speech on education as Secretary of State.

I shall concentrate on the implications of clause 49. I agree with those who are sad that the proposal for pupil governors has not been included in the Bill. I have sat on school boards that included pupil governors and always found them to be sensible, genuine and interested in their school. However, I believe that pupil governors should be at least 16, and possibly a little older, and should not be involved in confidential information about staff. I commend the proposal to my right hon. Friend. Pupils are responsible enough to be school governors and would be a valuable addition to school boards.

School discipline is an important subject because many teachers say that their authority in schools is undermined more by bad discipline than by anything else. They say that, more than any other factor, bad discipline is lowering their morale. It is essential to consider that aspect. The House has a responsibility to back the teachers in their difficult job. Discipline is an important and integral part of education and should be considered in that light.

School discipline, like all discipline, must be based upon self-discipline. In the end, there is no other acceptable form of discipline for an individual or for society. Self-discipline comes from a pupil's acceptance of religious and/or moral codes. Sadly, religious education in schools is in a perilously weak position. However, it is good to note that church schools are flourishing. Parents have shown a strong demand for church schools, principally because they are clear about where those schools stand on moral issues and about the discipline and standards of behaviour that they impose on pupils—Christian standards.

Ten of the top 17 schools in the Inner London Education Authority area are church schools but, sadly, ILEA at its first meeting as an elected body passed a resolution that the church had no valid role to play in schools. That resolution is to the eternal shame of ILEA and the Labour party. Church schools are popular because discipline in them is clear and is based upon Christian ethics. They can be compared with some county schools. Recently, the Religious Education Council said that two thirds of primary schools were vague in their teaching of religious education. Teachers handling the subject are not suitably qualified to handle that situation. In a quarter of all comprehensive schools there is no religious or moral education after the third year of education. That is serious, but it is not surprising. Dr. Scotland, a senior lecturer in religious studies at the College of St. Paul and St. Mary in Cheltenham, recently wrote to me saying that in "Gloucestershire only 8 secondary schools out of 40 are teaching a GCE 'A' level RE course. In Somerset the figure is only 3 schools out of 30. In Avon the picture is slightly better with 19 out of 61."

This means that the supply of suitable, well-qualified teachers will dry up soon unless we take positive action.

In many cases children are not being taught the difference between right and wrong. Is it surprising that children do not live together harmoniously, as they should, within a school and within a community? Is it surprising therefore that there is appalling soccer and other violence? Violence occurs because a child has not learnt at a crucial age to respect the validity of every individual and to love his neighbour as himself, which principle is basic to the Christian religion and to many others. It is important to teach children self-discipline.

Corporal punishment has a certain validity. It is worth raising this matter especially firmly now when there is so much serious lack of discipline. I know of schools not far from this building in which some groups of children are trotting about like packs of hounds, completely out of control and intimidating pupils and teachers. That is not right. Lack of discipline in schools damages the education of everyone, and we must understand that.

Those who want to abolish corporal punishment, such as members of the Labour party, must come up with a feasible alternative, but they have not done so. If corporal punishment is abolished, more children will be before the courts and more will be suspended from school or expelled. What other sanctions can be imposed? The Society of Teachers Opposed to Physical Punishment has suggested that children be put on report and that a child carry a sheet with him to each class on which teachers write whether he has behaved satisfactorily. However, sometimes children put those sheets in the bin and take no notice. They are not interested in lines—anyway, lines are not constructive educationally. Why should children be forced to do mathematics as a punishment? It damages the subject.

Corporal punishment has a part to play, but it must be reasonably administered only by the headmaster or deputy headmaster or by his specific appointee. It should be administered only as a punishment for serious offences, such as gross bullying. Even then it may not be the right form of correction for a child. It is valid in certain circumstances, and I believe that people recognise that.

It may be valuable to have a national referendum on corporal punishment. I think that the country would like to have its say. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is right to ask schools to decide what disciplinary procedures they will use. The governors, the head, teachers and parents should be involved in that decision. Discipline in schools cannot be decided at Westminster, in Strasbourg, at town hall or county hall—it must be decided in the school.

Mr. Spearing: Yes.

Mr. Greenway: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his support. He has a long record of success as a schoolmaster.

I should like to ask my hon. Friend the Minister some important questions. Will the decision by governors to institute corporal punishment be reversible? If so, how regularly can that be done? Will Labour Members have a free vote on this subject? I fear that the Labour party is bound by Labour party conference decisions on this matter and that its members will not vote freely even if the Whip is taken off. The Labour party conference has decided what Labour Members of Parliament should say in the House. Therefore, the Labour party is not democratic on this, as on so many other issues.

We have to be wary of where the Labour party would like to take us on school and family discipline. I believe that it is the aim of the Labour party to take us into a situation such as that in Sweden where children of five are given letters at school to take home to their parents and are instructed in school to go to the police station if they are smacked by their parents, and it is promised that the police will take action against their parents. I fear that that is the way of the Labour party. The country is concerned about it and the House should also be concerned.

I hope that the House will decide to continue with reasonable corporal punishment because it has a substantial part to play and has a value in schools. However, it must not be overplayed.

8.30 pm

Mr. Guy Barnett (Greenwich): I owe you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and the House something of an apology for not being able to attend a large part of the debate because of duties outside the Chamber. It is a subject for which I should have liked to attend the whole debate. I hope that the House will accept my few comments on this Bill.

I shall not take this same line as the hon. Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) on corporal punishment, in which he obviously takes a considerable interest, except to say that my experience as a teacher taught me that the very opposite of what he said is true. When corporal punishment was abolished in the school in which I taught the standard of discipline rose.

I believe—other hon. Members have said this and it has been said elsewhere—that the Bill is a major missed opportunity. In no sense does it compare, as some people have foolishly sought to compare it, with the great Education Act 1944. It is a great missed opportunity because it appears to many people outside the House and to me that it is something of a deliberate attack on local authorities and the teaching profession.

The House must realise that some of the great educational advances in this country have take place because of chairmen of education authorities and chief education officers of local parties.

Mr. Spearing: Of both parties.

Mr. Barnett: Yes, of both parties. We could mention many individuals who have contributed. I listened with care to the speech of the hon. Member for Dulwich (Mr. Bowden) who is not in his place now. As usual, it was an attack on the Inner London education authority. He failed to mention the kind of contribution made by Sir Ashley Bramall of the Labour party and Peter Newsam, as education officer of ILEA, who made a significant contribution to the development of education in my area. I must also mention people like Sir Alec Clegg who have made enormous contributions to the development of education. It would be sad if the Bill was seen as an attack on the local education authorities which, in a sense, it is.

It derives in part from the Government's obsession with centralisation in education. Instead of having, as we have had in the past, a partnership of local authorities, parents, teachers and governors running the education system in their areas, the move is quickly towards a partnership between governing bodies and central Government. That is a retrogade step and it will hardly encourage local education authorities to make the same significant contributions as they have made in the past.

Perhaps a more serious feature of the Bill is what I believe is an implied attack on the teaching profession. One of my hon. Friends has already referred to the balance of places accorded to teachers on the governing bodies. I believe that we have to recognise sooner or later that if we are seriously concerned, as I believe everybody in the House is, about the desperate need to raise standards in our schools, we must recognise the enormously important role of the education authorities, the officials and the inspectorate and the role of the teaching profession. To have denied teachers what I believe to be their proper measure of representation on the governing bodies, based upon their own professional experience and competence, is a grave error. I note that the larger the school, in general the smaller the proportion of governors who come from the staff of the school concerned

I have long thought that one of the reasons why standards in schools have not risen and are not as high as most of us would like, apart from the failure of the Government to spend sufficient money on education, is the damage they have done to the morale of the teaching profession. Ultimately, the success of the system depends upon the teachers more than anyone else. The provisions for the composition of governing bodies, as the Government have drafted them, are a slight to the teaching profession, quite apart from the contents of clause 40.

I congratulate the Secretary of State on his appointment, and I know that he has taken a more liberal view than his predecessor on clause 40 and its contents and regards it as something of a backstop. I welcome that. I have already expressed my feelings on clause 40 in the House.

Along with my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery) and my hon. Friend the Member for Easington (Mr. Dormand), the chairman of the parliamentary Labour party, I speak for the National Union of Teachers. The NUT has always been strongly in favour of appraisal. That needs saying again and again because it is often suggested from the Conservative Benches that the NUT is bitterly opposed to the idea of appraisal of teachers. It is welcomed and always has been. What the NUT objects to is the tying of appraisal to negotiations about salary increases to which it has long believed teachers are entitled and salary increases which teachers have long since been owed.

I find clause 40(1)(b) very upsetting. I speak as an ex-teacher. The clause refers to "engaging in other activities". Those of us who have been teachers, such as my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing), me and others, have engaged in activities outside school hours. We have voluntarily and happily given literally hours of our time during the week and at weekends and enjoyed doing it because of the enormous sense of vocation which affects the entire teaching profession. I believe that it is a grave mistake to suggest to teachers that they somehow have responsibilities outside school. I hope that this clause can be tightened up so that, even if the Secretary of State decides that he needs to implement it, there can be no question of appraisal governing that aspect of a teacher's contribution to the life and work of a school.

I welcome the involvement of parents as governors in schools. However, important as that is, I believe that the prime responsibility must rest first with the local education authorities and secondly with the teachers, as it has in the past. I believe that a growing involvement of parents in schools can only be a good thing. I have argued that for many years but I believe that any steps taken by the Government, through legislation or in other ways, to devalue the contribution of the local education authorities or the teaching profession only be very damaging indeed.

Mr. John Powley (Norwich, South): I am glad to have an opportunity of giving a general welcome to the Bill. I hope that hon. Members will look on the Bill in the same way as they look on the changing face of commerce and industry. Just as commerce and industry are moving along and we have to change the atmosphere in that area of activity, so I believe that education is moving on. I see the Bill as a reflection of some of the changes taking place in education, and it enables us to build on the Education Act 1944 and subsequent Acts to improve our education service.

I encourage hon. Members on both sides of the house and people outside the House to try to put behind them the unfortunate happenings of the past few months, in the teachers' dispute and the GCSE dispute. We all understand that that happened, and we all have our different points of view, but I urge everyone to put those disputes and differences behind them and acknowledge the advantages of the Bill, which enhances the education service. They should not look back in anger and malice, but should look at what the Bill can do to enhance the reputation of the education service.

I welcome the announcement by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on the extra funding for the GCSE. Again, may we take my right hon. Friend's positive announcements for what they are? I believe that they are a genuine attempt to bring the GCSE to fruition, with the benefits that we believe it will bring, so that we can get it under way, get the teachers trained in the use of the new curriculum, and introduce it into the schools so that, in due course, the examinations take place in the proper manner.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State referred to the experiments in one or two counties, particularly Cambridgeshire, with new responsibilities for school governors. My right hon. Friend may be interested to know that I was a governor of the school in Cambridge where the experiment was first introduced. I little thought then, when we discussed and considered the experiment, that I would be speaking subsequently in an education debate in the House.

I recall that the governors approached the experiment with trepidation. They were not sure whether it was the right way to go. I say with modesty that I saw the potential of the experiment. The matter went to a vote, and the majority of governors saw the wisdom of the experiment. I am no longer a governor of the school, because I have moved to my new constituency home in Norwich, but the school saw the opportunities that were presented by the experiment to further the interests of the school. The governors were given greater responsibilities, which I think they should have. It is pleasing to know that those greater responsibilities will now be exercised throughout the country.

In the short time at my disposal I should like to refer to a provision which I am pressing my right hon. Friend to introduce on freedom of speech at universities. I wish that I did not have to refer to it. I was born and bred in the university city of Cambridge, with all its colleges. I moved to Norwich, with the university of East Anglia. It has been a part of my life to participate in student activities of all sorts. One has always had the belief that places of higher education are there for people with young inquiring minds, enabling them to take part in the learning process while discussing things and sharing and swapping political opinions of all natures. Whether or not I agree with those opinions, people are entitled to express them. Whether those who hold the opinions come from the extreme Right, the extreme Left, the middle or wherever, they should be able to express them in an atmosphere free from interference with their expression. For a long time, that was the case.

Unfortunately, of late, a minority—I hasten to add that it is only a minority—of students have sought to inhibit the free speech of those whose opinions with which they disagree. That is a shame. It must be guarded against. I should like to relate three incidents at the university of East Anglia, and I do so with regret.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Parkinson) and I were on a platform at the university of East Anglia with our wives. At a given moment, eggs were thrown at us. Some students, again a minority, sought to break up the meeting. Months later, in a demonstration, my constituency offices were invaded by a few militant students. Property was damaged, articles were stolen, and my staff were harassed. Of more recent note, my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North (Mr. Carlisle) was prevented from exercising his right to free speech at the university of East Anglia.

In none of the incidents that I have just related to the House was any disciplinary action taken by the authorities. A code of conduct has been agreed by the vice-chancellors and principals, and there is a code of discipline at the university of East Anglia. The incident in which my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North was involved was videoed and photographed. However, with all that evidence, with the codes of conduct and the disciplinary guidelines, it did not prove possible to discipline the culprits. If we go on in that way, and if those who perpetrate such activities—I repeat that it is only a minority—are allowed to get away with the inhibition of free speech, we are going down a sad road.

In the knowledge that the codes that already exist have not proved effective, the Government have a responsibility to give the universities and colleges up and down the country—not just in my constituency—the means by which the authorities can discipline those who seek to inhibit freedom of speech. The Government will certainly have my support for such measures as they introduce. They must be introduced carefully. I believe that they will have the support of the overwhelming majority of ordinary people who, even though they disagree with the Right, the Left or the middle, still believe—long may it remain so—that people should be entitled to express their opinions without fear or malice, or the fear of being injured, so that political opinions can rightly and properly be expressed in this country. That right should be enshrined in the legislation. The Government have a responsibility to take action. I shall look at the measures that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State introduces in Committee to ensure that those freedoms are preserved.

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Bristol, East): Education has been one area in which the Government are perceived to have performed rather less than convincingly. In spite of the long-running sore of the teachers' dispute, I believe that accusation to be unfair. Whether fair or no, it still has been the general perception, but I am convinced that, after my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State's speech, that will no longer be the case.

Although, in real terms, teachers are £1,500 a year better off than they were in 1979, I still believe that many are underpaid. Teachers should not find it difficult to achieve the modest lifestyle which most people would expect. The solution to that problem is in their own hands. Teachers should accept what any other person would accept as reasonable. They should accept job description. One cannot say what a job is worth unless one specifies what the job is. Teachers should also accept assessment. Why should teachers who are excellent be held back by the few who, if they cannot be retrained, should leave teaching?

Pay was cited as a reason for the persistent disruption of education, but the reasons for the dispute were more complex than that. The bitterness has had more to do with the low morale of teachers, which in turn has resulted from the declining respect in which the public has held the profession. That declining respect stems largely from a belief that schools are too often failing to instil the standards of self-discipline and the basic skills that a child needs to face the world. Yet it should be remembered that it is not only teachers who are responsible for that. We live in a society where individuals can all too often blame amorphous bodies for their shortcomings, and parents must accept that they cannot expect others alone to do what they should be doing.

The one person who cannot stand condemned for thinking, caring or listening too little is my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, North-East (Sir K. Joseph). If he is to be accused of any offence it is, perhaps, that in the pursuit of open-mindedness and consultation he may have given the impression of vacillating, and may have lost an early opportunity of presenting to the nation the clear coherent structure for secondary education that we all desire.

The Bill does not stand alone but follows Green Papers, White Papers, discussion documents and earlier Acts. It should be considered not in isolation but as part of a continuing process of advancement in the education structure. Therefore, I welcome the greater representation of parents on governing bodies introduced in the Bill, and hope that it will reduce the inappropriate influence that political placemen have wielded in recent years.

However, numbers alone are not enough. I am glad that the Bill makes provision for the training of governors and for the involvement of all parents through an annual meeting and report. Those measures will be particularly useful where parents have the ability and interest to be more actively involved. However, the difficulty is that in some of our worst schools the parents may lack the education, motivation, time or self-confidence necessary, and sectional political interests may continue to dictate.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is to be applauded for introducing the category of co-opted governors, and I hope that industry and commerce will see it as part of their civic duty to take part in the governorship of schools as widely as possible. I hope that schools will encourage pupils, possibly over 16 years of age, to attend some governors' meetings as observers so that they can see for themselves the process of decision making, and can better tell their fellows at school what is happening on the governing body. I hope that even at this late stage my right hon. Friend will consider adding that provision to the Bill.

Understandably, the Labour party has objected to the broad and as yet unspecified powers conferred on my right hon. Friend in respect of teacher appraisal. I suggest that, if it wishes those powers to be limited or more specific, the remedy lies in its hands. It should encourage teachers to see appraisal, not as a threat, but as an opportunity better to fulfil their duties to children and better to achieve their career development through counselling and training. If teachers understand that truth, an agreed and satisfactory pattern of appraisal will emerge through negotiation.

In recognising the achievements of my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, North-East—I regret that he is not present—I congratulate him on the emergence of the GCSE examination. Since my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has clearly demonstrated the Government's commitment to education and to the implementation of the GCSE examination, I hope that we shall get equal commitment from teachers. If they feel that they need even more time to look at the syllabuses, they may be able to spend a few days of their long summer holiday doing that.

One of the benefits of the GCSE examination is that it takes education a small step away from the stranglehold of academics by supplying exams and curricula which offer obvious and practical appeal to those most affected—the pupils—and something of greater relevance to employers. Surely it was the subservience to academia that tempted the Labour party to prefer children to do badly in academic subjects at comprehensive schools to their doing well in technical subjects at secondary modern schools.

My main reservation about the Bill is that it does not contribute to a re-establishment of the broader educational system in which children can achieve their optimum level in skills appropriate to their abilities and to the economy in which they seek to work. I would not seek to lay at the door of the Labour party the blame for all the damage that has been done to our education system during the past two decades. No one party is responsible for the child-centred teaching practices under which literacy and numeracy levels have plummeted. Happily, teachers are now more ready to use a disciplined environment in which more pupils can reach their potential.

Nevertheless, the Labour party was responsible for the destruction of grammar schools. Although that was not an action of political malevolence, as some may believe, it was an action of social naivety. However, it has been done, and its cause lay in the fact that secondary modern and technical schools were seen as second-rate rather than complementary and catering for different skills. Since we are left with the bricks and mortar of comprehensive schools, we must adapt that fabric to provide a streamed education with different streams concentrating on different skills, and, above all, with fluidity between streams.

The Bill is set against a background of an improvement in the teacher-pupil ratio from 18·7 in 1980 to the present level of 17·5, and a real increase of 8 per cent. in spending per pupil. But, like many hon. Members, I greatly regret the slow progress that is being made in closing redundant schools and object to the funds which underused buildings are swallowing up. Those funds should be used for educating children in the right schools. Although I accept that the main criteria are not what goes in but the products that come out, nevertheless — funds must be efficiently directed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. The hon. Gentleman must come to his last sentence, as we are still on the 10-minute limit.

Mr. Sayeed: My right hon. Friend will realise that I had a number of other points which I wished to make, but I am obviously limited in time. Much has been done by the Bill and I believe that much needs to be done. I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his splendid speech and I look forward to the time when he comes back with further improvements to our education system.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): I welcome the Bill, which was well heralded by the White Paper "Better Schools" produced by my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, North-East (Sir K. Joseph). I am restricted in my comments, as there is little time.

I want to see more power for all parents, as they need to know more about their schools. I want to see better teachers and I am naturally extremely supportive of the GCSE which will demonstrate the particular skills of each pupil. We will have better teachers as a result of the Bill and the appraisal system outlined in clause 40 is to be welcomed. I also welcome the better promotion prospects that will then be available for teachers.

The curriculum is important and is dealt with in clauses 16 to 19. I believe that it is important that religious education is put back on the agenda. There should be regular school assemblies and many more inspectors should visit the schools to ensure that religious education is taught properly. There should also be properly qualified RE teachers. Politics should be removed from schools and proper moral values should be taught which will preserve family life. More support should be given to church schools. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) that church schools have had a good and distinguished record. They promote Christian life and it is my firm belief that we should have more of them.

With regard to discipline, we must cane if caning is necessary. Too many of our teachers have little sanction to discipline the miscreants and social misfits. Today, punishment is based on giving someone lines or keeping them in detention. That does not deter those who misbehave and we must punish those who do so. I am pleased that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State supports the idea of corporal punishment. I hope that my constituents of Leicestershire will also support it.

Sex education is also terribly important. We must teach the decencies of life and preserve the family unit. We must make certain that parents, like teachers, have a genuine say regarding the curricula. They must be aware of the textbooks which are used. "Biology for Life", which is used by the Midland examining group, is not a book which helps sex education. I hope that when my hon. Friend the Minister replies he will consider this book and the chapter entitled "Sex without pregnancy". It describes how to prevent pregnancy, it encourages abortion without warning of the dangers and it encourages homosexuality. The book states:

> "Homosexual relationships occur quite often in places like prisons and boarding schools where people of the same sex are cooped up together . . . and are not usually permanent or harmful."

In my view, abortion may stop a woman from having another baby and homosexuality may lead to AIDS and a person may lose his life. It is terribly important that we promote sex education which secures and enhances family life. It is a question of good morals and good educational standards.

In the last year of Labour Government, 15·9 per cent. of students had one or more A-level passes; 23·1 per cent. of pupils had five or more O-level passes; 43·3 per cent. had one or more O-level passes, and 44·5 per cent. left with no O-levels. In 1984-85, 17·1 per cent. of all school leavers left with one or more A-level pass; 26·9 per cent. left school with five or more O-level or grade 1 CSE passes; 54·7 per cent. of students had one or more O-level or grade 1 CSE pass and only 9·4 per cent. left with no O-levels.

Far from falling standards, there has been a great improvement in educational standards. The Bill is a great achievement and I wish my right hon. Friend every success. I believe our youngsters are crying out for better education. We have the professional teachers who are paid well to give this education. I have no hesitation in supporting the Bill.

9.3 pm

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): I certainly have sympathy for those hon. Members who did not manage to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, in the debate. It is rather a sad fact that increasingly there are one or two hon. Members who sit through the whole of a debate but do not get called to speak, whereas one or two hon. Members manage to be called early on and then do not spend very much time in the Chamber. I believe that good manners in the Chamber are important.

I would like to join with other hon. Members from this side in congratulating the hon. Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr. McLoughlin) on his maiden speech. I envy the hon. Gentleman's opportunity to meet his constituents and walk through that beautiful countryside. I thought the hon. Gentleman made a good commercial for the food and drink of his constituency. I just hope that sometime the hon. Gentleman will be able to bring down to the House some Ashbourne water and get it into these jugs rather than the stuff that sometimes appears in them.

I also offer my congratulations to the Secretary of State. I thought he gave a polished performance. There were a few hints to the press last night that he had not quite got all the money for the GCSE, but out of the hat comes the £20 million this afternoon. That is a technique which he will have to polish up to draw attention away from the real issue, which is this Bill. Nevertheless, he is getting accustomed to piloting through Bills with which he cannot be completely satisfied. He did remarkably well to put a brave face on the GLC and metropolitan county abolition Bill — no doubt he will try to put a brave face on this one.

I hope that, now he is Secretary of State, the right hon. Gentleman will have left a few goodies for his Minister of State. Perhaps the Minister will be able in his winding-up speech to deflect a little attention from the Bill and announce a little more money. Many of us are worried about what will happen to students and possible deductions in their rights to housing benefit and social security payments. I should have thought that it was high time that the Government made an announcement about that. Last week, the Minister for Social Security said that the announcement would come soon. I understand that the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science said today that it would be made very shortly. It would be good if the Minister could announce that the Government are backing off from their proposals to stop students drawing those benefits.

Almost every hon. Member has said that the Bill is a shambles. A mad hatter's tea party could have produced better legislation. When he announced the Bill, the right hon. Member for Leeds, North-East (Sir K. Joseph) said that it would rival the Education Act 1944 as a landmark. That is utter rubbish. The Bill is an affront to pupils, parents, teachers and all others who are concerned with education. It is also an affront to good legislation.

I suggest that, instead of trying to rush the Bill through Parliament in the last six or seven weeks of the session, it would be far better to abandon it, go through some effective consultations and come back with a really worthwhile Bill in the next session. The Bill could well be described as a Christmas tree. The trouble is that we are long past twelfth night and it is now looking pretty tatty.

There are some Conservative Members who will remember that the Renton committee of 1975 set out clearly principles for parliamentary legislation. It set out what should be on the face of a Bill, what should be set out in schedules, what should be done by affirmative regulation, what ought to be done by negative regulation, what would be more appropriate for circulars and what should be left to common sense. I admit that they were imposed in another place, but the Government have declaratory sections which are a nightmare to turn into practice and to test in court. The part dealing with appraisal is an insult to the House of Commons — something so important is to be imposed by regulation rather than by primary legislation.

There is also a problem about how governors are to be elected. I believe that parent governors are extremely important, but there is nothing in the Bill about how we will set out an electoral procedure for electing them. I am not suggesting that that should appear in the main Bill, but it should be mentioned in regulations or possibly in the schedule. If the Government want good parent governors, they must establish a professional system for getting them elected. If people are sent good ballot papers and good material, they think that it is important. If we send out tatty bits of paper from school, we will not encourage people to feel that being a school governor is important.

I hoped that the Government would have agreed to the special procedure in Committee so that we could have tried to improve the Bill. We could then have got all those people who still believe that they have strong views to represent to give evidence. It seems, however, that the Government prefer to take notice of the Right wing of the Tory party, and that they want to push the Bill through with great haste. I hope that the House will vote tonight to ensure that we can have that special procedure so that we can get local education authorities, teacher unions, parents, parent-governor associations and others to give evidence. It is important that we get that procedure and it will be a matter for regret if Government Members vote against it.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: The last time that we had this special Committee procedure on a major Bill was for the Mental Health Act 1983. I was one of the junior Ministers taking it through, and its great flaw was that it had already been through one of our two Houses. If this special procedure is adopted it would be far more sensible to adopt it before it is started by the House. I put that to the hon. Gentleman as a practical point.

Mr. Bennett: I accept that point. But this Bill should not be stopped simply because it started in the Lords. We ought to try to improve the legislation because, ideally, legislation on this subject ought to last. If it is to last, we should be working for consensus, not just across the Floor of the House but between all the interested groups that will have to work the Act.

For over 10 years we have debated school governors but, sadly, too much of the debate has been about who ought to be the governors rather than what the powers ought to be. We have moved away from the idea of having a co-operative system of governors who are persuaded to work towards consensus and partnership towards the idea of a confrontational system.

It is important to know how many teachers, parents and representatives of different groups will be in the governing bodies because they will have votes and will make decisions on the basis of majority voting. That will be disastrous. We must work for consensus in the governing bodies — not just consensus at each meeting but consensus over a period of time. Imagine a situation at a governors' meeting where corporal punishment was discussed and the vote was six to seven either to have it or not to have it. At the next meeting three months later the members might vote in the opposite direction. Such a system is a recipe for disaster.

The Government must try hard to bring into the Bill the principle that governing bodies have to work on the basis of consensus. We have to try to ensure that people work in partnership in order to produce agreed decisions and not majority vote decisions. One of the ways to move in that direction would be to increase teacher representation on the governing bodies. If we do not do that, two things will happen. First, the governing body will not succeed in carrying the teachers with it in its decisions. That will either increase opportunities for confrontation or encourage governing bodies not to take key decisions. Either of those alternatives would be disastrous. All the evidence that I have gathered from outside bodies is to the effect that they would be happy to see increased teacher representation.

Secondly, the Government should consider carefully whether to impose one national set of conditions on governing bodies. By way of example, let us look at community schools. One or two local authorities, and especially those in Cambridgeshire and Leicestershire, have developed community schools extremely well. I am a great enthusiast of community schools. In most areas, such schools establish a governing body that is responsible for the school and for all the activities that go on outside school hours of 9 o'clock to 4 o'clock. In most areas there is one governing body for all the functions.

The Bill insists that overriding governing bodies that carry out all the functions of the community schools will be broken up and that there will be a separate set of governors for the school functions. That is unsatisfactory and I urge the Government to look at it and not to break the governing bodies of community schools into sections. I deeply regret the decision of the Government to sack pupil governors and to remove the representation of ancillary staff in schools with governing bodies.

If the Government believe in encouraging pupils to take part in the democractic process, and want to tell them of the virtues of democracy, why can they not let pupils experience some democracy by allowing them to be on governing bodies at the age of 16? It is regrettable that the Bill takes away the pupils' rights to be governors in secondary schools and further education colleges until 18.

Ministers in the other place trotted out the excuse for this move as the legal problems. I challenge the Minister to come up with a single example where a governing body has been sued, and the fact that it has a pupil governor led to legal difficulties. I doubt whether he could give me one example. It is nonsense to suggest this. If it were true, the legislation would be an opportunity to sort out such problems. I should like to see pupils remain with full voting rights, but if that is the legal problem, I should have thought that we could have got round it. The hon. Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) and others made this point, and I hope the Government will look at it.

I hope that the Government will also look at ancillary representation on governing bodies. This is important because schools are successful where they are co-operative ventures—a partnership between the people who work there, the parents and the children. One of the best ways to make the ancillaries, who often play a vital part in the functioning of the school, feel that they are part of it is to allow them representation on the governing body. The only excuse that I can find for the Government pushing ancillaries off the governing bodies is that somehow it will spoil the simple principle that has been worked out. I hope that the Government will have another look at this.

The Government should also look carefully at disfranchising parents who work for the local authority. I am not certain from the wording of the Bill whether those who work for the local authority or those who work for the local education authority will be affected. Many of these people are interested in their children's education, and they have as much right to be on the governing body as anybody who does not work for local government. I press the Government to be more flexible.

The Secretary of State said that he was enthusiastic about the co-opting idea and that he would be putting down a further amendment to involve more industralists. I would certainly involve more industrialists in close links with schools. In some parts of my constituency, I would welcome some industry so that there would be industrialists to be involved in the schools. In many areas, finding local industrialists who will serve on primary school bodies will be difficult. I hope that the Secretary of State looks carefully at the wording so that he does not exclude other people who can be enthusiastic governors. Some of the people from industry whom I would like to see being governors might feel that they did not have the time to take such an interest.

I welcome the proposal that the parent governors shall be able to call one meeting a year to report to the parents who have elected them. I hope that most schools will have more than one report-back meeting a year. I understand that in the other place, where the Government were successful in resisting this idea, their response was to say that there is nothing to stop parent governors from having meetings more frequently. I hope that that will be put firmly in the Bill, so that head teachers or local authorities will not say that it costs too much to send out the notice and that it is not convenient for the meeting to be had on the school premises. It is important that parent governors keep in regular contact with the parents, and that there are regular reports.

I should also have liked the Government to look at extending parent power by giving parents more power to refer educational disputes to the ombudsman, and at the development of local education advisory centres. Parents are often in considerable difficulty. They are not sure whether the school is doing the right thing by their child. If they ask advice from the school, they feel that the school will be protective of its system. They would like independent advice, and it is often not clear to parents that they can get such advice from the education offices. I would like to see some development of resources so that parents may obtain independent advice on educational matters.

I accept that the allocation of resources is still one of the major frustrations for governors. The governors may recognise the problems at the school but find that they are not able to command the resources. I do not want to press the Government too far on that point, but there have been fairly damaging reports about school buildings from the HMI, the Building Employers Federation this week and from UCATT earlier. It is frustrating for the governing body to put in requests to the local authority which states it has no resources. It is also frustrating for the local authority to put in requests to the Government and not get resources for school buildings, and I can make the same case about books.

I also think that the House will recognise that if we put our faith in governors we must accept that they will sometimes make mistakes. That is one of the penalties that we will have to pay for involving people in the democratic process. We will sometimes have to pick up the social consequences of governors making wrong decisions.

I would therefore suggest that the training of governors will be especially important. When the Minister replies, I hope that he will give us more information about how the Government intend to ensure that there is initial training and that that training is continued for parent governors whenever they are elected, for co-opted governors wherever they are co-opted, for representatives from the local authorities and for teachers. Although we accept that governors may sometimes make mistakes, we must ensure that training is available.

We must also ensure—I ask the Minister to give this assurance—that there is sufficient money available for local authorities to ensure that governors' meetings are properly minuted, that proper reports will be made and that resources are available so that the work can be done effectively.

In his opening remarks the Secretary of State said that he was in favour of local democracy running education. I welcomed the fact that he was not in favour of the French centralised system. However, when he discussed the Bill and such questions as changing powers between local authorities and central Government in relation to in-service training, he effectively said that he would take powers from local authorities to himself. So much for the Secretary of State's fine words at the start of his speech. It was a pity that he did not want to take the opportunity to redress the balance in favour of local authorities and is actually tending towards a centralised system.

I would urge the Secretary of State to ensure that in-service training is not simply available to teachers. Educational psychologists have made a good case about the lack of training and there should be more training and opportunities to gain more qualifications for educational welfare officers.

The Secretary of State will not be successful if he uses coercion over assessment and appraisal. If he wanted to show his good intentions to the teacher unions he could have announced today that he was dropping the relevant clause from the Bill and that he was placing his faith in negotiations, in the belief that there should be a system of appraisal that was satisfactory to everyone through negotiations rather than coercion. If he wants to coerce people into appraisal, he will not meet with success. He should have taken the opportunity to develop a new one and send a new message to the teachers' unions that he wanted partnership and co-operation rather than coercion.

I regret that the Bill does nothing to make nursery education statutory nor does it deal with the problems of poverty. It does not deal with the educational and maintenance allowances for 16 to 19-year-olds. I am sure that these measures would do a great deal to relieve the problems for parents and raise educational standards.

I greatly regret that the Government are turning the section of the Bill that deals with discipline into a debate for or against corporal punishment. The majority of our good schools—the Minister admitted that this applies in Scotland—have got rid of corporal punishment. The real arguments about school discipline have moved on from corporal punishment. I had hoped that we could spend much more time discussing ways in which we could genuinely improve discipline in schools rather than returning to the old arguments of the benefits or otherwise of flogging. If the Government want to leave the decision to governing bodies, they must consider how the decisions of individual bodies can conform to the rulings of the European Court and the convention.

The Government should understand that they cannot solve the problem of suspension with an appeals procedure. The difficulty with an appeals procedure is that schools have to live with the results of appeals. It would be pointless to have appeals if pupils and parents did not on some occasions win their appeals. If an appeal structure is established and on occasions pupils win their appeals, it will be difficult to continue properly to run a school when youngsters return and say, more or less, "I went to appeal and I won. You were wrong and I was right." That will make the running of a school extremely difficult.

One of the secrets of achieving good discipline in a school is that those who try to impose the discipline must think out the consequences of their actions and stay one step ahead of their pupils. They should always be guessing what will happen when they take certain action. If they do that, they will be able more often than not to out-guess the pupils and maintain good discipline.

If an appeals procedure is introduced, it will not be possible to predict the outcome of appeals. Head teachers will be faced with the choice of taking action and taking a risk by going to appeal. If their appeal fails, discipline in the school will be undermined. I suggest that the Minister considers the penalty of suspension much more in a context in which there are not winners and losers. He should start by asking himself what is best for the pupil and what is best for the school. The Government must do a great deal more on that basis.

Do we need some of the clauses that were inserted in another place? I suggest that the Minister should think carefully about sex education. I am sure that the majority of schools already teach sex education in its context and with an emphasis on the family. There are certain individual teachers who may be perfectly able to teach accurately and effectively the biological details but whom I would not want particularly to be offering moral guidance to pupils. I am sure that the Secretary of State can think of one or two Conservative Members who were Cabinet Ministers not long ago and will appreciate that they might not be the best people to talk about the principles of family life. I suggest that it might be better to keep sex education out of the realms of the Bill and to accept that the majority of schools make extremely good provision already.

I suggest also that the Minister should give careful consideration to political bias. Nothing annoys me more when I visit certain schools than to get the impression from teachers that they are against political parties and politics generally. That is dangerous and anti-democratic. People should be proud of the fact that they have political views. We should not mislead youngsters by giving them the idea that there is something great about being non-political, balancing everything and coming down on neither side. We should be careful about this section of the Bill.

As for the clause dealing with free speech, we should remember that when many of us were students we did not always act in the most sensible and wise way. I am sure that that applies to the Minister as well as others. Earlier in the debate one or two Members were pretty censorous of students and seemed not to accept that, with the considerable pressure that goes with trying to get good academic qualifications, students might sometimes behave in stupid ways that they will regret very soon afterwards. I suggest to the House that we look carefully at this and make something practical and workable for the vice-chancellors and principals of the polytechnics and colleges to administer rather than piously pass some resolutions in the Bill that turn out in practice to be totally unworkable.

I suggest to the Minister that the Bill is a ragbag of measures and it would be far better for the Secretary of State to take it away, give it some careful thought, put it back into some sort of logical sequence, put back in only those things for which he needs to legislate, get the resources to make it possible, and finally create a climate in education where there can be a genuine co-operation and partnership between parents, pupils and teachers. In that way, we would get good legislation and, above all raise standards in the schools. That is what I am sure all parents and all Members of the House want.

9.30 pm

The Minister of State, Department of Education and Science (Mr. Chris Patten): This has been an interesting and important debate. It has ranged far beyond the provisions that we first set out in our White Paper "Better Schools". In order to do justice to the debate, I would like to spend as much time as possible responding in detail to the points made by hon. Members. This may make my speech rather less coherent and elegant than I would like it to be, but I think it important that we should answer as many as possible of the points raised.

Perhaps I can first say one or two things very briefly about the purposes of the Bill. The Bill has two main aims. They both concern the quality of education in our schools. First, we want to improve the management of schools by promoting greater democracy in our education system. We want more power for parents and local communities – I say this strongly to my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Silvester) – in the way our schools are run. The second aim is to promote the professional effectiveness of teachers. My right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, North-East (Sir K. Joseph) – the real author of this Bill – argued that head teachers are the nearest thing to a magic wand that we have in education. I would extend that to the profession as a whole. Good teachers – and it is fortunate that we are blessed with so many – are vital to improving standards so that our children can be given the quality of education they need and deserve. Without good teachers, as I have said on many occasions, all our other aims for education are so much dust.

We are seeking to accomplish those aims within an education system which is based on the notion of partnership. Our system is different from that which exists in most other countries. Education abroad is invariably a more centralised service. Here it has always been regarded as a shared responsibility. Power has been quite deliberately fragmented between various interests. I see profound virtues in our system. It encourages liveliness and innovations; it could help to preserve liberty; and, above all, it is rooted in our traditions. We know more or less how to make it work. We have been trying to make it work for about 100 years. That does not mean that I believe it is perfect. It is not perfect and we want to improve it.

This Bill is essentially about the nature of this education partnership. We want to see it performing better in the interests of individual pupils in the nation. I want to say three further things about that partnership. First, it is not a partnership between equals. For example, the Government are not in any sense on a par with an individual school or a local authority. But while the partnership cannot work on the basis that all the partners are equal and will always agree, it obviously cannot stand the strain of perpetual disagreement. It will work best if everyone recognises their interdependence and if all of us consult and work towards broad agreement.

Secondly, the respective roles of the partners are not immutable. In particular, there is no absolute imperative to believe that state education has to concentrate as much power as it does at present in the hands of local education authorities. There is no reason to believe that the central role has to be as limited as it has been since 1959. Equally, there is no reason to believe that the way that the teaching profession operates and its relationship with the rest of the education service is fixed for all time. All these roles need occasionally to be reviewed and adjusted as necessary in the light of our aims for education and how well these are being fulfilled.

Thirdly, in working out the correct distribution of functions between the partners, we have to operate from a number of clear principles. The local education authority must have the power necessary to carry out its duty to secure the provision of sufficient and efficient schools for its area. It must be able to manage the schools effectively. The governing body, for its part, should be able to determine in consultation with the head teacher the main policies and lines of development of an individual school. This must mean strengthening its role and ensuring that it cannot be overridden in the exercise of the functions which are given to it. At the same time the professional responsibilities of the head teacher and staff have to be respected; in particular, the head's role should have a firm legal foundation which clarifies his or her responsibilities and preserves his or her authority.

I do not pretend that reconciling these principles is particularly easy. Some of the finer points would be difficult even for a philosopher king. Neither my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State nor I lay claim to that status, at least, not this week. Some of the interrelationships are bound to be complex, and of course anyone can construct cases where absurd positions might be reached. There is doubtless endless scope for doing an A. P. Herbert on the Bill, as the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) just demonstrated. We are, after all, talking about the relationships which govern the affairs of 28,000 maintained schools across the country and over 100 local education authorities. But a strictly mechanistic approach to the Bill's provisions on functions ignores the vital ingredient of the operation of the partnership—that is, a bit of goodwill and mutual respect—and the Bill only provides the framework for all this. But I repeat that it is our intention to change the way that the partnership actually works on the ground, shifting the focus to individual schools in the context of the communities they serve. I think that that is a change towards which we began to work in the 1980 Act. Indeed, I pay tribute to my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Carlisle) for his part in bringing forward that legislation. We can develop that much further in this Bill.

The hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) made rather a curate's egg of a speech. I thought that he was more convincing when he was being generous than when he was trying to be partisan. He was appropriately generous when he referred to the announcement by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State about additional resources for the GCSE, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. Pawsey) also referred.

I shall briefly remind the House what we are doing. Having already spent £10 million on training for the GCSE, having learnt that the local education authorities are spending about £40 million in this financial year on the exam's introduction, having committed a further £20 million through education support grant to the GCSE for the next two financial years, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced this afternoon that there would be a further £20 million available for the examination this September. I think that that was welcome to hon. Members on both sides of the House. It represents a considerable investment in the success of the exam, and I hope that we can now all work together to make it the success that it needs and deserves to be.

I was glad that the hon. Members for Durham, North and for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Freud) confirmed that they believed that enough resources were now being made available for the exam's successful introduction this autumn. The hon. Member for Durham, North went on to claim that the Bill did not do anything to raise standards. But one cannot legislate for higher standards. However, we can give those who work at the local level better arrangements than currently exist to apply their complementary skills to better effect. That is what the Bill seeks to do.

The hon. Member for Durham, North referred at length, along with other hon. Members, to the Taylor committee, especially in relation to teacher governors. I imagine that we shall have several opportunities to discuss this point in Committee, but the need to secure an appropriately balanced governing body of a reasonable size made it inappropriate to increase teacher representation beyond the level required by the 1980 Act. That is, of course, preserved in the Bill. As governing bodies will be generally smaller than at present, the teacher governor's voice will be proportionately stronger in the new situation. Teachers are already intimately involved in schools in their professional capacity.

On this occasion the Opposition are arguing harder for the Taylor formula than they did for the purposes of the Education (No. 2) Bill of 1978 and 1979. However, they will doubtless be able to explain to us in due course why they have changed their minds.

The hon. Member for Durham, North complained that the Bill does little to involve parents generally with the work of their children's schools. I am not sure that that point was supported by the hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Weetch) in his interesting speech which commanded a good deal of support on both sides of the House. It was flatly contradicted by my hon. Friends the Members for Dulwich (Mr. Bowden) and for Elmet (Mr. Batiste).

Let us consider, in relation to that point, an individual parent concerned primarily with the progress of his or her child. The Bill gives to such a parent a new guarantee—the right to be told by the child's teacher what the child is to be taught. That point was also referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) in a speech which we all wished had been longer. That parent will also be able to participate in parent governor elections and in the annual parents' meeting at which the governing body will have to give an account of its stewardship.

The hon. Member for Durham, North also complained about the additions to the Bill that were made in another place, but he rather weakened his point when he produced his own shopping list of additions which he would have liked to have made. All of them would have cost a good deal of money. I suggest that he and the House should reflect further on his liberality with additional clauses and public money.

I am quite prepared to let the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish intervene on the point that I am about to make. He seemed to object to the fact that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State had made it clear that we were proposing to allow a free vote, possibly on Report, on the issue of corporal punishment. My hon. Friend the Member for Rugby and Kenilworth chided the hon. Gentleman on that point and asked him to make clear what the Opposition would be doing about corporal punishment. If the hon. Gentleman wishes to make clear on this occasion whether the Opposition will be having a Whip or a free vote, I shall be happy to let him intervene and make that known to the House.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: If the hon. Gentleman had listened to the earlier part of the debate he would have heard the exchange when we made out positions clear.

Mr. Patten: I fancy that that clarity has not rung round the House quite as eloquently as the hon. Gentleman suggests. However, I am sure that there will be further opportunities for the hon. Gentleman to be as clear as mud.

Mr. Greenway: Will my hon. Friend note that the Labour party has said that it will not have a free vote on this matter? However, it would not have made any difference anyway, would it, because the Labour party conference has decided how the party should vote? A free vote would have no meaning even if it intended to have one. Labour party members are mandated; they are not representatives.

Mr. Patten: We are going rather wide of the Bill. I do not care to contemplate Labour party conferences too frequently, but I take my hon. Friend's point.

My hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr. McLoughlin) made a maiden speech which delighted the House. Those of us who had the privilege and, as it turned out, the pleasure to support him in the West Derbyshire by-election know from our visits there of his 18-carat honesty and good humour, and they were both on display in the House this afternoon.

I mean no disrespect when I say that many of us will miss his distinguished predecessor. I do not wish to be kind about him only because I may need him to be kind to me in the future. I also have to confess that I recruited him to the Conservative research department from the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, and that I regard as an example of upward mobility. We came to the House at the same time. He was a diligent, independent-minded and witty Member. Our loss is London Weekend Television's gain, and his too, I understand. My hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, West will be a worthy successor. I cannot put the compliment any higher than that.

My hon. Friend asked whether there would be more training for governing bodies, whose enhanced role he welcomed. The Government fully support my hon. Friend's view that such training is important. Clause 46 requires local education authorities to secure the provision of training for governors. The training envisaged need be neither costly nor elaborate. A number of initiatives have already started, including 10 projects in local education authorities which are to be assisted by education support grants. I know that the National Association of Governors and Managers is especially active in that field, as are other agencies. The development cost of the Open university's highly successful course was met by our Department.

[Mr. Patten]

The hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East made three points with which I shall deal. First, he referred to minors or pupils as governors. That was also referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) and by the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish. I recognise that we shall have an opportunity in Committee to deal with that issue.

The Government believe, especially in the light of the greater importance to be attached to school governorship, that it would be inappropriate for a minor to be a school or college governor. There would be numerous occasions on which minors, especially pupils of a school, would have to withdraw from governing body meetings because of the nature of the discussion—perhaps a staffing matter or the discipline of a fellow pupil—and the effect would be to create a second-class category of governor. If governing bodies wish to involve senior pupils in their work, they are free to invite them to meetings as observers. I understand that some schools find that school councils provide a useful means of involving pupils.

Secondly, the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East asked what would happen to pupil governors presently on school governing bodies. Once the provisions of the Bill come into force, the governing bodies of county, controlled and maintained special schools will be reconstituted in accordance with the provisions of clause 3, and all existing governors of whatever category will cease to hold office.

Thirdly, the hon. Gentleman asked about the DES's annual report. The point was made by one or two other hon. Members. I did not realise that we had so many avid readers. The annual report reviews the Department's activities during the preceding year, most of which are reported to Parliament or made public in other ways, when they are current. The degree of interest shown in the retrospective report does not justify the commitment of time and cost made by the Department in its preparation. Over the past five years, sales have dropped from about 4,000 to 1,000 copies, which is rather less than the deputy chairman of the Conservative party manages. The Secretary of State will continue to keep Parliament informed of the Department's activities at appropriate times, but will not in future, subject to parliamentary approval, repeat the information in an annual report after that for 1985.

The hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East, the hon. Member for Ipswich and other hon. Gentlemen raised the question of the establishment of an independent tribunal to deal with exclusion cases. They were especially concerned about the position of head teachers. My hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key), in his knowledgeable speech, noted how vital head teachers are and what demands have been placed on them, especially during the past difficult year. As my hon. Friend said in response to an intervention, the admission appeal committees actively demonstrate real independence. In the light of some of the remarks made by my hon. Friends, we shall consider the matter further.

I should have thought that our amended proposals were likely to carry the support of the head teachers, which is crucial, but we are reasonably open-minded on the issue. We must balance the statutory responsibilities of local education authorities with the importance of giving heads and governing bodies the support which they deserve. I say to my hon. Friend the Member for Withington that that is the balance we must attempt to strike.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Sir G. Finsberg) told us in a speech that greatly interested the House — not least, his comments as a professional in personnel matters on appraisal — an appalling story about attempts to disrupt and to prevent his constituency advice bureau from being held. He asked whether I would condemn that attack, and I do so unreservedly. It was a shameful episode. I am glad that the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish expressed exactly that same condemnation.

The hon. Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett) suggested that we were giving the final say over the curriculum to governing bodies. That is not true, as was pointed out by my hon. Friend the Member for Withington. We are talking about distributing responsibility for the curriculum, in a way that we believe is sensible, between local education authorities, governing bodies, heads and staff. I freely confess that it is not a neat solution. I admit that we could have had a nice, tidy, Prussian solution, but I do not think that that would have accorded with our traditions in this country.

The hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery) recycled his usual speech. He is, at least in this respect, a friend to the environmentalists. He told us that he respected my hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury —my hon. Friend has the sympathy of the House.

My hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge (Mr. Rhodes James), in a thoughtful speech, made two points in particular that I should like to mention. He referred to freedom of speech in universities and institutions of higher education. My hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North (Mr. Carlisle) made a speech on that issue as well. He has some first-hand experience of it. I am sure that the House will join me in reaffirming that freedom of speech is vital to a democratic society. The Government accept — my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made this point clear in his speech—that it is necessary to legislate on this subject. We recognise, however, the legitimate concerns of the institutions involved. My right hon. Friend has already had a meeting with representatives of the heads of those institutions, and we intend to continue consultations with them with a view to introducing an amendment to the Bill at a later stage.

My hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge referred also to the European Community's equal treatment directive. He noted the obligation on the Government to fulfil their part under that directive. However—I speak with a good deal of sympathy on this subject, because I am married to a graduate of St. Hilda's— Ministers have listened to the arguments put forward by the principals of the colleges concerned.

We believe that the case for preserving the special opportunities for women to achieve senior academic positions offered by the remaining single-sex colleges deserves much more discussion. The Government have therefore cancelled earlier plans to introduce a new clause in the Sex Discrimination Bill dealing with sex discrimination appointments to posts in universities and colleges in order to allow time for consultations with the institutions most closely affected and for further representations to be made to the European Commission. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge will be reasonably satisfied with that.

My hon. Friends the Members for Dulwich and for Norwich, South (Mr. Powley) spoke of the powers of school governing bodies and mentioned in particular finance, where the Bill's provisions move schools to the beginning of a potentially rewarding process of delegation from the local education authority.

Because we are mindful of the strong advice of the Audit Commission about the need for these changes to be made with careful preparation and at a deliberate speed, the Bill does not force the pace of progress. However, I very much hope that local education authorities and schools will take full advantage of the flexibility allowed here, as some have done already. Generally, the allocation of functions will allow the governing body to become the focus for the identity and sense of purpose of the school. That was always intended under the Education Act 1944, and it is invariably the mark of a successful school.

My hon. Friend the Member for Withington referred to clauses 43 and 44, which contain provisions to enable controlled schools to achieve aided status. He asked especially about the compensation that might be payable by the governing body to the local education authority for capital expenditure on school premises. The amount of compensation that will arise is likely to vary from case to case. In some cases the local education authority might not have invested any capital expenditure, so no compensation would be payable. However, in other cases the LEA might have provided the whole premises for a new controlled school or in others might have provided substantial enlargements. It seems only right that, where a substantial asset passes to the governing body with no recompense to the LEA if the premises are subsequently sold, the LEA should receieve some compensation.

The hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) referred to the central advisory councils. The Government have already stated their intention to discontinue the advisory councils in response to a report of the Select Committee on Education, Science and Arts in 1982. The advisory councils have not reported for some time and successive Governments have relied upon advice from committees or individuals with specific remits, many of whom have given distinguished advice — for example, Lady Warnock. That approach has worked well and the Government consider that there is no longer a need for standing central advisory councils of the type provided for in the Education Act 1944. We also benefit from the reports of the Education, Science and Arts Committee.

A number of hon. Members, including my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, East (Mr. Sayeed), referred to appraisal. Much alarmist nonsense has been put about on the Government's intentions regarding appraisal. The hon. Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock) also referred to appraisal. We want a sensitively worked out scheme carefully introduced, embodying adequate safeguards for the individual and carefully designed to help all teachers realise their full professional potential by providing them with better job satisfaction, with more appropriate in-service training and with better planned career development.

The Government see appraisal as serving a variety of purposes. The findings of the appraisal system should be taken into account when schools and local education authorities come to decide such matters as planning and in-service training provision. They should be taken into account when selecting participants for such training and in developing the careers of individual teachers. The overall purpose is to secure better decisions by the local education authorities and school management, feeding through to better teacher performance and better pupil achievement. The whole objective is to help improve teaching effectiveness.

Some say that the appraisal provisions in the Bill provide an unhelpful backcloth to the talks now going on at the Advisory, Conciliation and Arbitration Service where appraisal and its link with in-service training is on the agenda. That is, in my judgment, completely to ignore recent history and the painfully slow progress we have been able to make on this. I hope that agreement will be reached voluntarily on a national framework for appraisal. It may be desirable and could prove necessary for that national framework to be supported or provided by statutory regulations. The Bill provides the necessary enabling power for such regulations. Appraisal is so important as a means of improving teaching quality that we see it as essential to put this enabling power on the statute book now. I confirm to the hon. Member for Ipswich that it is not our intention to link the results of appraisal directly to pay.

A great many points have been raised during the debate, and time has not permitted me to deal with all of them. However, I hope that I have touched on the main ones. I can assure the House that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I will carefully study all that has been said, and I am sure that we will return to it in Committee. We look forward to that in keen anticipation of a well-spent July.

I believe that the provisions of the Bill on school government and teaching quality have not, before today, always received the attention they deserve. I think that the Bill has suffered the same fate. However, there has been a great deal of discussion on what is not in the Bill. I shall follow that trend only to the point of saying that the Bill is not, as some people have suggested, a distraction from the real issues of what my right hon. Friend and I are well aware is the long education agenda for the 1980s.

The major and urgent task of raising standards requires the involvement and collaboration of pupils, parents, teachers, governing bodies, the wider community served by individual schools, local education authorities, and central Government. The Bill provides the new and urgently needed means of securing that vital involvement and partnership through more vigorous governing bodies and a yet more professional teaching force.

Forty-two years ago we had the great Butler Education Act. By coincidence, 42 years before that there was the Balfour Act. I do not pretend that the Bill is as historically important as its predecessors, but it is not an unworthy successor, building on and strengthening the partnership that they firmly established. I commend it confidently to the House.

Question put, That the Bill be now read a Second time:—

EDUCATION BILL [LORDS] [MONEY]

Queen's Recommendation having been signified—

Resolved,

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Education Bill [Lords], it is expedient to authorise the payment out of money provided by Parliament of—

(a) any expenses incurred by the Secretary of State under the Act; and

(b) any increase attributable to the Act in the sums payable out of such money under any other Act.

Appropriation (Northern Ireland)

10.28 pm

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Dr. Rhodes Boyson): I beg to move,

That the draft Appropriation (No. 2) (Northern Ireland) Order 1986, which was laid before this House on 7th May, be approved.

The order is being made under paragraph 1 of schedule 1 to the Northern Ireland Act 1974.

The order provides the balance of the money necessary this financial year for the services provided by Northern Ireland departments and certain other public bodies. On 11 March, the House approved a total of £1,365 million as "a sum on account". Today, I seek the balance of £1,840 million, making up a total estimate for 1986-87 of £3,205 million. The Estimates volume which gives full details of projected expenditure is available from the Vote Office.

The draft order also appropriates an additional £104,154·01 to cover excess expenditure in the 1984-85 financial year by the Department of Economic Development. This "excess vote" as it is termed, has been examined by the Committee of Public Accounts which I am pleased to report, has raised no objection to it being voted. Details of the excess expenditure is set out in the "Statement of Excess" pamphlet which has also been placed in the Vote Office.

Despite a few encouraging signs on the economic front, unemployment in the Province remains tragically high at 21·7 per cent. These estimates reflect further increases in public expenditure as part of the Government's commitment to the creation of viable jobs, and to support those who are unemployed.

We continue to spend more Government money per head of the population in Northern Ireland than anywhere else in the United Kingdom. The figures for 1984-85—the last full year for which figures are available—show expenditure in Northern Ireland to be £2,776 per head compared with £2,210 in Scotland, £1,927 in Wales and £1,761 in England.

Government expenditure, however, is not in itself the answer to the problem. Rather, our objective is to create the environment in which private enterprise and initiative can thrive in order to encourage the creation of self-sustaining, long-term employment.

In this respect, there have been encouraging results from the small business development unit, LEDU, which continues to foster private sector activity in a highly cost-effective manner. Since its inception in 1971, LEDU has created 26,000 jobs, including almost 4,000 in the last financial year. These estimates provide £17 million for LEDU.

The Estimates now before the House provide £75 million for Northern Ireland agriculture; 1985 was a difficult year for the farming community. This underlines the importance of retaining Northern Ireland's programmes of special aids; for example, the milk consumer subsidy, aid to pig and poultry processing plants and schemes for grassland improvement and beef development.

The extent of our commitment to supporting industry in Northern Ireland is amply demonstrated by the fact that these Estimates provide a total of £190 million for this purpose. In addition to the £17 million for LEDU to which I referred, there is £83 million for industrial development loans and grants aimed at helping industry to advance and diversify, to develop new products and processes and to improve generally its competitiveness.

About £25·2 million is being made available to provide effective support for industry, including the development and improvement of the Province's industrial infrastructure of sites and factories. An important new development is that we plan to open this year the purpose-built technology park at Antrim at a cost of £6·3 million for the initial development phase.

Hon. Members will also note the provision of £37 million for Belfast shipbuilders Harland and Wolff. None of this provision is for the AOR order which the company recently won from the Ministry of Defence on a wholly unsubsidised basis. The provision instead reflects not only the seemingly unending difficulties of merchant shipbuilding worldwide but also Government's recognition of the importance of the company to the Province's economy as the second largest manufacturing employer.

I take this opportunity to welcome warmly the company's success in winning the Ministry of Defence contract, involving the design and building of the first-of-class auxiliary oiler replenishment vessel. Harland and Wolff won the competition on commercial and technical merit and the company's chairman, Mr. John Parker, and his team are to be commended for their skill in putting together the successful consortium bid.

The company's move into unsubsidised naval work represents a real challenge to all who work at the yard. It is now up to the work force to justify the confidence that the Government have placed in them.

Just under £96 million is sought in respect of the Northern Ireland labour market. Of this sum, £31 million is for the youth training programme and £26·7 million for training centres and other training and retraining schemes. The other major item in this area is some £34·5 million on employment services and measures, including action for community employment and community projects and the job creation activities of Enterprise Ulster.

Further evidence of the Government's determination to tackle unemployment in the Province is provided by some new measures designed to help the long-term unemployed. These will be introduced from 1 July 1986. Every unemployed person will be invited to attend an in-depth counselling interview at the local job market. One of the options on offer will be a place on a restart course aimed at those who may have lost the will, motivation or indeed the capacity to seek work. The aim will be to help the long-term unemployed assess their potential and aptitudes, learn more about the opportunities open to them, review their basic working skills and confidence, and help them with the techniques fo finding and applying for a job.

I recently paid two visits to the Ann street job club at the beginning and then at the end of a course. I was especially impressed by the morale of the people and by their belief that jobs could still be found. The methods of tackling planning for these jobs had improved by the time I visited the club at the end of the course. These people were much improved in comparison with the almost broken people whom I saw on my first visit. I hope that everyone invited for interview will make the most of these new opportunities.

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): Before my hon. Friend leaves the question of employment measures, will he tell us whether the Government have any proposals to remove the employment transfer scheme from Northern Ireland as they inntend—as was recently announced in a press release—to remove it from England and Wales?

Dr. Boyson: As my hon. Friend knows, in Northern Ireland we come into line with the arrangements in the rest of the United Kingdom over a period of months. I have taken note of my hon. Friend's comments. I know that the matter is under consideration and I shall reply to him shortly about the date.

Provision is also made for electricity tariff support in line with Government policy to peg tariffs in Northern Ireland to the level of the highest charges in England and Wales. The forecast of £45 million in the estimates was calculated prior to the recent substantial fall in oil prices. Following the recent announcement of proposals for electricity tariff reductions in England and Wales, the Northern Ireland Electricity Service will make similar reductions in line with the reductions being made in the rest of the United Kingdom.

I come to class 5, which covers housing. In recent years there have been increases in public expenditure on housing. These increases have enabled much improvement to be made in the supply and condition of housing in Northern Ireland. The increases in housing expenditure have also involved deliberate decisions to divert public expenditure resources away from other programmes in Northern Ireland. A combination of factors has, however, affected the overall level of resources that will be available to the housing programme this financial year. These factors include declining capital receipts and the pressing requirements of other Northern Ireland expenditure programmes.

We must be aware that there is a set Northern Ireland block and that if in any year we have to increase expenditure, as we have had to this year on industrial development, the money must obviously come from some other Vote in the Northern Ireland block. Nevertheless, the important point is that per capita expenditure on housing in Northern Ireland is nearly four times higher than it is in England. No one can say that we are trying to lower the standard of housing in Northern Ireland or that we are not continuing to bring it up to the same standard as that in the rest of the United Kingdom.

The total amount of money being allocated for education, libraries and arts in £680 million, and £14 million of this is for arrears of the 1985-86 teachers' pay award, which obviously has to be paid. It was not possible to make the payment in the past financial year because of delay in the settlement date. The overall total being allocated to education libraries and arts reflects the priority which the Government continue to give to the needs of schools in terms both of teaching and of other resources in order to maintain classroom standards. The recurrent grants to education and library boards, out of which are met the running costs of controlled and maintained schools, represent an increase of over 4 per cent. compared to 1985-86, against an inflation rate of 3 per cent. and a continuing fall in pupil population.

Capital expenditure on education, libraries, recreation and the arts is in excess of £40 million, compared to £36 million last year. There we have an increase of about 11 per cent. The greater proportion of this increase in expenditure will be required to meet the continuing costs of the substantial programme of major works that have been initiated in the past two years, principally in the schools sector. Although there will be no major new schemes starting in 1986-87, an additional £2 million has been allocated to urgent minor works in schools in 1986-87, including work of a health and safety nature. I always found in my schools' experience that one of the best ways of raising the morale of teachers was to carry out minor works so that something could be done for almost any school in the area—a coat of paint here and an improvement there—and it was felt that something was being done. That is why we have allocated £2 million this year for urgent minor works. I know that some hon. Members would like more to be spent, but credit must be given to the priority that we have given to moving £2 million for the work that I have described. I expect that in 1987-88 it should again be possible to fund some of the most urgent major schemes, with priority continuing to be given to the schools' sector. A large part of the £40 million of capital expenditure this year will be directed to completing schemes that were started in previous years.

For health and personal social services, a net total of £673 million is sought to maintain and further develop existing services. The largest single element of this is the revenue expenditure of the health and social services boards, estimated at £550 million. This represents an increase of 6 per cent. in cash terms over the past year, and it will now be supplemented by an additional contribution towards the review body pay awards in the Health Service. It will include more money for paediatric cardiology services, renal services and cervical screening services. Money will also be earmarked for major campaigns aimed at reducing the incidence of coronary heart disease and preventing the spread of AIDS. A substantial programme of major and minor capital projects, costing in total over £24 million, will be undertaken in 1986-87.

A total of £794 million is sought for social security expenditure. During the year preparations will be made for the reforms of social security, to be implemented partly from April 1987, and mainly from April 1988, in parity with the reforms in Great Britain.

Knowing that many hon. Members wish to participate in the debate, and knowing that it is limited to one and a half hours, I have commented on the major issues and provided straightforward figures in the interests of brevity. I have not dealt with the technicalities of the Estimates, but I trust that I have touched on the main elements of the Appropriation debate. If I have missed anything, I have no doubt that right hon. and hon. Members will be quick to ask questions. I shall do my best to deal with these and others matters that are raised in my reply, with your permission, Mr. Deputy Speaker, at the end of the debate.

Mr. Peter Archer (Warley, West): The House will be grateful to the Minister for the information that he has given us and for his analysis. If our gratitude ends there, he may well understand why.

It is an ancient constitutional principle that redress of grievances should precede supply. That has traditionally provided a lever by which the House has maintained a measure of control over the Executive. Before providing the Executive with resources to implement its policies, the House has scrutinised the purposes to which it is proposed to apply those resources. It is that exercise in which we are participating tonight.

[Mr. Peter Archer]

Libraries have been written about that principle. May I begin with a word about three of its implications. First, it requires machinery for making financial control itself effective. The right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell), with his customary courtesy, has let me know that he is proposing tonight to draw the attention of the House to the way in which that is now done in relation to Northern Ireland. He presented a very clear analysis on that question when the House considered the draft Appropriation (Northern Ireland) Order on 11 March this year. I hope that I shall be forgiven if I do not attempt to anticipate his arguments or to embark upon that theme tonight.

It is possible, if we are to believe all that we read in the press, that in the relatively near future the House will have an opportunity of considering the whole way in which Northern Ireland is administered. It may be possible to consider the right hon. Gentleman's proposals in that wider context. We will listen with an open mind to the right hon. Gentleman's argument, and we on these Benches will judge it, not on its symbolic significance, nor according to any wedge of which it may be the thin end, but on its merits in achieving more effective financial control in the House. If that appears a naive approach, perhaps that is because we are all so accustomed to thinking about the thin ends of wedges that we have forgotten how to judge anything on its merits.

The second implication of the principle that redress of grievances precedes supply is that the House really should consider dispassionately the grievances brought to its attention by hon. Members, and that each Member should bring his independent judgment to bear. Every child knows that that is not really how it is. The Government can usually nullify the House's control of the Executive by sending out marauding bands of Whips or bringing on business when it is most likely to escape attention. The Government can render our procedures less effective by arranging debates in the late hours when only the most committed of hon. Members are in the Chamber. Once again tonight the Government's business managers have demonstrated their contempt for Northern Ireland business.

It is the third implication of the principle that I am chiefly concerned to address the House about tonight. The House may refuse supply for purposes of which it disapproves. There is no corresponding procedure for insisting upon expenditure when the Government refuse to make provision where there is a clear and crying need. All that we can do is to deplore the uses to which the resources are being devoted when every whisper of common sense, every consideration of decency, cries out for them to be spent on solutions for the tragic problems that beset so many families.

It follows that, where the grievance which we are discussing is a failure to make adequate provision, we would be defeating our own purpose if we were to divide the House with a view to denying the Government even the inadequate resources that they seek. We can only voice our disappointment that the Government asks so little of us where the need is so great.

I turn first to class II, item 5, the employment services, and ask the hon. Gentleman whether all ACE funding is to be found among the sums appropriated under that item. I appreciate, of course, that the Government are providing only 40 per cent. of the funding, the remaining 60 per cent. as I understand it, being provided by the EEC. We begin with the premise, therefore, that we get over double value for every pound that we can prevail on the Government to spend.

During Question Time last week my hon. Friend the Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) asked the Minister about the criteria used by his Department in selecting schemes for ACE funding. My hon. Friend mentioned certain community groups which had been notified by letter that their funding would be discontinued. The letter referred to an answer given in the House by the then Secretary of State to the hon. Member for Solihull (Mr. Taylor) on 27 June last year, to the effect that the Government believe that funding for some community associations might be used to further the aims of paramilitary organisations. My hon. Friend accepted that in principle, but expressed anxiety that to make that allegation about those specific groups may be risking a serious injustice in addition to depriving already deprived communities of a vital life line.

I had already written to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State asking him to supply those organisations with details of the case against them. He replied that the details could not be given for security reasons. I appreciate that certain details cannot be given, for that reason, but I am sure he understands that that leaves them to refute, if they can, allegations that they have been guilty of unspecified actions, which helped unspecified organisations in unspecified ways. So they are left with the difficulty of how to make any defence or refutation.

The Minister may recollect that at Question Time last week I intervened to say that some of us had looked closely at those community groups. If there was evidence that any of those groups were involved with criminal activities we would have no part in any representations, but we have found no such evidence. In the case of Dove House in Derry, our conclusion was endorsed by Bishop Cahal Daly who had written to say that he had already written to a Minister at the Department. He said:

> "I also stated clearly that, in my view, Dove House is not and was not promoting any particular political grouping—that it is simply offering a bona fide community service.
> "I stated my belief that Dove House is providing a worthwhile service to the community in which it is located and is engaging a number of people in useful and constructive work."

The hon. Gentleman was kind enough to say that he and his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State were prepared to review any of the cases that we discussed. Now that he has had time to reflect, I ask him whether he will receive a delegation to make representations on behalf of those groups. Alternatively, will he consider adopting the suggestion made by the hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume) and appoint an independent investigator to look at the evidence?

The topic raises a wider question. It is true that a number of political parties in Northern Ireland—some of them perfectly respectable parties whose representatives in the House are well known to us—provide advisory services in their local communities. That is a highly commendable activity when people's lives are beset by problems which are so numerous, so varied and so complex. Harassed and bewildered individuals are in sore need of advice through the labyrinth of provisions which govern their incomes, their obligations and their freedom, and which sometimes seem almost deliberately designed to ensnare them. The advisory services are provided by political parties and community groups because the Government have failed to make provision for them. There is a vacuum which someone must fill.

We are grateful for the funding provided by the Government for the activities of the Belfast law centre, but that is the only law centre in Northern Ireland. It cannot begin to meet the need for advice. There are 29 citizens advice bureaux, handling about 120,000 inquiries per year. Despite the devotion of their workers — some of them giving their time voluntarily — there are whole areas where people have no access to advice. If the Government provided a proper advisory network there would be no need for hit-and-run, piecemeal provisions.

I turn to class IX, item 1. I have raised with the Minister questions about resources for health and social services so often in correspondence and on the Floor of the House that it has become like a game of chess, where the hon. Gentleman and I know each other's mind for the first 20 moves. I ask him whether he has any proposals to settle the damaging strike of transport drivers at the Royal Victoria hospital. For the past 18 months the Eastern hospital board has suffered intolerable budgetary pressure at the Government's hands, which in turn it has passed on to the hospitals, and which they in turn have passed on to their patients and employees. In particular, the Royal Victoria hospital has suffered in almost every aspect of its services. The staff have more than fulfilled their obligations and have responded beyond the call of duty, but I tell the Minister, in case he has not discovered this fact already, that the whole staff — medical, nursing and ancillary staff — are in despair and that they cannot take much more.

The Eastern hospital board is faced with having to cut a further £5 million from its budget. It decided that £2 million of that should be taken from the supportive services. As I understand it, the intention is to protect the clinical services. That is, of course, commendable; but we are already seeing that the clinical services cannot be provided without the foundation of the supportive services. So the board has imposed cuts on, for example, the cleaning services. It is possible to argue that that is not where the burden of the cut should have fallen. Some one might point out, with reference to the enlightening figures provided by Dr. Robert Rowthorne, that the unit costs for cleaning the main part of the hospital, excluding the specialist units, are already only 51 per cent. of the average cleaning costs for teaching hospitals and only 44 per cent. of the average costs for hospitals generally. The cleaning services were not carrying a great deal of fat to begin with.

As for the administrative budget, the unit costs for administration at the Royal Victoria hospital, as measured by the weighted patient method, are four times higher than the costs in hospitals generally in Northern Ireland. It would be possible for some one to argue that the cuts would have been borne better by the administrative budget than by the cleaning budget or the transport drivers, but the board offered no consultation about how the cuts were to be apportioned.

The board passed on to the transport drivers the treatment that it had itself received from the Government. It took a global sum, without an explanation of how it was reached, and without any discussion, and told them that that was to be cut from the budget for transport drivers. The board then offered to negotiate on how that sum should be apportioned among transport drivers, but not on the size of the sum itself. When the drivers' representatives replied that that was not what they understood by consultation, the board said, in effect, that that was the measure of consultation that it was offering.

The result has been industrial action. No one wants it. No one will benefit. The losers will be the patients and those who depend on the hospital for their services, but it was an inevitable consequence of the threat to their jobs and income. The employees and their union mounted a picket consisting, at the most, of about 24 people. The authorities replied by bringing in the police and the troops. A few days ago, when the drivers were joined by some women workers from the catering staff and other hospital services, they were confronted by a convoy of 17 Land Rovers carrying personnel equipped with machine guns.

Now the dispute is escalating further. Today, I am told, three or four workers in the sterile supplies section have been suspended because of a dispute arising from the coverage expected of them during the strike by the transport drivers. It seems that this has led to industrial action by all the workers in the sterile supplies section. It seems that a further dispute has arisen because the laundry workers have been sent home without pay.

Unless some one at senior level intervenes in the name of common sense, what began as an exercise in meanness and penny pinching will escalate into something that will seriously endanger the hospital services and may leave a further legacy of bitterness and frustration. Just for once, will the Minister not plead that this is not the responsibility of Government? What crisis has to be on us before it becomes the Government's business? It was the Government's policy that led to the problem in the first place.

Class X deals with the sums payable by the Department of Health and Social Services. I wonder whether the Minister can tell us whether the sums mentioned in the order are based on the assumption that the provisions of the Social Security Bill are to be extended to Northern Ireland. It would be wrong to assume that the Government could do that without major opposition in the House and major protest in Northern Ireland. My right hon. and hon. Friends have already exposed the proposals in that Bill for what they really are, and I will not seek to repeat what they have said, but there are some circumstances peculiar to Northern Ireland that would magnify the mischief.

I hope that the Minister has seen the analysis by the Consumer Council for Northern Ireland. For example, if it is proposed to calculate pensions on a lifetime's earnings rather than on the best 20 years that will cause particular hardship to a community where long-term unemployment is more widespread even than in Great Britain — where 36·6 per cent. of the unemployed have been out of work for more than two years, against a United Kingdom average of 26·4 per cent. In an area where three times as many families are receiving family income supplement as in the United Kingdom as a whole, the abolition of family income supplement would have a devastating effect.

The replacement of single payments, and urgent needs payments by loans will mean an intolerable hardship in a region which, with the possible exception of Glasgow, receives the highest number of single payments in the United Kingdom. The Consumer Council and the Equal Opportunities Commission have pointed out that the proposed abolition of maternity grant and maternity allowance and widow's benefit would have a greater effect on women in Northern Ireland, where a greater proportion of women are dependent on welfare benefits, than on women elsewhere.

Even if the Government can steamroller their proposals through the House in relation to the remainder of the United Kingdom, they will have to debate them all again in order to extend them to Northern Ireland. I ask the Minister to warn his colleagues before they paint themselves into yet another corner.

May I ask one final question. In the schedule to the order, under class XI, item 1, I read that over £2 million is required for expenditure on the Northern Ireland Assembly. There are those who believe that the need for expenditure on the Assembly will become less apparent in the near future. If that were to happen, what will become of the £2 million that we are asked to authorise tonight? Will it be returned to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to assist him in reducing income tax on higher incomes, or will some of it be made available to those ACE community schemes where people are giving their time and talents to help make life tolerable in deprived communities? Will some of it be devoted to resolving the escalating problems of the Eastern hospital board and its employees, who feel that their service over the years is unappreciated? Will some of it find its way to provide reasonable retirement pensions to those who have already suffered the deprivations of long-term unemployment, and widow's allowances for those who have already suffered bereavement?

The Government can have their Appropriation order tonight. Our complaint is that we cannot provide more. Will the Minister at least spare the House a commercial on the ample provision which the Government are already pouring into Northern Ireland? The evidence is there on the ground. If he will come with me to Dove House, or to the Royal Victoria hospital, or to the Divis flats, or to some of the resource centres in east Belfast——

Mr. Seamus Mallon (Newry and Armagh): Or Armagh.

Mr. Archer: Indeed. If he came with me to those places, he could see the evidence with his own eyes.

11.4 pm

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): This is not the first Appropriation (Northern Ireland) Order that the Minister of State has introduced. I dare say that, as he approached the debate, he wondered what new oratorical splendours, what new ingenuities of argument, might be sought, to present again the case which has been presented from this Bench on previous debates on the order. I have to say, to his relief and, I hope, to the relief of the House, that that is not my intention.

The essence of the problem has often been pointed out. There exists, for reasons which are historical, a Consolidated Fund of Northern Ireland into which moneys are poured out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom, and out of which they issue again under the authority which this Order in Council confers. Hitherto, we have brought our criticism to bear upon the continued existence of that obsolete and, in practice, ineffective Consolidated Fund.

I recognise the courtesy which the Secretary of State has done, which has not always been observed on previous debates on appropriation orders, of attending the debate. Tonight I want to put before him a simpler proposition, one which, bearing very much in mind some remarks which fell from the right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer), prejudices no separate and larger issues at all.

The proposition is simply this. All the advice that I have been able to obtain from sources which are available to hon. Members shows that it would be competent for the Government to include in the Consolidated Fund and appropriation Bills a provision for the payment out of the Northern Ireland Consolidated Fund of the sums which are set out in the schedules to this Order in Council, and that consequently the passage of the Consolidated Fund and appropriation Bills would secure the effect which these three annual orders separately secure at present for Northern Ireland.

It is not a proposal which has any widely ranging constitutional implications. It applies with equal effect in the duration of the interim period, which it may be the Secretary of State's intention to ask the House to renew for a further period before the summer recess. It does not involve what I believe would require legislation — the abolition of the Northern Ireland Consolidated Fund itself. What it does is something which hon. Members from this Bench have often claimed is their wish. It puts Northern Ireland and its repesentatives in the House in the same position exactly as the representatives of other parts of the United Kingdom. It certainly would relieve the House of three debates which are only technically necessary and for which I believe the technical necessity can be removed by the simple constitutional device of applying to Northern Ireland the Consolidated Fund and appropriation Bills which have to be passed in any case.

But it might seem curious and paradoxical that a representative of a Northern Ireland constituency should wish to reduce the amount of parliamentary time which is available for considering the affairs of that Province. I address myself to the issue of grievance before supply which the right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West planted firmly on the Dispatch Box when he spoke.

The paradox is apparent. It is not real. It would be absurd to claim, for example, this evening, that in the hour and a half which we have available, there is any real opportunity for a serious debate on the detailed policies which are involved in the whole sweep of public expenditure in Northern Ireland, which, in effect, is covered by this appropriation order. The very notion that in an hour and a half we could raise and receive adequate replies to a tiny fraction of the questions of policy which are involved is an insult which no Minister would seek to offer the House.

It is true that in previous years, by arrangement with the Government business managers, there has been the custom that in the case of the main appropriation orders — that is, the March and June appropriation orders — much longer periods of parliamentary time would be made available. Indeed, I think there was a run of a number of years in which the average time available for the debate on the Appropriation Order (Northern Ireland) was four or five hours.

Strenuous endeavours were made, and with good intention from both sides of the House, both from the Government Bench and from hon. Members representing Northern Ireland, so to organise those debates that they provided a genuine method whereby in proper debates issues affecting constituencies in Northern Ireland could be raised and answered. Those who have lived through that experience will confirm what I have to say, that we never succeeded in using the debate upon the Appropriation Order in any organised or systematic way in order to provide for an examination of policy and expenditure in Northern Ireland. So, if the Government were to give consideration, as I hope they will undertake to do, to the proposition that I have made in the interests of the House as a whole nothing would be diminished in the interests of Northern Ireland.

This House has for many decades, if not centuries, wrestled with the problem of how it could debate adequately and how it could scrutinise adequately the growing and more and more complex mass of public expenditure. There has been one type of solution which, alone, has been found satisfactory; a solution which the House has adopted since the middle years of last century in the use of the instrument of a Select Committee.

The Public Acounts Committee does already apply itself ex post facto to Northern Ireland expenditure and hon. Members who have studied them will acknowledge not only the value of reports that are laid before the House by the Comptroller and Auditor-General for Northern Ireland, but also the work which is done upon those reports by the Public Expenditure Committee of this House. But that of course, as I say, is only an ex post facto examination. It exposes what has already gone wrong. It is in no position currently to debate policy or currently to debate the trends of expenditure and administration.

For that purpose, the House has evolved in recent years a different form of mechanism for using the principle of the Select Committee. It began with the estimates Committees and their sub committees; it went on with the Finance Committee and finally we have brought it into the form of the departmentally related Select Committees, which have the opportunity to consider the estimates and other aspects of administration in the various departments of State.

I would think, therefore, that it would be an appropriate accompaniment of the decision to lighten the load upon the House to bring Northern Ireland within the scope of a consolidated and appropriation Bill, that there should be for Northern Ireland a Select Committee, as there is for Scotland and Wales, which can specifically address itself on a continuing basis, with the opportunity to send for persons and papers, to the examination of administration in the Province.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): Would the right hon. Gentleman not agree that to have the equivalent of a Grand Committee for Scotland and Wales would be inadequate but that a Select Committee would be the key? Furthermore, that Select Committee should not merely examine appropriation expenditure but should also have the power in the interests of all those who are affected by proposals emanating from within the context of Northern Ireland to consider the legislation, if indeed the Assembly is dissolved, so that there can be proper scrutiny and amendment of legislation within the House, which the elected representatives of Northern Ireland may attend?

Mr. Powell: I am much obliged to the hon. Gentleman, and I follow his thoughts closely. There is one section of his remarks, namely, that referring to legislation, into which I do not want to enter, because the case that I have laid before the House is self contained in so far as it goes and in so far as it relates to the granting of Supply. I agree entirely with the hon. Gentleman that the device of a Grand Committee is not the one we are looking for, if we are looking for a means of detailed scrutiny of estimates, supply and policies. I remind him—I do not expect that he needs reminding — that the existing departmentally related Select Committees already have the right to examine matters of policy and administration on the estimates. Indeed, upon the examination of the estimates they can recommend that specific estimates should be specially debated during Supply days.

Mr. Mallon: What contribution have Northern Ireland hon. Members made so far to the Select Committees on which they still hold a place? What will be the effect of their type of approach to Select Committees and participation in the House if it continues? Surely it is a self-defeating exercise?

Mr. Powell: The hon. Gentleman is under a misapprehension. None of my hon. Friends is at present a member of a Select Committee of this House.

Mr. Mallon: Does the right hon. Gentleman then accept their resignations as of now? Is that in effect what he is saying?

Mr. Powell: The hon. Gentleman, my neighbour, may be a little confused. It is not possible for a person who is no longer an hon. Member of this House to remain a member of a Select Committee of the House. In consequence of that, my colleagues and I ceased to be members of the Select Committees on which we have served, and, as we have not been reappointed to those Select Committees, we are not at present serving on any Select Committees. Obviously, it would be an implication of this manner of dealing with Northen Ireland Supply business that for the first time hon. Members representing Northern Ireland constituencies would have a genuine opportunity, on the same basis as hon. Members representing other constituencies, to make their contributions on behalf of those whom they represent. That is something that they would welcome.

Mr. Mallon: If I am to take the advice of the right hon. Gentleman, may I seek clarification about which hon. Members succeeded those people on the Select Committees?

Mr. Powell: I am not sure, Mr. Deputy Speaker, whether I am competent to satisfy the hon. Gentleman's curiosity or whether in doing so I would be within the bounds of order. I am sure that there are sources in the House from which his curiosity on that point could be satisfied.

Mr. Mallon: Even Bobby Robson brings on subs.

Mr. Powell: My proposition is potentially beneficial to the House as a whole, in that it would enable the House to avoid the expenditure of time on a process which in itself is unhelpful to Northern Ireland and is repetitive in the cycle of the financial procedures of this House. It is also a method in which we should bring hon. Members representing Northern Ireland constituencies on to a parity of footing with fellow hon. Members which has always been the ambition of the party to which I belong. When the Minister replies, I hope that he will be able to indicate that the Government would be prepared to go with an open mind and in detail into the proposition that I have laid before the House.

Sir John Biggs-Davison (Epping Forest): In common with the right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer), who spoke for the official Opposition, I gratefully acknowledge the courtesy of the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) in providing us with a memorandum telling us of the proposal which he has put before the House. The House is looking forward to the opinion which will be expressed from the Treasury Bench when the Minister replies.

This is a short debate, and I wish to confine my remarks to class XI, vote 1, on expenditure for the Northern Ireland Assembly. It seems that the Assembly has fallen out of favour with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and the Government. Perhaps the question is not whether it should be dispatched but how? It would be possible for it to be abolished or to be dissolved, but abolition would require primary legislation. If the Government did decide upon that course, I do not think there would be the danger of all night sittings and the guillotine which had to be applied against Conservative and Unionist Back Benchers before the Bill, which brought the Assembly into being, passed its stages through the House.

I expect that the Government would prefer to resort to one of their colonial type Orders in Council with a short debate and no amendment possible. I understand that by that means it would be possible for the Government to prorogue or dissolve the Assembly. Thus the Assembly would be kept on ice.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: I do not generally come to the aid of the Government in their exercise of direct rule in Northern Ireland, but perhaps I might suggest to the hon. Gentleman that in this case the Order in Council which would be brought forward would be one under a separate statute and not one under the interim period procedure which is disliked so much.

Sir John Biggs-Davison: Is the right hon. Gentleman saying that as a result the debate would be longer?

Mr. Powell: Not necessarily.

Sir John Biggs-Davison: I regret that I do not quite follow the point which the right hon. Gentleman is making. Perhaps I should not remain on that point because time presses and other hon. Members wish to address the House.

The right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West said that it has not been easy to justify this expenditure on the Northern Ireland Assembly and he suggested alternative courses for this expenditure.

It is a fact that the rolling devolution intended by my right hon. Friend the Member for Waveney (Mr. Prior) has not come about. No bridge has been built between the Unionists and the Nationalists through the Assembly. The SDLP has pursued the old Irish custom of abstention. Part of the case for what is called integration is that it is here, in this Parliament, that there can be dialogue between Unionist and Nationalist. There are two Northern Ireland Members in their places tonight, the right hon. Member for South Down and the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon)—a Unionist and a Nationalist sitting close together.

To be fair, the Committees of the Assembly have been commended in this House for doing useful work of scrutiny whether pre-legislative or of the administration of the Province. I have had the honour of appearing twice before Committees of the Assembly. These functions could however be carried out equally well or better by appropriate Parliamentary Committees. The right hon. Member for South Down referred to the way that could come about. The manner in which it could be done is also prominent in the policy document of the Ulster Young Unionist Council, the "New Agenda". I commend that document to right hon. and hon. Members of the House.

Unionists are often criticised for saying no and for saying that they do not want the Anglo-Irish Agreement but refusing to say what they do want. But how many of those who chide the Unionists for acting thus have studied the proposals that they have made in the "New Agenda" and an earlier document, which is the most positive product of the Northern Ireland Assembly, "Devolution and the Northern Ireland Assembly The Way Forward". I say that it is a product of the Northern Ireland Assembly because, among those who presented it were the hon. Members for Belfast, South (Rev. Martin Smyth) and for Antrim, East (Mr. Beggs), who are also members of the Assembly. The message of those two documents is equal citizenship under the sovereignty and protection of this Parliament, rational conduct of Northern Ireland business at Westminster and a more democratic system of local government analogous to but obviously not identical to the somewhat differing systems of England, Scotland and Wales.

Perhaps I might quote from "The Way Forward" concerning Northern Ireland Assembly expenditure. It said that the Ulster Unionist party opposed the setting up of the Assembly and that it "has been equally consistent in its declared objective of transforming that Assembly into a worthwhile institution for serving all the people of Northern Ireland. With this objective in view and bearing in mind the necessity for obtaining the widest possible consensus, the Ulster Unionist Party proposes that those functions and powers transferred from County and County Borough Councils to Stormont should be devolved to the Northern Ireland Assembly as the nucleus of its responsibilities."

A proportion of the expenditure under class XI Vote 1 is for the Clerkship and other Officers of the Northern Ireland Assembly. As the Assembly passes away, I trust that the careers of the Clerk and other staff will not be prejudiced. They may be needed again when Stormont becomes the seat of a regional council as propounded by the Conservative and Unionist party in the last election manifesto with anything positive to say about the administration of Northern Ireland within the United Kingdom.

Mr. Seamus Mallon (Newry and Armagh): Listening to the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) and the hon. Member for Epping Forest (Sir J. Biggs-Davison), I found it hard to believe that this was a debate on Appropriation. Part II seemed to be almost completely ignored.

I was intrigued by the right hon. Member for South Down, who told us that there were no constitutional implications in what he said. When he made exactly the same speech on 11 March, he said:

"I intend to concern myself, however, as heretofore exclusively with the constitutional aspect of the order."—[Official Report, 11 March 1986; Vol. 93, c. 891.]

There seemed to be a slight contradiction in the disingenuous way in which the right hon. Gentleman ably presented the same concept today.

I tried, rather unsuccessfully, to challenge the right hon. Gentleman on the effect of Unionist representation on Select Committees. The issues considered in Select Committees affect the clerks of the Assembly and people on the dole, those who run small farms in the north of Ireland and those who rear big families and will never work again in their lives. I respectfully ask the right hon. Member for South Down and others what contribution Northern Ireland Members have made to the Select Committee on Social Services, the Select Committee on Agriculture, the Select Committee on Education, Science and Arts and others during this Parliament.

I have not been here for the lifetime of the Parliament, but I understand that, since I have been here, there has not been any contribution from an hon. Member from Northern Ireland. It is erroneous to argue that the matter can be cured by appointing hon. Members from Northern Ireland to Select Committees. I leave that for the Secretary of State to consider, because it is worth considering. I would not have to make the points that I propose to make if hon. Members from Northern Ireland were on the Select Committees.

First, I should like to speak about the agricultural Vote, classes I to III. There is a crisis in agriculture in the western counties of Northern Ireland. Because of the bad winter and the bad weather last year, there is hardly any grass this year. When the Appropriation measure was first debated I made some points about the milk quota. An increase of £1·3 million in that quota is not enough to compensate our farmers, especially our small farmers. Because of the lateness of sufficient grass and the bad winter, a special additional payment should be made to farmers, equal to the present premium for suckler herds and sheep subsidy.

Secondly, I ask for a special grant for fertilisers so that grass can be brought to the stage at which one would expect it to be at this time of the year. Thirdly, an agency should be set up to try to obtain from EEC financial quarters special rates of interest which will allow Northern Ireland farmers who have suffered from the severe winter at least to get back to a standing start with their farms and stocks.

Fourthly, the Department of Agriculture in Northern Ireland should not attempt to claw back grants already paid for animals that have died and thus will not be on the land on the qualifying date. Fifthly, drainage grants should be returned to the previous 65 per cent. level so that our farmers, the backbone of society in Northern Ireland, at least have a chance to make some headway in their industry, the biggest industry in Northern Ireland.

I should like to see those points made on a Select Committee, but unfortunately there is no one from Northern Ireland on the Select Committee on Agriculture and I must take this opportunity to make them. Earlier I spoke about the £1·3 million increase in the milk quota. It is not enough for small farmers in Northern Ireland who are going out of business because they cannot pay bank interest. They were enticed into milk production and into expenditure and then hanged on the advice of the Department of Agriculture and the advice of the EEC because grants were cut from their feet.

On class II I shall be brief. During a previous debate, I think on 11 March, I spoke about Enterprise Ulster and its important role. I congratulate the Minister on recognising that role and on giving Enterprise Ulster at least a five-year lifespan. [illegible] has allowed one of the most important factors in Northern Ireland's industrial life to continue, and I thank him for that. He was rather bemused by a question I put to him at Question Time last week when I asked about the ACE schemes. I said that they were beginning to help people in Northern Ireland who do not really need such help. That help will be increasingly denied to areas of social deprivation where help is needed. There are warning bells there and the right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer) has started to ring those bells in relation to Dove house. We will never get a pure situation at community level in Northern Ireland. We should not expect that, but if we wish to make headway towards it we should remove the ACE schemes from people who do not really need them.

I turn to the second Supplementary Estimate of £300,000 for the Department of the Environment. I have one request to make of the Department of the Environment. It is a simple, but big and symbolic one: demolish Divis flats; knock them to the ground and rehouse the people where they can have a decent standard of living and a decent environment. I assure the Minister that he will do more to end urban terrorism and civil unrest by that one action than by many of the other things that he is intending to do. The argument that there is not the land available to build such houses is no longer valid. The land is there to build those houses, and I ask the Department of the Environment to do so.

Changes are mooted, of which the first is to community technical aid, which has been important for community and housing groups by giving much-needed technical advice, especially in large housing conurbations. They ask for a small amount of money from the Department of the Environment, some £88,000, and a guarantee that the scheme will be kept going for a further five years. That is a small price to pay for the technical advice which such groups need, and which has already produced such tremendous results in the Divis flats and Craigavon. I ask that that £88,000 be given.

In April 1987, the schooling of the mentally handicapped will be transferred from the responsibility of the Department of Health and Social Services to the Department of Education. I welcome the transfer because that is where the responsibility should have been to begin with. There is an initial danger that there will be a no-man's land between now and the transfer. The education boards may not be properly financed to get this important part of education off the ground immediately. It may fall into a pit for a while. We owe it to those who are physically and mentally handicapped not to allow that to happen. We know that education area boards have had their funds cut, and if more cuts came about, and there was not proper budget planning until April 1987, we would be doing a great disservice to those in our community who are least able to look after themselves.

When the changeover takes place, there is no statutory responsibility to give educational facilities to the handicapped who are over 18. That gap must be plugged, and it must be a statutory requirement. It cannot be left to the discretion of the area boards. We must provide those who are seriously physically and mentally handicapped with the right to education.

I have already voiced my views about the Social Security Bill both here and with the Minister concerned. There is a great problem with this which I call the area board syndrome. On paper, it looks good, and the statistics can be argued favourably, but unless the social fund which will replace the special payment grant is sufficient all the detail falls apart. The Minister with responsibility for the social services in the Northern Ireland Office can tell any area to cut its budget by any sum, and there will be a statutory requirement on it to do so. Coupled with a new 20 per cent. water rate in what is an area of great dependence on social security, it is vital that we tackle this matter. The Government's new social security policy could give rise to serious problems throughout Britain. It could give rise to the greatest problems in Northern Ireland because we who live there are aware of the relationship between social and environmental deprivation and paramilitary activity.

It is noteworthy, in connection with the Northern Ireland Assembly, that since the first appropriation measure on 11 March the sum being spent on that body has increased from £1,452,000 to £2,700,000. I do not know whether the increase is designed to cover the cost of a new telephone system.

My party warned the then Secretary of State that the Assembly as constituted would prove to be a white elephant. We were right. It became not only a white elephant but a rogue elephant. It put itself out of business by trumpeting its way into the basement, the telephone area, of the Northern Ireland Assembly headquarters in Stormont and finally convinced Her Majesty's Government that it was not contributing to welfare or to progress in the north of Ireland.

I urge, as other hon. Members have urged, that that £2 million be used constructively — say, in agriculture, health, education or social welfare—and that we learn a lesson from the measure that is before the House. The lesson is that, if we are ever to create anything positive in the north of Ireland, we must at least get the basis of it right.

Mr. Ian Gow (Eastbourne): I join the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) in noting with approval the presence of the Secretary of State. His presence is a characteristic courtesy which has the approval of all hon. Members who take an interest in Northern Ireland affairs.

I agree also with the right hon. Gentleman in his proposal for a Select Committee, and I hope that the occupants of the two Front Benches will give careful consideration to that suggestion.

The hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon) concluded by referring to the Northern Ireland Assembly. Some of my hon. Friends voted against the setting up of that Assembly four years ago, and I cannot conceal from the House that I was no great enthusiast for its establishment. I shall shed no tears if the provision in this instrument on the Assembly in this financial year turns out to be a substantial overestimate.

I urge the Minister to reflect on the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Epping Forest (Sir J. Biggs-Davison). After all, the Secretary of State was a member of the shadow Cabinet which approved the manifesto on which we won the general election of May 1979. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will correct me if I am wrong, but I believe that I would be right to quote verbatim from the manifesto and say that it promised "In the absence of devolved government, we will seek to establish one or more elected regional councils."

The appropriation order relates to substantial appropriations for administration costs in the Province. I still believe that it would be right to confer modest additional powers on the 26 district councils in Northern Ireland. Although it is seven years too late, we should implement the official policy of the Conservative and Unionist party which existed up to and including the general election on 3 May 1979. It is a matter of continuing regret to me that the policy approved by the shadow Cabinet, included in the manifesto and endorsed by the British people as abandoned by my right hon. Friends who now sit on the Treasury Bench. It will be of great advantage if my hon. Friend the Minister will reflect more carefully than the Front Bench has so far reflected on the wisdom of the policy set out in the 1979 manifesto.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): It is now more than six months since I called for a Select Committee to deal with matters relating to legislation in Northern Ireland. The proposals for a Select Committee that I have heard today and that have been proposed in the past month or so go part of the way to meeting my request. However, I fear that unless the vacuum in terms of effective scrutiny and effective monitoring of legislation is followed by a proper process in which a Select Committee for Northern Ireland can be set up, the problem of violence and the seperation of people from their current legislation will get worse. I therefore reiterate my call for a Select Committee to ensure that all those who represent different identities within the tragic Province of Northern Ireland, can voice their feelings and can sit down and calmly consider the problems that face that troubled part of the United Kingdom.

I part company from the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon), who clearly does not have much faith in the concept of a Select Committee to deal with the problem. I ask the hon. Gentleman to reflect carefully on the basis of the argument that has been put forward for a Select Committee in the areas that I have outlined.

I also part company from the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) as I believe that a Select Committee would need to go somewhat further than the rather limited area to which he addressed himself earlier.

Mr. Mallon: The hon. Member is wrong; I did not say that. I said that when hon. Members from Northern Ireland have the opportunity of serving on Select Committees and making an in-put they do not do so. Therefore, basic and fundamental issues are passing through without comment.

Mr. Cash: I accept the hon. Gentleman's point. The difficulty is, of course—and I refer to class XI.1 of the Appropriation order which deals with expenditure for the Northern Ireland Assembly—that that has not worked, that it will not work and that something must be put in its place. It is not possible to carry on with the existing system.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. This is a delicate area, but I must remind the hon. Gentleman that we are discussing the Appropriation order. We are discussing cash, not constitution, if I may put it in that way. It would be out of order for the hon. Gentleman to discuss the structure of government in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Cash: I take the point, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I was referring to the expenditure of the Northern Ireland Assembly and class XI. I believe that it is essential that the money should be spent fairly for all the people of Northern Ireland and, therefore, I call again for a Select Committee to deal with the range of activities which I believe needs proper consideration.

11.50 pm

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): I am sure that the hon. Members for Stafford (Mr. Cash) and for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) will forgive me if I do not enter into constitutional aspects of the matters which have been raised during the debate. The time will come when we have more time at our disposal and we can have a better and deeper debate on constitutional matters. I shall confine my short remarks to the order, and I shall begin by referring to some of the Minister's comments when he opened the debate.

The Minister spoke of the £2,706 per head that is spent in Northern Ireland, and he compared that sum with the respective figures in Scotland, Wales and England. He said that more money is spent per head on the people of Northern Ireland than on those in the rest of the United Kingdom. That shows the Government's commitment, having been hurried along by the Opposition and supported by the House, to the people of Northern Ireland. I am glad to see the hon. Member for Langbaugh (Mr. Holt) in his place, because he and I know that unemployment rates in Cleveland and Middlesbrough are especially high. The Minister referred to the unemployment rate in Northern Ireland, which is 21·7 per cent. The rate is higher in Cleveland and, therefore, it is right to draw public attention to the fact that more money is spent per head of the population in Northern Ireland than in the rest of the United Kingdom.

The Minister addressed himself to education and spoke of the Government giving priority to schools and what he described as the maintenance of classroom standards. He referred to an increase in the recurrent budget of 4 per cent. I have some pleasant news for the Minister. The recurrent budget is £216 million, which is an increase of 5·5 per cent. In other words, the Minister is better than his own figures.

There was some concern about the impact of the South-Eastern Education and Library Board's £400,000 budget and the threatened cut in milk and meals for 1986-87. The board felt that school meals might be discontinued. I am glad to have had an assurance from the hon. Member for Peterborough (Dr. Mawhinney), the Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, that that is not the position and that existing arrangements to provide school meals free of charge to those eligible to receive them will not be affected.

The Minister said that housing expenditure in Northern Ireland was four times higher than in the rest of the United Kingdom. I can only presume that expenditure in the rest of the United Kingdom is four times lower than it should be. In the context of bids and allocations, the allocation for housing in Middlesbrough is a quarter of the bid that was made. It seemed from the Minister's remarks that housing in Northern Ireland has lost out somehow in the struggle for funds within the Northern Ireland block grants. It may be that because of that the executive for the Belfast city council area planned to cut its housing starts for 1986-87 from 1,000 to 850, and planned cuts in improvement schemes from 1,200 to 400.

I do not wish to deprive the Minister of a few minutes in which to reply to the debate, notably to the issues raised by the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) and others. The Minister will not have much time at his disposal and that which remains I gladly give to him.

Dr. Boyson: I thank the hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell) for his brevity. When one waits to reply at the end of a debate, only to find that there is little time in which to do so, there is a feeling of deprivation. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for the four minutes that remain.

If the decision is made that there is not to be an election this year, the money — the £2·5 million, which is basically for the maintenance of the Assembly — will go back into the block for reallocation. The answer to the queries about where the money should go — although the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) did not refer to any money being spent — is that we will look at where the money should go.

The question of ACE was raised again, as it was last week during Question Time. I made it clear then — and this was brought out to a great extent in the heading in the Belfast Telegraph — that we are always open to representations. Indeed, since last Thursday I have spoken to those concerned, including at least two of the ACE groups. Money has not been allocated to them, because of what were considered security risks. We are considering the matter now and we will issue information on what we do. I shall keep the right hon. Member for South Down informed of developments.

The Eastern health board is not suffering a cut of £5 million in its budget, but is making savings of £5 million for redevelopment where it believes the money should be spent. This year the board will have over 6 per cent. more money than it had last year.

Reference was made to the strike at the Royal Victoria hospital. The dispute is most regrettable. It is our earnest hope that it will be resolved as soon as possible. However, I must make it clear that the determination of priorities and budgetary allocations within the Royal Group is a matter for the Eastern health board. The board this year has cut back £900,000 on one side, but it has put in £5·4 million on the other side. Its management and its conduct of industrial relations must fall within its remit. Currently the Labour Relations Agency is in discussion with both sides with a view to appointing a mediator to examine the causes of the dispute and how it can be solved. I am sure that all right hon. and hon. Members wish it well in what it is doing.

Reference has been made to the social security reforms. The intentions is for those to come into operation at the same time as in the rest of the United Kingdom. Obviously there will be an opportunity to debate the matter then.

The point raised by the right hon. Member for South Down, was as always, a constitutional point. I do not say that in any way as a rebuke, because it is a question of how the Province is governed and how the money is distributed.

[Dr. Boyson]

I am grateful for the fact that he gave me warning of the points that he would raise, as did the right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer).

On first examination, I do not totally share the confidence of the right hon. Member for South Down that the proposals do not raise fundamental constitutional and administrative difficulties when they are considered, as they must be, in the context of Parliament's view of how best to deal with Northern Ireland's special needs and circumstances. However, the Prime Minister made it clear when she met Unionists leaders earlier this year——

It being one and a half hours after the commencement of proceedings on the motion, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER put the Question, pursuant to Standing Order No. 3 (Exempted business).

Question agreed to.

Resolved,

That the draft Appropriation (No. 2) (Northern Ireland) Order 1986, which was laid before this House on 7th May, be approved.

PETITION

New Mine Complex (Warwickshire)

11.59 pm

Mr. J. F. Pawsey (Rugby and Kenilworth): With your permission, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and that of the House I beg to ask leave to present a petition to the House. It is signed by Sylvia and James McElligott, Cllr. Tony Dalton and more than 6,000 of my constituents. They oppose the proposals of the National Coal Board to develop a new mine complex in the green belt in Warwickshire. They believe, and I agree with them, that should this proposal go forward, it will irretrievably damage the green belt and cause the utmost damage to the environment in this area.

I ask the House, therefore, to receive the petition and to support my constituents in any way possible.

To lie upon the Table.

Smith Houses, Leicester

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Archie Hamilton.]

12.1 am

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): I am pleased to have the opportunity to raise on the Adjournment the matter of Smith houses in Leicester. The problem afflicts a number of my constituents who were council tenants but who have, at the Government's behest, and through arrangements made by the Government, bought their homes and have found that those homes are defective and are unable to be repaired as the homes of their neighbours, who are still council tenants, have been repaired. I appeal to the Government, through the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment — the hon. Member for Ealing, Acton (Sir G. Young) — to make appropriate arrangements for justice to be done to those owner-occupiers.

I recognise that the problem does not afflict owner-occupiers only in Leicester. It has reverberations in many parts of the country. I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for West Bromwich, West (Miss Boothroyd) for her efforts to obtain, at least, the movement from the Government which apparently has been made. Alas, it is the apparition of movement and not its reality that we must consider tonight.

There are 250 Smith houses in the city of Leicester. All of them are defective and in need of repair. Forty-two out of the 73 Smith houses — 57 per cent. — in my constituency are occupied by people of modest means who cannot afford to pay the cost of having those homes, formerly council owned, put right at their expense.

Part XVI of the Housing Act 1985 provides a mechanism whereby the local housing authority—in this case the Leicester city council — can distribute repair grants in favour of owner-occupiers and then recover 90 per cent. of the cost from central Government, the owner-occupiers paying the remaining 10 per cent.

On 1 May this year, after much pressure, especially from local councillors—I pay tribute to Councillors Ray Flint and Brian Shore in my constituency — tenants associations, including those representing my constituents, Members of Parliament such as myself, Labour Members and, in fairness, I must say one or two Tories, the Minister has moved. He may not have moved far enough, but any movement from the Government in the direction of sanity is a rarity much to be welcomed.

However, the movement has been extremely limited. In Leicester and elsewhere, the order designating Smith houses was finally made, but there are two obstacles to its implementation. First, the Leicester city council has been prevented from distributing any repair grant and, secondly, the terms of the relevant designation order will limit the scope and effectiveness of the eventual repair grants. Before the Leicester city council can make any repair grants, it must be satisfied, among other things, that once repaired the houses will be acceptable to a lending institution for mortgage purposes.

The Building Societies Association's policy is that it will offer mortgages on defective houses only if they have been repaired using a "repair system" that has been approved by PRC Homes Ltd. The Building Societies Association is not bound, by law, to make that decision. It has concluded that PRC Homes must approve the repair system. PRC Homes Ltd was set up to examine, approve and give warranties on repair systems for defective houses.

Leicester city council has devised a first-class repair system which is being used on its own properties. Fifty properties have been repaired in accordance with the system. Some 50 tenants are thoroughly satisfied with the changes that have been made in their properties which protect those properties from further deterioration. The system has been not only designed by the council's highly skilled and excellent team of architects, surveyors and experts but approved and recommended by two independent experts.

In those circumstances, it will surprise the House to note that PRC Ltd has not approved the system. Indeed, I understand — the Under-Secretary of State will correct me if I am wrong — that PRC has not approved any repair system for Smith houses. No doubt, we shall soon find out if it has. Leicester city council has been told that its system is such that PRC would not approve it, that it would not stand a chance and that it would be a waste of ratepayers' money to apply for approval, because the application would be rejected.

If PRC rejected the Leicester repair scheme because it was not good enough, fine — at least we would know what points had to be corrected. But the question is whether the criteria applied by PRC are correct and whether the Building Societies Association should require approval by PRC. Smith houses are not of prefabricated, reinforced concrete construction. They are not PRC houses. They are not Boot houses, to which the PRC's criteria would apply. It is folly to judge Leicester's repair system, which is already in use for a number of council houses that are tenant occupied, as though they were PRC houses.

Leicester city council's engineers, who are highly competent, highly skilled, responsible and experienced, and two excellent and highly recommended independent consultants have submitted that the opinion that it is unnecessary to require the removal or making redundant of all elements containing steel reinforcement. This would entail the replacement of every block in every wall in every Smith house and require a repair scheme costing up to three times more than the Leicester scheme. If such a repair scheme were necessary, Leicester city council would somehow have to find the money and undertake the measures that have been required for two Boot houses. Last weekend, I went around the Braunstone area of Leicester in my constituency and saw where Boot houses had been pulled down and new homes built in their place.

I am proud to compliment Leicester city council on the care that it shows the citizens of Leicester. It would ensure that the necessary repair scheme was carried out. However, if the council spent three times the money that was needed to do the work, it would not be surprising if it were lambasted for wasting ratepayers' money. There is far too much ill-informed complaint in the House about Leicester city council. With minimum funding and despite vicious cuts by the Government, it is seeking to maintain its services to its citizens.

I am glad to have the opportunity offered by this Adjournment debate on Smith houses in Leicester to pay tribute to the council for its work for its citizens and to refer to the folly of those who seem to spend their lives happily pouring scorn on what is good instead of joining in building a fine city for those who live there and who are entitled to decent homes.

The Government encouraged tenants to buy their homes, but, in the case of Smith houses, they were encouraged to buy defective houses. The Government, having made provision for tenants to buy those homes, which turned out to be defective, have created a system with which it is impossible to comply. Those owner-occupiers have therefore been let down by the Government whom, unfortunately, they had trusted.

The Leicester city Smith houses have exhibited four defects. I understand that the designation order refers to one defect only, so the owner would have to pay the full cost of repairing the other three defects. In that respect they have also been abandoned by the Government. It is no good the Minister saying that the defects could have been recognised and reflected in the sale price. In most, if not all, cases the defects were not so recognised. People bought their council houses on the basis that the Minister suggested and it is against the whole ethos of the housing defects legislation for the Government to deny compensation to those owner occupiers in this way.

I ask the Minister to look again at the entire system and either to extend the designation order or to make it clear that the repair of the other defects does come within the purposes of the repair grant for the single designated defect. The owner-occupiers, the council and myself, as Member of Parliament for the owner-occupiers, wish the Minister would take the steps outlined so that the houses can be repaired. If he will not do so, it is clear that he is forcing the House to accept the position of last resort.

No doubt one day the council would have to re-purchase those homes. That is not what the Government intend, it is not what the council want and it is not what the Opposition would consider right, and I hope that it is not what the Minister wishes either. The council does not wish to have a further burden on its already over-burdened housing investment programme. Certainly most of the owner-occupiers do not want it. They have exercised their right to buy, have moved out of the public sector at the Government's behest, and are now entitled to be helped by the Government and not to be let down in the way that they have been.

All that is against the background of a general housing situation which would not simply permit them to move out of their Smith houses into others, as might be possible where housing is abundant. Half of the housing investment programme is being spent in replacing Boot housing, leaving less for other projects. There are 1,500 Boot houses to be replaced at a cost of £40 million over 10 years. Fifty of the council Smith houses were repaired last year at a cost of £4,500 each. What really matters is that there are some 11,000 outstanding housing applications in this city. People cannot simply move back into the public sector. There are some 30,000 people waiting to be housed in Leicester and, of those who are housed, one in three live in adverse conditions, according to the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys. Four thousand out of the 34,000 council houses lack basic amenities. It is not possible for people to say "We were in Smith houses. We can now move out".

It is calculated that some £50 million would be needed for the council to do its job as it should be able to. In Leicester the council gets £13·2 million from the Government out of that £50 million. It is hardly surprising that it is unable to do the job. As it stands, it is not possible for the council to dip into the city council treasury, which is depleted because the council was forced to use the meagre reserves in the year of rate-capping in order to rebuild the Smith houses at local expense. The Government have propelled people into buying those homes and into acquiring their properties. Those properties were defective and it is the moral duty, if not the legal duty, of the Government to see that those homes are now repaired at the cost of central Government. It is the Government's duty to see that the systems which have been set up are not, as would appear, a tantalising mockery but that they will enable people to get the money that they need in order to carry out the work that they are entitled to in order that they may be housed in a city where far too many people either have no homes or inadequate homes and where some 30,000 people are on the housing list.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Sir George Young): I am grateful to the hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West (Mr. Janner) for giving us this opportunity, albeit brief, to discuss the problems facing Smith home owners in Leicester. I compliment the hon. and learned Gentleman on his attire, which has lent some tone to the Chamber.

The position is not as grim as the hon. and learned Gentleman made out in his speech. I hope that the 72 owners of those houses in Leicester will not be too influenced by what he said about the Act, which he described as a tantalising mockery. That is not so. I hope that I shall be able to explain to him that the Government have leaned over backwards to bring help to people such as the home owners in Leicester who have bought their Smith houses.

Some of the points that the hon. and learned Gentleman made are not totally unfamiliar to me because he has been assiduous in putting them to me through parliamentary questions and through the most recent letter that he wrote on 22 May, which I have studied carefully. I shall send him a full reply, which will also reflect what we have heard today.

The hon. and learned Gentleman understandably focused on the 72 Smith owners in Leicester. But I hope that the House will bear with me if I outline the background to the problem because it is possible to lose sight of that.

When we first discovered the problems with Airey houses in 1982, and then with the other prefabricated reinforced concrete houses, the Government did not take the line that we could have. That line was simply to say "caveat emptor," and that it was down to the owner-occupiers to look out and make sure that they did not buy property that was not of the proper value. Instead, we recognised our responsibility to those who had bought in good faith from the public sector and then found that their houses were defective in ways that could not have been foreseen when they bought. So we introduced first the voluntary Airey scheme of assistance, operated through the repair grant machinery, and then our comprehensive Housing Defects Act 1984.

It is appropriate that the author of that Act should be in his place tonight. My hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow), the then Minister for Housing and Construction, piloted the legislation through the House. I hope that the hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West will give the Government the credit that they deserve for grasping the nettle in that way. I should add that, of course, the Act had all-party support in its passage through the House in the summer of 1984.

I now refer specifically to Smith houses. The problems associated with those houses were discussed during the passage of the Housing Defects Bill, and my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne commissioned the Building Research Establishment to study them. The BRE's initial findings were that the houses did not warrant designation under the Act. Although the BRE identified vertical splitting and cracking arising from corrosion of the handling steel in the blocks as a problem which could arise in theory, and which, if it did, might ultimately threaten structural stability, it saw no evidence of it happening in any of the properties that it looked at. That was why my hon. Friend the then Minister announced in July 1984 that he had decided against designation. But we retained an open mind. We told the House that we would continue to look at the matter. We said that, if we could have evidence on the condition of Smith properties and on matters such as valuation and mortgageability, we would look at it again.

The hon. and learned Gentleman referred to the hon. Member for West Bromwich, West (Miss Boothroyd), who took some initiatives in this respect. I should also mention my hon. Friends the Members for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels), for Birmingham, Hall Green (Sir R. Eyre) and for Birmingham, Yardley (Mr. Bevan), who also played a part in the subsequent debate about Smith houses.

As a result of those representations, we asked the BRE to look further at certain properties in Sandwell. At those properties, we saw that what the BRE had said might arise was indeed taking place. That, together with other information that we then had to hand on loss in values, mortgageability and so on, convinced us that we should designate nationally. My hon. Friend the Minister for Housing, Urban Affairs and Construction announced our decision to do so on 19 December.

That is a potted history. I think that it demonstrates that we have been open-minded and have done our best to help owners whom we recognise were in a very difficult position.

Moving on from there, we had discussions with several authorities in the midlands where the Smith owners faced additional problems caused by the use of shale fill in the foundations. We held back on national designation to give those authorities time to make local designations to cover the foundation problems. There was a technical reason why we did not want to designate nationally — that would have knocked out help to Smith owners in Birmingham who had an additional problem with the shale foundation. We made the national designation in late April, and it came into operation on 1 May. All eligible owners are statutorily entitled to assistance.

I shall deal now with some of the specific points that I know are worrying the owners of Smith houses in Leicester. The first point is a basic one. Under the Act, eligible owners are entitled to assistance either by way of a reinstatement grant or repurchase at 95 per cent. of the defect-free value.

As with the PRC designations, we have to provide 10 years as the period over which the owners can get that assistance. The owners will get the assistance to which they are entitled over that time. Many of us hope that this might take the form of reinstatement, but if that proves not to be possible, for whatever reason, assistance will still be forthcoming through repurchase of 95 per cent. of the defect-free value.

That leads me to the basic question of the form that reinstatement should take and the amount of grant assistance that the owners might get. On the latter point, all designated house types have the same eligible expenditure limit for grant purposes, which is £14,000. As I think the hon. Member will know, my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing announced last week that we are proposing to increase the limits for most types and to bring this proposal into effect by the end of August. The important point here is that for the Smith houses we are proposing a new and higher limit of £20,000. I am sure that that will in itself help.

Turning to the form of repairs, the hon. and learned Gentleman expressed concern that the designation itself referred only to defects arising from corrosion of the steel handling bars, rather than from other defects such as cracking caused by movement between the concrete blocks or intersecting walls, or problems with the roofs. Therefore, the cost of some repairs might have to be met by the owners themselves.

We have followed closely the precedent established for PRC houses. I want to make it clear that assistance available under the housing defects legislation should relate in principle only to losses that the owners have incurred, because of defects in their homes that could not reasonably have been anticipated or taken into account in the valuation when they bought the house. Corrosion of the steel handling reinforcements in Smith houses is just such a defect, causing substantial loss in value. That is why we have designated the houses.

I have to say that possible problems with the roofs of some houses — they are of a basically traditional design — or, indeed, movement of the walls caused by temperature or moisture changes, are commonplace things that a surveyor would be expected to recognise. Those problems could not justify extending grant aid to repairs of that nature. That said, it may well be that in order to fix the inherent defect a repair method may sweep up some of the related defects at the same time. If that were the case, the owners would benefit accordingly. But if it did not do so and it turned out that major works were needed to deal with the independent defects and that those would not be grant assisted, the owner might well be entitled to repurchase instead. That could be the case if the other defects were serious enough to prevent the houses from having a thirty-year life, which would mean that they were unmortgageable.

Again, the owner would not be left in the lurch. He would get assistance. In that case the repurchase price would be 95 per cent. of the defect-free value in relation to the qualifying defect.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): My hon. Friend will have been aware of my problems with Smith houses since 1984, including the 31 Smith houses in the Netherhall estate, and aware of the Vice-chairman, John Dixey. They are concerned to get the repairs done privately. They are confident that the Government will help them in all possible ways, but they are not confident that the city council's way of repairing the houses is satisfactory.

Can my hon. Friend assure my constituents that such a system, once approved, will enable the work to be carried out privately and that, if it is not carried out privately, there will still be an opportunity for the houses to be purchased back by the council?

Sir George Young: My hon. Friend's second suggestion is indeed the case. If a suitable system is not available and the houses cannot be repaired economically, to obtain a mortgage with a thirty year life, then indeed repurchase is available to those owners.

In relation to the first point, there is no obligations at all to use Leicester city council's own repair system. I hope that other systems will be approved by PRC homes, and owners will be entitled to use both systems. That leads us to the question of whether Leicester city council's proposed repair methods would meet the requirements of the Act. My officials have had discussions with officers from the council, which I hope have been helpful. I know that Leicester council has put a lot of effort into working up its proposed repair method, include drawing upon the advice of consultants, as well as its engineers, and that it is planning to use the method to repair its rented stock. Obviously this is not the best opportunity for a detailed technical discussion of what are, I understand, complex issues, but there are requirements placed by the Act itself which are relevant and which do not apply to the system that Leicester may use for its rented property.

The first is the 30-year life — the property, when repaired, must have an expected life of at least as long as that if the repair is to be acceptable for the Act's purposes. The council believes that its repair method would satisfy this test. That is a matter for PRC Homes. The second is mortgageability — the repaired property must be mortgageable in the private sector. I understand that Leicester council has had some discussion with building societies and other lending institutions. Much will obviously turn on the outcome of those discussions, but I understand that so far the council has not been able to attain the assurances it needs. It was to try to ensure that repair methods were generally acceptable as mortgageable that we, the BSA and the local authority associations themselves encouraged the NHBC to set up the approvals and warranty scheme, so that a repair method endorsed by it would be generally accepted as mortgageable for the purposes of the Act. There is no legal requirement for repair methods to have NHBC approval, but they must meet the tests in the Act.

The hon. and learned Gentleman will ask "What about the NHBC rules on the removal or making redundant of all PRC elements, and how relevant are these to the rather different Smith case?" I think the answer must be that the NHBC will obviously need to consider this. As I indicated in a recent parliamentary answer, its detailed criteria may well require some adaptation because they were framed very much with PRC houses and loadbearing reinforcement in mind, and Smiths, with the non-loadbearing steel handling bars are somewhat different. I think it might help if Leicester could hold further discussions with PRC Homes Ltd. I appreciate that the Smith owners want to be sure that if their houses are to be repaired, that repair will be effective and make the houses mortgageable. Therefore, it is not just a matter of what the Act requires — the owners have a real interest in making sure that their problems will be resolved once and for all.

I stress the point that I made earlier, that the owners have 10 years in which to get assistance. Now, if they want to move quickly, the Act provides for that under the "hardship provisions", with which the hon. and learned Gentleman will be familiar. They allow owners to make a claim for assistance by way of repurchase if it would be unreasonable for them to await a repair. But for the other owners, who would like to have their houses repaired if possible, it may well be best to wait a while and see what methods emerge. Our recent announcement of the increased expenditure limit may well encourage builders and designers to look further into this and to work up suitable ideas.

A year ago we had no approved repair methods for PRC houses, and there were those who feared we might never achieve any, yet now we have 14 approved methods covering four of the major PRC types, with many more in the pipeline. Indeed, I can give the House the good news that last Friday the PRC Homes assessment committee approved a repair method for Orlit houses. This is relevant because, like Smith houses, Orlits were known to be a difficult type to repair, yet we now have an approved repair method for them. I am hopeful that other repair methods will emerge for Smith. Obviously it requires an element of patience, and I understand how frustrating that must be but a good repair, which solves problems once and for all and avoids the need to move, is worth the wait.

We have had a useful debate and I should like to thank my hon. Friend and the hon. and learned Member for raising those points. If I have not covered all the points, I shall write to them and try to be helpful. Basically, the Government want to help home owners and the council to meet the problems that have arisen through the discovery of the defects in the Act. I hope that those in Leicester will do what they can to encourage builders and designers to bring forward suitable repair systems to PRC Homes Ltd. for approval. Then we can make swift progress in tackling these problems.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-nine minutes past Twelve o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Nepal

1. Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has had any recent discussions with the Nepalese Government about matters raised during his visit to Nepal in February; and if he will make a statement.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Tim Eggar): My right hon. and learned Friend has had no recent discussions with the Nepalese Government.

Mr. Atkinson: Does my hon. Friend share my dismay over the fact that since our right hon. and learned Friend met his Nepalese counterpart in Nepal in February there have been further reports of the persecution of Christians, including the most humiliating and inhuman treatment of two Catholic nuns? In view of this, will my hon. Friend now warn the Nepalese Government that it cannot be long before public opinion in this country, and in the United States in particular, will be pressing to end all aid to Nepal until such time as the persecution of Christian citizens comes to an end?

Mr. Eggar: We are aware of reports of the incident to which my hon. Friend refers and we are seeking further details. As he is aware, we share his concern about the reports of ill-treatment of Christians in Nepal. My right hon. and learned Friend mentioned our concern to the Nepalese Government during this visit in February.

Mr. Alton: Given that those nuns and priests were dragged through the streets, beaten, and, in the case of the nuns, stripped naked by Nepalese policemen, does the Minister agree that it is about time that Her Majesty's Government stopped turning a blind eye and took up with the Nepalese Government this grave issue of the violation of human rights?

Mr. Eggar: As I have already said to my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Atkinson), we are seeking further details of the incident to which the hon. Gentleman refers. I remind him that Nepal is a sovereign independent country, and we have no locus standi to intervene on behalf of Nepalese citizens.

NATO Foreign Ministers

2. Mr. Fallon asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he next expects to meet the other North Atlantic Treaty Organisation Foreign Ministers.

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Sir Geoffrey Howe): I next expect to meet other NATO Foreign Ministers collectively at the North Atlantic Council ministerial meeting in Brussels in December.

Mr. Fallon: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that one of the primary interests of the Soviet Union is to invent and exploit potential divisions between members of the Alliance—for example, this country and the United States? Is it not highly irresponsible of the shadow Foreign Secretary, when in Moscow, to lend himself to a conspiracy against the membership and strength of the Western Alliance?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: If I had to account for all the activities of the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey), I should spend a great deal of time trying to defend him in vain. I hope that he took the opportunity when he was in Moscow to drive home to the Soviets the need for them to reach out for a balanced agreements on arms control.

Mr. Winnick: Is it the intention of NATO Ministers to send congratulations to the newly elected President of Austria? Can the Foreign Secretary——

Mr. Speaker: Order. What has this matter to do with the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation?

Mr. Winnick: I should like to know from the Foreign Secretary whether the NATO Foreign Ministers believe that it is desirable that someone who, at best, prostituted himself for the Nazi war machine and at worst actually gave orders that led to countless deaths should have been elected as President of Austria. Why did the British Government send congratulations? Does the Foreign Secretary understand the deep concern among many people in Britain over what has happened in Austria?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I admire the hon. Gentleman's capacity to stretch the rules of order to their limit. It is not my intention, speaking on behalf of NATO Foreign Ministers, to answer his question. Each Government have responded to the outcome of the democratic election conducted in Austria on the basis of their judgment of the facts.

Sir Peter Blaker: What does my right hon. and learned Friend believe would be the reaction of his NATO colleagues if it were to be announced that this country was intending to give up unilaterally its independent strategic nuclear deterrent and to expel American nuclear bases from this country?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have no doubt at all that my NATO colleagues would react with shock and astonishment at such an announcement, because it would cast away the effective foundation of the defence of this country as well as the effective foundation for our playing a realistic part in the arms control debate.

Mr. Faulds: Is not one of the most damaging influences at play in relation to the success of NATO the American President, who pursues policies that damage the organisation, such as the rejection of SALT 2, the use of British bases for action outside NATO and his general attitude of disregard for European interests?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I certainly cannot join the hon. Gentleman in taking such a view of these matters. It would be welcome if he were to take the same kind of critical attitude of the leadership of the Soviet Union on matters of this kind. In fact, the United States leadership has in the last few years been taking steps to advance the process of arms control, and we have continued to emphasise the importance that we attach to that.

Mr. Temple-Morris: Will my right hon. and learned Friend firmly take on board the fact that it is not just a question of the Soviet Union exploiting divisions? When he meets the Foreign Ministers, will he firmly express the concern on both sides of this House and in the country over the Washington Administration's attitude towards the SALT 2 treaty, and will he firmly register the great concern in western Europe about that fact?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: As was made clear by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister last week and in the discussions in Halifax at the North Atlantic Council, the Government, together with the other Governments of western Europe, attach importance to continued compliance with SALT 2 on both sides. It was for that reason that we welcomed the announcement by the President that he was disposing of the submarines in compliance with that treaty and expressed the hope that the Soviet Union would respond as necessary to enable the treaty to continue to be observed and complied with on both sides.

Mr. Healey: Will the Foreign Secretary inform the United State Secretary of State that the units of the Alliance can be weakened only when the American Administration vetoes an agreement on human contacts which has already been reached by his own officials and by all European members at the Berne conference, and when President Reagan threatens to violate the SALT 2 restrictions on armaments after all his allies explicitly advised him not to when asked for their opinion a few weeks earlier? Does he not agree that the SALT 2 agreement and the abortive agreement on human contacts are precisely the sort of balanced agreements that the hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon) claims to want and which I pressed for when I was in Moscow the other day?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I do not doubt the importance of seeking to achieve agreement, if possible, in the course of meetings such as the Berne meeting on human contacts. It must be a matter of regret that it was not possible to reach agreement along the lines originally foreshadowed.

One must take a slightly different view of the SALT 2 agreement by saying that it is surely right to welcome the decision of the United States to stay within the SALT 2 constraints by breaking up the Poseidon submarines, before going on—as I certainly do—to express the hope that it will continue to stay within the SALT 2 constraints to which the United Kingdom attaches importance and on which our views have been made very clear to the United States.

UN Expenditure

3. Mr. Phillip Oppenheim asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has held discussions recently with Senor Perez de Cuellar concerning United Nations expenditure in 1986; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. and learned Friend raised the question of United Nations finances with the Secretary-General during his official visit to this country from 13 to 15 May. He emphasised the need for a sustained effort to achieve economies and recalled our own record of paying our contributions promptly and in full.

Mr. Oppenheim: At a time when the United Nations faces its worst financial crisis in its history, how can the continued publication of the controversial PINS — political information news service — report be justified when it costs almost £1 million a year?

Mr. Eggar: I am sure that these and other aspects of information will be examined both by the Secretary-General in his continuing efforts to reduce expenditure within his control and by the Group of 18, which is looking at the longer term implications for United Nations finances.

Mr. Tom Clarke: Does the Minister accept that if the United Nations did not exist it would be necessary to invent it? Does he also accept that such flaws as there may be mirror an imperfect world and that, while we seek to improve it, we ought to condemn irresponsible comments, which do nothing but harm to an outstanding international body?

Mr. Eggar: Her Majesty's Government are, of course, committed to continued membership of and activity in the United Nations both as an ordinary member and as a member of the Security Council.

As regards finances, the hon. Gentleman must be aware that it cannot be right for the 106 lowest contributing countries, which in total pay 1·83 per cent. of the budget, to force through a budget against the overwhelming view of the major contributors, which, beween them, pay about 70 per cent. of the budget. Reform is necessary.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: Does my hon. Friend agree that the United Nations could increase its reputation and its finances by releasing the records of 40,000 Nazi criminals, which are hidden in its vaults? Does he also agree that it is slow to do that because of the proper implication of an ex-Secretary-General of the United Nations? Is it not time that all these records were revealed so that this evil can be cleared up one way or the other?

Mr. Eggar: As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister told the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris) on 19 May, it would not be appropriate for us to consider seeking from the United Nations copies of documents relating to Dr. Waldheim's wartime activities before the Ministry of Defence search of military records is complete.

Mr. Foulkes: I welcome the Minister's commitment to Britain's continued membership of the United Nations, but will he confirm that the Government totally reject all the calls from the Right wing in his party and in some of the media, inspired again by the Heritage Foundation, to follow withdrawal from UNESCO by withdrawal from some of the other agencies of the United Nations? Will the Minister today pay a tribute to the United Nations and its agencies for the excellent work that it has done in its lifetime for peace and development in the world?

Mr. Eggar: Developments within UNESCO over the past few months have served to confirm the wisdom of our decision to withdraw at the end of last year. There has been no evidence recently of movement towards a central reform within UNESCO. In relation to the UN system as a whole, of course we are committed to continued membership.

Pakistan (Drug Trafficking)

4. Mr. Spencer asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on what action is being taken jointly with the Government of Pakistan to control drug trafficking.

Mr. Eggar: We share with the Government of Pakistan a firm commitment to tackle the problem of drug production, trafficking and abuse. We have close and effective co-operation in many aspects of drug enforcement, through Customs and other channels. Over recent years Pakistan has been the main recipient of our drugs-related assistance worldwide.

Mr. Spencer: Can my hon. Friend confirm the efficacy of the co-operation between the two countries in bringing to book people engaged in this vile trade? Can he tell the House whether there are yet stationed in Pakistan, as in some other countries, representatives of British Customs and Excise? If not, will he work towards that end?

Mr. Eggar: I can indeed assure my hon. and learned Friend of the considerable efforts that the Pakistan Government, from the highest level downwards, are taking to eradicate drug production and trading. Officials from British Customs have been in Pakistan for some considerable time.

Mr. Corbett: Has the Minister seen reports today of a warning by Mr. Colin Hewitt, the co-ordinator of the national drugs intelligence unit, that the drug abuse problem is worsening? Against that background, and given the regrettably leading role which evil men in Pakistan play in the continuation of this vile trade, may we have an assurance that we will redouble our efforts and pressure on the Pakistan Government to shut down the supply routes?

Mr. Eggar: We are deeply concerned about the increasing problems of drug abuse within the United Kingdom, and worldwide. We do not need to put such pressure on Pakistan, because the Pakistan Government, of their own volition and with our assistance, are taking considerable measures throughout the country to assist in cutting down the growth of the heroin trade in particular.

Mr. Rathbone: Can my hon. Friend confirm the Government's success in placing Customs officers in India, through which almost all of the Pakistani drugs products are smuggled on their way to this country?

Mr. Eggar: As my right hon. and learned Friend told the Select Committee on Home Affairs on 4 June, following his discussion with Mr. Gandhi, the Government of India have agreed in principle to our proposal to post drugs liaison officers in New Delhi and Bombay. In passing, I pay tribute to my hon. Friend for his work in drawing attention to the problems of drug abuse in this country. Administrative arrangements are now in train with a view to early postings of the drugs liaison officers.

Mr. Anderson: Can the Minister say exactly when the two drugs liaison officers for New Delhi and Bombay will be in post? Do the Government accept the view of the Drug Enforcement Agency in the USA that many of the drugs going into Pakistan and out through Bombay come via Afghanistan and refugees who use heroin as a currency for arms? If the Government accept that, was that matter raised when the Prime Minister welcomed Mr. Abdul Haq, the Afghani rebel leader, earlier this year?

Mr. Eggar: We are discussing with the Government of India the precise arrangements for the posting of the two drugs liaison officers. We have identified those officers and we hope to have them in post in the near future.

There is some evidence that some of the drugs that reach the United Kingdom are of Afghan origin. Obviously we are doing what we can, through our co-operation with the Government of India and now with Pakistan, to stop the flow of drugs from Afghanistan. However, our ability to act within Afghanistan is extremely limited, as the hon. Gentleman must be aware.

United Nations Special Session on Africa

6. Mr. Burt asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on his visit to the United Nations Special Session on Africa.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I was glad to be able to attend the United Nations Special Session on Africa. Her Majesty's Government greatly welcome its positive outcome. The final resolution, adopted by consesus, represents a commitment by all concerned to work together for sustained economic development based on realistic policies.

Mr. Burt: I thank my right hon. and learned Friend for that statement. May I offer him the pleasant duty, I hope, of sharing with the House the general satisfaction with the award given yesterday to Mr. Bob Geldof?

Can my right hon. and learned Friend reassure the nation that the patient and generous work carried out by this country over many years on overseas development will continue, whether or not the public conscience has been stirred, with the general aim of improving the conditions of life for all Africans?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am glad to acknowledge the importance of both the points made by my hon. Friend and to commend the fact that the total British aid going to Africa through bilateral and multilateral channels has increased from £447 million in 1982 to about £570 million in 1985. That is in addition to the substantial measures taken by way of cancellation of aid debts and support for the International Development Agency programme.

Perhaps the most encouraging aspect is the extent to which the report approved by the General Assembly last week stresses so strongly the acknowledgement by the African Governments of the importance of the positive role of the private sector in the development of Africa.

Mr. Cambell-Savours: What is the Foreign Secretary's response to the comments of Sir Robert Geldof, who described the right hon. and learned Gentleman's speech at the United Nations illustrating Britain's position on help for those in need in Africa as a lot of old crap?—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I know that Mr. Geldof said that, but it is not a very elegant word to use in this Chamber.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I regard the use of such language by Mr. Geldof as unhelpful, just as it is even more unhelpful on the part of the hon. Gentleman. It is only one aspect of the character of Mr. Geldof that has made him widely admired around the world for the part that he has played.

Mr. Wilkinson: Has my right hon. and learned Friend had contacts with Mr. Bradford Morse, the head of the Special Programme for Africa in the United Nations, or the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, about the large influx of refugees into Somalia owing to the intolerable programme by the Ethiopian authorities of corralling people into special villages?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: That is one of the matters that my right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development has constantly in mind in the contacts that he has in that area.

Soviet Union (Human Contacts)

7. Mr. Lawrence asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he next expects to meet the Soviet Foreign Minister; and whether he will raise the issue of human contacts in the light of the discussions at the conference on security and co-operation in Europe in Berne.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Tim Renton): We hope that Mr. Shevardnadze will be able to visit the United Kingdom in the near future. My right hon. and learned Friend has raised issues of human contacts and human rights with the Soviet Foreign Minister in the past and will continue to do so. These issues were also raised during the recent visit to the USSR of the Inter-Parliamentary Union delegation led by my noble Friend the Lord President.

Mr. Lawrence: Is my hon. Friend aware that the Soviet authorities still refuse to allow thousands of Jews who have applied to leave the Soviet Union to join their families to do so? Is he further aware that in the past week yet another Hebrew teacher — Aleksy Magarik — has been sentenced to three years in a labour camp following the finding of 6g of cannabis which was planted in his luggage? Does my hon. Friend agree that if the Soviet authorities think they can blatantly disregard their solemnly entered into international undertakings on human rights and still convince the West that if they enter into solemn and binding undertakings for arms reduction it will believe them, they had better think again?

Mr. Renton: I agree with what my hon. and learned Friend has said. It is true that the Soviet Union's record on permitting Jewish emigration is unsatisfactory and that there are no signs of it improving this year. At the CSCE in Berne it was quite clear that Soviet Jewry was a great stumbling block, in that the Soviet delegation was anxious to avoid any recommendations that had a direct bearing on Jewish emigration. At the same time, the West made it clear that it would not agree to a final document which excluded Soviet Jews.

Mr. Beith: Will the Minister follow up the efforts made by the delegation in Moscow to convince the Soviet leadership that concern for civil rights and the rights of religious groups, Christians as well as Jews, is not a propaganda issue so far as the West is concerned, but an issue of real concern to many citizens in the democratic West? Will he take the opportunity to try to convince the Soviet leadership that it would be in its interests to improve its record on that matter?

Mr. Renton: Yes. We have done so many times, and we shall continue to do so. It is obviously right that the question of human rights is an integral part of implementing the Helsinki final act. It is tragic that I often hear praise from the East for the value of the Helsinki accord, but at the same time we see every chapter being flouted by it.

Mr. Marlow: My hon. Friend and the House are rightly concerned for the human rights of Jews as for everybody else. Will he point out to the Israeli Defence Minister that it would be more helpful to the human rights of Israelis if they were concerned for the democracy of Arabs as well as for Jews?

Mr. Renton: On many occasions we have made it plain to the Israeli Government that we wish to see a total withdrawal from southern Lebanon, where the rights of a number of Palestinians are being badly thwarted. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, when she was in Israel recently, raised strongly with the Israeli Prime Minister the lack of rights of Palestinians in the occupied territories.

Mr. Janner: To revert to the original question, may I thank the Government for their steps to keep this matter before the Soviet Government. I thank also the all-party delegation that went to Moscow. Will the Government please continue to press for the release of people such as Ida Nudel, Alexander Vladimar Slepak, Alexander Lerner and other winners of the annual award of the all-party parliamentary committee for the release of Soviet Jewry? Will the Government say how much we care about these people and their right — which has not been granted — to leave the Soviet Union in accordance with the Soviet Union's constitution and the Universal Declaration on Human Rights?

Mr. Renton: I very much agree with the hon. and learned Gentleman's thanks to the parliamentary delegation that recently went to Moscow for the manner in which it raised the subject of human rights with Mr. Gromyko and Mr. Gorbachev. Clearly the delegation took every opportunity to raise the subject of those distressing cases. We shall continue to raise not only the cases mentioned by the hon. and learned Gentleman but the split family cases, which concern British citizens in this country. As in the past, we shall continue to do that at every possible opportunity.

Mr. George Robertson: Will the hon. Gentleman accept that the Opposition believe as strongly as he does in civil and human rights, whether in Eastern bloc countries or any Western country? Does he agree that the unilateral vetoing by the United States and other member states of the CSCE — the Helsinki group — of an agreement in Berne which would have positively improved the ability of people to leave the Soviet Union does little or nothing to help the cause of those in the Soviet Union or other countries who saw the light at the end of the tunnel being denied by the impromptu action of the United States Government?

Mr. Renton: I note what the hon. Gentleman has said. The United Kingdom delegation was prepared to give its agreement to a document which was, in effect, a compromise reached at the end of the Berne meeting. In fairness, it must be said that the view of the United States delegation was that the recommendations in the compromise document did not go far enough, given the Soviet failure to comply with existing commitments. In some cases the United States delegation thought that the compromise document was a step backwards from the commitments made in the Helsinki final act. On that basis, there was no agreement on the document.

African National Congress

8. Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when and where Government officials will next meet the African National Congress.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mrs. Lynda Chalker): As my right hon. and learned Friend told the House on 9 April, contacts between officials and the ANC are continuing as appropriate. The central purpose of such contact is to bring home to the ANC the importance of a suspension of violence on all sides in South Africa in order to promote a constructive dialogue.

Mr. Skinner: Now that the Eminent Persons Group has been bombed out of South Africa by the Botha regime's actions a few weeks ago against three Commonwealth countries, why do not the Government, when they sit down at ministerial level with the ANC—as they should do—call for an unconditional amnesty for Mandela and take a lead on economic sanctions against that unhappy country to stop all the bloodshed and suffering?

Mrs. Chalker: We have unreservedly condemned the raids on the capitals of the three independent Commonwealth countries, especially at a time when the Eminent Persons Group was making progress. We have called for the consideration of dialogue among all parties. It is not for me this afternoon, before publication of the report of the Commonwealth Eminent Persons Group, to make any comments on it. We shall consider the report with the utmost care.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Apathy.

Mrs. Chalker: There is certainly no apathy in the Government's response.

Mr. Jackson: Does my hon. Friend recognise that the ANC is the oldest political party in South Africa, that it will play a crucial part in the country's future and that it is important that Britain should be in a better position to influence its thinking?

Mrs. Chalker: We have had official-level contacts where appropriate to be in a better position to influence the ANC's thinking. One feature of the ANC is that, although it is made up of people with many different views, if the Communists take it over, Nationalists will be denied the means of political expression. That is why we have called for an end to apartheid. That is why we have supported the work of the Eminent Persons Group, which has gone on so thoroughly over six months.

Mr. Maclennan: Does the Minister agree that in order to promote dialogue between members of the ANC and the authorities in Pretoria the Government should contemplate introducing a ban on commercial air flights to South Africa and should co-ordinate action on that front with other members of the Commonwealth and European Community?

Mrs. Chalker: In our contacts with the ANC and the South African Government we have always sought to bring home to them the fact that continuation of the policies that deny rights to black South Africans, including the lack of freedom for Nelson Mandela, are to be abhorred. Specific bans, such as the hon. Gentleman mentioned, are for consideration in the light of the report of the eminent persons group. We have not committed ourselves and will not do so until the report has been published. It will be published tomorrow and it then needs to be considered, as has been agreed, between the Heads of Government, at the beginning of August.

Mr. Winnick: Is it not a fact that the Eminent Persons Group has come to the conclusion that there is no alternative, in view of what is happening in South Africa, but to apply sanctions? When will the British Government realise that it is not good enough to say that we are against apartheid, and could instead recognise that effective actions must be taken to persuade the South African Government to act in the direction that the majority of hon. Members, including a number of Conservative Members, want? There must be fundamental changes in South Africa, and the longer that is delayed the more bloodshed and tragedy there will be in that country.

Mrs. Chalker: As I and my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State have said on many occasions, we have consistently condemned all the things that the hon. Gentleman has condemned. We have also said that we have argued against collective economic boycotts and things of that kind because experience has shown that they do not work. The question whether any further measures can be taken, in addition to those measures that the United Kingdom has already implemented over the years, has to be considered in the light of experience and of the report. We do not yet have the report.

Mr. Soames: Is my hon. Friend aware that the imposition of sanctions is likely to produce more bloodshed and more anger? In the townships of Uitenhage and New London unemployment is already running at 50 per cent. What possible advantage could accrue to those we wish to help by the imposition of sanctions?

Mrs. Chalker: There is no doubt that there are many views on that subject. We certainly know that sanctions as applied in the past have not given a clear outcome. We wanted to ensure, and continue to do so, that the actions we have taken, such as the arms embargo, the Gleneagles agreement, the European Community measures decided at Luxembourg, the Nassau measures and the stepping up of our own policy work. Those things do work and we should consider only measures that will work. Otherwise, as my hon. Friend said, we shall worsen the situation still further.

Mr. Anderson: When we take over the presidency of the EEC Council of Ministers on 1 July, will we still maintain an objection in principle to meeting the ANC at ministerial level, although we have agreed that other Presidents of the EEC Council should meet them? If we do so will not the British public and our allies not conclude that we are prepared only to engage constructively in dialogue with white South Africans and are not prepared constructively to engage in dialogue with black South Africans?

Mrs. Chalker: The hon. Gentleman's last remark is absolute nonsense. Of course we are prepared constructively to engage in dialogue with black South Africans. We have been working behind the scenes for a dialogue between all the peoples of South Africa and that is what the Commonwealth Eminent Persons Group has worked so hard for. When we take up the presidency of the European Community we shall consider the measures that need to be taken at that time. I am sure that the discussion will go along such lines.

Mr. John Carlisle: Does my hon. Friend agree that the EPG's failure is partly because the Commonwealth Secretariat and its director general have been hand in hand with the ANC, which has no intention of pursuing peaceful reform in South Africa? Will she accept that the Government have no business discussing such matters with terrorists and that she would be better spending her time talking to moderate black leaders in South Africa, such as Chief Buthelezi?

Mrs. Chalker: The earlier part of my hon. Friend's supplementary question was wrong. We shall talk with the full range of black leaders in South Africa, and the best way of doing that must be left to the Government to decide.

Central America

9. Miss Boothroyd asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what further discussions are planned by the European Community Foreign Ministers concerning the situation in Central America; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: There is regular discussion of Central America within European political co-operation. The 12 have acted five times this year to support the Contadora peace process, most recently before the Esquipulas summit of the five Central American Presidents on 24-25 May, when the 12 called for prompt signature and implementation of a comprehensive and verifiable agreement. The next meeting of Foreign Ministers is on 16-17 June.

Miss Boothroyd: May I urge the Secretary of State to use his forthcoming presidency of the Council to persuade the Community to speak with one voice in seeking the withdrawal of American funding of the Contras? Does he agree that the continued funding of the Contras' regime by the Americans is the greatest single obstacle to the signing of a peace treaty with the Contadoras?

Mr. Eggar: The United States Government have reaffirmed their support for a comprehensive, viable and simultaneous settlement that would answer all the 21 Contadora objectives. They did that on 22 May. We hope very much that Nicaragua will negotiate seriously to reach such an agreement.

Mr. Deakins: Can the Minister tell us one thing that has changed in Central America as a result of co-ordinated action by the member states of the EEC on this issue? Can he say whether, during our presidency, we shall be leading the EEC in opposition to a decision that is likely to be taken this year by the House of Representatives in favour of military aid to the Contras?

Mr. Eggar: The solution to the problems of Central America rest with the Contadora countries and the Latin America support group. Our role within the EEC, as President of the EEC and as the United Kingdom Government, is to support peace processes, and we shall continue to do so.

Mr. Foulkes: Will the Minister answer the key question? As the Government are on record as condemning all state-sponsored terrorism, will they condemn the United States Government for their sponsorship — state sponsorship — of the Contra terrorists in Nicaragua?

Mr. Eggar: As usual, the hon. Gentleman goes right over the top. The Government have consistently advocated negotiations rather than violence. We have advocated a balanced approach rather than the one-sided rhetoric that comes from Opposition Members. We believe that there should be a comprehensive solution to comprehensive problems.

Mr. Beith: If Nicaragua signs the proposals put forward by its neighbours and there is no change in the attitude of the United States, what will European Ministers do?

Mr. Eggar: The United States Government have stated clearly that they support the Contadora process. If Nicaragua signs an agreement, presumably the United States Government will support the agreement.

Afghanistan

10. Mr. Gregory asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment his Department has made of the prospects for peace in Afghanistan, following the emergence of a new leader of the Communist regime in Kabul.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: This change of leadership in Afghanistan does not of itself improve prospects for peace. The only way to make progress is for the Soviet Union to withdraw all its troops, in accordance with successive United Nations resolutions.

Mr. Gregory: Does my right hon. and learned Friend accept that the appointment of the former head of the secret police as the leader of Afghanistan—a man who carried out an atrocious campaign of slavish acceptance of the Moscow line — will not be conducive to an acceptance of the present regime? Does he agree that the mere presence of over 100,000 Soviet troops in Afghanistan, which has led to tens of thousands of deaths and over 3 million refugees, should be of greater interest to the British Labour party than the anti-Western views that it pursues?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend the appointment of a former head of the Afghan secret police who so ruthlessly prosecuted the polices of the regime does nothing whatsoever to help the prospects of peace. He is even less acceptable to the Afghan people than his presecessor. It would be encouraging if the Opposition would devote half as much attention to the withdrawal of 118,000 Soviet troops from Afghanistan as they do to the question of Nicaragua.

Mr. Moynihan: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that no practical solution to the United Nations peace talks can be achieved without the involvement of the Mujahideen?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: It is certainly correct that any conclusion, which must involve the withdrawal of Soviet troops, must be acceptable to the Afghan people.

Chemical Weapons

11. Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if there has been recent progress at the Geneva disarmament conference in negotiations on chemical weapons.

14. Mrs. Virginia Bottomley asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he next expects to discuss the Soviet capability in chemical weapons with a representative of the Soviet Government.

Mr. Renton: The conference on disarmament has been in recess since 25 April 1986 and resumed on 10 June. Progress so far this year has not been as rapid as we would have wished. My right hon. and learned Friend hopes to have a full exchange of views on a range of arms control issues, including chemical weapons, when the Soviet Foreign Minister, Mr. Shevardnadze visits London.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Does my hon. Friend agree that an agreement to ban the production of these weapons without watertight verification would be useless? Will he press the Soviet Union to concede this inspection? Will he further stress that these awful weapons have already been used in the Iran-Iraq war? There is a danger of further proliferation without international agreement outlawing their production and deployment.

Mr. Renton: Yes, Sir. We hope to achieve a global verifiable ban on the production and stocking of chemical weapons. The question of verification is difficult, but we must try to make progress. The recent use of chemical weapons in Iraq demonstrates the danger of proliferation of these dreadful weapons.

Mrs. Bottomley: Is my hon. Friend aware that many people in this country supported the Government's decision to abandon our chemical warfare capability in the 1950s? Does he accept that there is now mounting anxiety over what we regard as the increasing chemical warfare capability of the Soviet Union? While I appreciate that no firm plans have been made for a meeting with the Soviet Foreign Minister, can outline what other contacts have been made with the Soviets on this important subject?

Mr. Renton: Yes. The stockpile of chemical weapons held by the Soviet Union, estimated at not less than 300,000 tonnes of nerve gas weapons, is a matter of serious concern. For that reason, and while we are awaiting Mr. Shevardnadze's visit, we are pleased that Mr. Issraelyan, the chief Soviet representative at the United Nations conference on disarmament in Geneva, is coming here shortly. We shall specifically discuss with him Soviet ideas about implementing a verifiable ban.

Mr. Dalyell: When Mr. Shevardnadze comes to this country, will the Minister arrange for Foreign Office officials, at senior level, to meet Mr. Julian Perry Robinson and his colleagues at Sussex university who are making a special study of these affairs?

Mr. Renton: I listened with interest to the hon. Gentleman's request. As Sussex university is on the edge of my constituency, I may have an opportunity to hear Mr. Perry Robinson's views. The hon. Gentleman should take comfort from what I have said. The visit of Ambassador Issraelyan, the chief Soviet representative at Geneva, will give us an opportunity to consider in great detail the degree to which we can move towards a verifiable regime on the key issue of challenge inspection.

Mr. Haynes: I wholeheartedly agree with the Minister about the banning of chemical weapons. When he gets into negotiations about chemical weapons in Geneva, will he first admit that we have chemical weapons within our shores, although that has been denied ever since I have been here?

Mr. Renton: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his early support, but I totally disagree with his latter statement. Britain gave up the production and stocking of chemical weapons in the late 1950s. There has been a complete ban on their production in the United States ever since the late 1960s, and it is only against that background that NATO has now agreed to new United States production of such weapons at the end of next year if there is not a total ban in force by them. That is the carrot for us all to move towards. We should get a total verifiable ban before the end of next year.

Mr. Churchill: Although I recognise that the Soviet Union alone has a large-scale and modern chemical weapon capability which has given NATO little choice but to establish a new force goal for the development of binary weapons by the United States, will my hon. Friend make it quite clear that we favour a dual-track approach and that we would infinitely prefer an all-out chemical weapons ban, with proper verification provisions, to going ahead, in the last resort, with the force goal?

Mr. Renton: Yes, Sir. I can give my hon. Friend that assurance. NATO has no wish for the renewed production of chemical weapons in the United States if the far better option of a verifiable global ban can be negotiated by that time.

Mr. George Robertson: Can the Minister confirm that it is not an agreement by NATO to the deployment of binary chemical weapons, but that NATO has only noted the force goal of the United States? It is important to get that precisely correct, as some NATO countries oppose the force goal. Is it not clear that the Soviet Union genuinely wants an agreement on chemical weapons, as was made clear, it is understood, in a reply from Mr. Gorbachev to the Prime Minister only last week? As it is now willing to consider on-site inspection of destruction of stocks and production facilities, surely Britain could use its forthcoming presidency of the Geneva talks on the subject to talk on behalf of the British people, and not on behalf of the American Administration, in seeking an agreement to ban these terrible and wholly unnecessary weapons.

Mr. Renton: The hon. Gentleman sees matters in a very topsy-turvy fashion. The United States has had a total ban on the production of these weapons for 17 years. It is against the background of a continuing Soviet stockpile of more than 300,000 tonnes of such weapons that NATO has agreed to the force goal of the United States. As for what the hon. Gentleman said about the Soviet attitude, in their recent offers the Soviets have agreed, for example, to examine some points of detail such as declaring chemical weapon production sites within 30 days and beginning dismantling within one year. We have no news at all from them on the key issue of challenge inspection.

That is the issue, among others, which we shall explore when Ambassador Issraelyan comes here shortly and, doubtless, when Foreign Minister Shevardnadze comes here later. That is the key issue to be resolved.

Mr. Viggers: Does my hon. Friend agree that our policy of deterrence and negotiation is far more likely to be successful than the pious and empty hopes of the so-called alliance commission, which announced today, in a press conference taking place now, that it hopes that chemical weapons will be the subject of reduction?

Mr. Skinner: Who said that, though?

Mr. Viggers: Not surprisingly, the press conference is taking place despite the ostentatious boycott of the leader of the Social Democratic party.

Mr. Renton: Yes, Sir. It is absolutely clear that the dual track position of NATO — [HON. MEMBERS: "Of the alliance."] — over intermediate nuclear weapons was effective in bringing the Soviets back to the negotiating table, leading to a possible ban, on a zero basis, on intermediate nuclear weapons. These days it is hard to understand where the other alliance stands on any defence issues, but out position is quite plain. We, and all other Western countries, will fight for a verifiable global ban on chemical weapons.

Sri Lanka

12. Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he last met the High Commissioner of Sri Lanka; and what subjects he discussed with him.

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary has met the Sri Lankan high commissioner on a number of occasions, most recently on 18 March when the high commissioner called on him, accompanied by the Sri Lankan Minister of Foreign Affairs, the hon. Mr. Hameed.

Mr. Wareing: Does the Minister agree that it is a matter for great sorrow that that Commonwealth country should be ravaged by communal violence? If support is not given to Mr. Rajiv Gandhi's peace initiative, there is a great danger that both communities will be dominated by their own extremists. As the communities in Ceylon inherited that division from the days of British imperialism, could not the British Government play a role in spearheading a Commonwealth initiative to back Rajiv Gandhi in order to bring together those two communities?

Mr. Eggar: I thank the hon. Gentleman for the way in which he analysed the situation in the first part of his question. We deplore the continuing violence in Sri Lanka. We acknowledge Mr Gandhi's valuable and positive role in encouraging direct talks between the Sri Lankan Government and Tamil representatives. We shall support any efforts that are aimed at furthering the peace process. However, we believe that India has a crucial role in this whole area. We would be prepared to do whatever we can to support that role.

Mr. Sims: Is my hon. Friend aware that many hon. Members are friends of Sri Lanka and its people and would like to convey to them our distress at the continuing violence and, in particular, our sympathy over the outrage that has been reported today? May I warmly endorse the views expressed by the hon. Member for Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Wareing), and point out that the Indian Government have sought to effect a reconciliation for 12 months, without any success? Both communities hold the United Kingdom in high regard. Is not the time ripe for the British Government to take a positive initiative in effecting a reconciliation?

Mr. Eggar: I thank my hon. Friend for his remarks, and I shall ensure that his, and those of the hon. Member for Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Wareing), are drawn to the attention of the Sri Lankan high commissioner. We continue to believe that we should assist the Indian Government in any way felt appropriate and should keep in close touch with the Sri Lankan Government.

Mr. Corbyn: Does the Minister accept that the origin of many of Sri Lanka's problems lies in the continual exclusion of the Tamil people from Government and other constitutional processes? Does he further accept that his concern to achieve peace in Sri Lanka would be far more credible if the British Government stopped supplying the Sri Lankan Government with arms, which have been used to kill Tamil people, and withdrew any training facilities offered to the Sri Lankan armed forces in this country? That would be one way of showing that he was determined to achieve peace in that country instead of escalating the communal violence.

Mr. Eggar: May I first say how pleased I am to see the hon. Gentleman participating in the democratic process rather than demonstrating on the streets——

Hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Every hon. Member must take responsibility for what he says.

Hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Eggar: I have no intention of withdrawing. I do not see that I have anything to withdraw. I welcomed the hon. Gentleman back to the House.

The hon. Gentleman put a peculiarly one-sided analysis of the problem in Sri Lanka in distinct contradiction to the view of the hon. Member for Liverpool, West Derby. I stress that no serving British military personnel are engaged in training in Sri Lanka.

South Africa

13. Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make it his policy, as President of the European Economic Community Council, to initiate a review of relations between member states and South Africa; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The Foreign Ministers of the 12 regularly discuss the situation in South Africa at their meetings. The next such meeting will take place on 16 June. Foreign Ministers of the 12 will continue to meet to review policy during the British Presidency.

Mr. Cox: Is the Foreign Secretary aware that he, as the President of the EEC Council, will have enormous influence on the attitude of the other 11 members? As the situation worsens week by week in South Africa, and in view of the comments on the attitude of South Africa by the Eminent Persons Group, what else has to happen in that country before the Government start to give decisive leadership against the actions and attitudes of the South African Government? Are we for ever to be making excuses? Are we for ever to be dragging our feet? When will we give some leadership?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The Government have condemned the apartheid system without reservation and have made it plain that it ought to go and go as quickly as possible. It is to that end that we have supported the work of the Commonwealth Eminent Persons Group, whose report is now in our hands and will be considered. When the EC Foreign Ministers met the front-line states in February this year they made it clear that that group's report deserves consideration by them as well.

Mr. Adley: As my right hon. and learned Friend's presidency will, as he has just said, coincide with the publication of the Eminent Persons Group's report, will he give himself the priority of doing his best to align the policies of the EEC, the Commonwealth and Her Majesty's Government.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: As my hon. Friend will have noticed, the positions adopted by the Community at Luxembourg last September, and subsequently by the Commonwealth in the following month, were closely in line with each other.

Mr. Healey: Now that the Commonwealth Eminent Persons Group has reported that no progress is likely to be made towards a peaceful settlement in South Africa unless the external powers impose new sanctions on the Botha regime, will the Foreign Secretary persuade the Prime Minister to abandon her pig-headed opposition to sanctions, which has identified Britain as the only protector of apartheid in the outside world, has split the European Community and now threatens to break up the Commonwealth?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The right hon. Gentleman's comment is characteristically inaccurate. The European Community's position has been the common position since September last year. The Commonwealth's position has been the common position since last October. It is important that full and careful consideration should now be given to the report of the Commonwealth Eminent Persons Group. We all share the common aim of bringing about an early end to apartheid in South Africa and, if possible, of achieving that without violence through a process of dialogue.

Mr. Dalyell: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In a week when the luck of the ballot gave Ministers an opportunity to answer questions legitimately put by a Select Committee of the House—the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs—is it tactful for the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, the hon. Member for Enfield, North (Mr. Eggar), to lecture my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) on the democratic process?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have already made a comment about that. It is not a matter for me.

Later——

Mr. Corbyn: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is it in order for a Minister, when answering a question in the House, to suggest that Members of Parliament who take part in demonstrations outside the House on matters about which they feel strongly are acting in an undemocratic manner? Is it not the case that democracy means that people have a right to speak freely in the House and also a right to speak freely and to demonstrate outside the House on matters about which they feel strongly?

Mr. Speaker: I am not responsible for what the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn), does outside the House. It is perfectly in order for him to demonstrate if that is what he wishes to do. Every hon. Member takes responsibility for what he says in the House.

Mr. Marlow: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Will it help?

Mr. Marlow: Could you confirm to the hon. Gentleman in case he is in any doubt, that although any hon. Member is entitled to demonstrate and speak freely, he is not entitled to break the law?

Mr. Speaker: Order. That goes for all our citizens.

Mr. Bowen Wells: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Will you confirm that Question Time had been completed by the time you permitted a point of order to be raised by the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell)?

Mr. Speaker: Today Question Time ran slightly over to 3.31 pm

Mr. Wareing: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is it in order for the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) to imply that by taking part in demonstrations my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) has been involved in illegal activities? I understand——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have already dealt with that matter.

Mr. Corbyn rose——

Mr. Speaker: Further interventions do not help. I have given the hon. Gentleman my protection. What else does he want?

Mr. Corbyn: I am deeply grateful for your protection of democratic rights inside and outside the House, Mr. Speaker. I am sure you would also like it to be placed correctly on the record—because the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) obviously reads the headlines, not the stories—that I have not been charged with any offence arising from any actions that took place outside the Old Bailey on Monday morning.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Let us get on with something that is my responsibility.

Mr. Frank Cousins

3.33 pm

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): I hope that it will be in order, Mr. Speaker, briefly to place on record the sense of sadness that many hon. Members will feel at the death this morning near Chesterfield of a former Member of Parliament and Minister, the Right Hon. Frank Cousins, who was a distinguished member of the trade union movement and a warm and kindly man whose loss will be sadly regretted by those who knew him and worked with him.

Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Crossbows (Restrictions)

3.36 pm

Mr. Don Dixon (Jarrow): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to restrict the sale of crossbows and make their sale to minors a punishable offence.

I appreciate that this issue has been raised many times by hon. Members on both sides of the House. Indeed, I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Plymouth, Drake (Miss Fookes), who has been foremost in the fight to have something done about these weapons.

The matter was drawn vividly to my attention last August when a constituent, Mr. Richard Docherty, brought to my office in Jarrow a crossbow which had been bought in a hobby shop in South Shields by his 15-year-old brother, Adrian. On seeing it, Mr. Docherty immediately took the weapon from his brother and tried it out in the garden. From 15 yards the steel arrow penetrated a piece of wood to the depth of 1 in, which is easily enough to kill a person at that range.

The weapon was manufactured by Barnett International of Wolverhampton, and it claimed on the package to be the most powerful crossbow manufactured in the world. This lethal weapon—I cannot describe it otherwise—had been sold in a hobby shop to a 15-year-old boy.

On 5 September 1985 I wrote to the Home Secretary, drawing his attention to this alarming and dangerous position which, in my opinion, could lead to fatal accidents, and urging him to take immediate action. On 30 September I received a reply from the Minister of State, who pointed out that the Prevention of Crime Act 1955 makes it an offence to possess any offensive weapon, including a bow or crossbow, without lawful authority or reasonable excuse. He went on to say:

"Our view, which is shared by the Association of Chief Police Officers, is that bows and arrows do not present the same danger to the public as firearms, and that given the extensive restrictions that already are in use, we would not be justified in imposing on the police the substantial extra work load of further controls such as a licensing system would entail."

However, at the end of the letter the Minister said:

"This is an important matter which we shall keep under review, in consultation with the Association of Chief Police Officers."

An article appeared in the Sunday Sun which is a newspaper covering the northern region, spearheading a campaign to have something done about the sale and use of crossbows. It was a constructive article written by the news editor Alistair Baker. The so-called independent review funded by Barnett International, the main manufacturer of crossbows, says:

"Calls for crossbow legislation have been made at frequent intervals. Many originate with newspapers and are based on highly emotional and often irrational statements which have little or no basis in fact. Others originate from Members of Parliament."

That is an insult to every hon. Member who has had representations from constituents.

Since the article in the Sunday Sun appeared I have had letters from many parts of the country citing incidents that have occurred. One of the letters said:

"Two policemen were attacked as they were getting out of the patrol car at Bracknell police station in Berks. One of the two bolts they dodged was fired with such force that it penetrated the station's concrete wall."

Another incident reported to me by letter was described as follows:

"A bolt was fired at an airliner. A Dan Air plane with 44 passengers was about 100 ft off the ground. The bolt penetrated a wing and ripped part of the fuselage."

Those are some of the incidents that have been reported to me and no doubt other hon. Members have received similar reports from their constituents.

On 20 February during Question Time I asked the Home Secretary about these dangerous weapons. He said:

"We are considering the matter carefully and urgently to see whether anything sensible can be done." — [Official Report, 20 February 1986; Vol. 92, c. 467.]

Early-day motion 638, tabled in March by the hon. Member for Drake drew the attention of the House to these dangerous weapons, and was signed by right hon. and hon. Members in all parts of the House.

I consulted my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman), our home affairs spokesman, and gave him copies of my correspondence and copies of the minutes of the Northumbria police authority which had debated this problem after hearing about the incidents in our area. My right hon. Friend wrote to the Home Secretary and in the reply that he received on 16 April the Home Secretary said:

"Particular concern has been expressed recently about the mis-use of crossbows, and I accept that we should look at it again to see if anything further can sensibly be done to try and prevent these weapons falling into the wrong hands."

On 15 April the RSPCA wrote to the Home Office giving all the information it had on crossbow injuries to animals. It said that during the last five years over 100 cases of injuries and deaths were reported to animals and birds and that the numbers were increasing. On 6 May The Mirror had a full page article headed, "Menace of Weekend Rambos." In one part of the article the author talked about "death by mail order". The article said:

"Already crossbows are taking a terrible toll. They can kill a man at 100 yards and are being used by thugs to inflict shocking injury and death on people, domestic animals and wildlife. Police admit that under the present law they are powerless to curb private combat training and the spread of legally-held weapons."

I stress the phrase, "legally held weapons."

I am sure that other hon. Members have also had letters about the terrible incidents that are happening week after week. If something is not done quickly there will be not just one but many deaths. My Bill asks the Government to do something urgently. First, it asks that the use of crossbows should be licensed under the Use of Firearms Act 1968. Secondly, it would amend section 11(1) (b) of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981, to make it an offence to kill any animal with a crossbow and not just wild animals and birds. Thirdly, it would prohibit all mail order sales. Fourthly, it would prohibit sales to all but those over 17.

Something must be done immediately, because if the situation is allowed to go unchecked there will be serious consequences. I hope that the House will accept the Bill and give it a Second Reading.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Don Dixon, Mr. Frank Haynes, Miss Janet Fookes, Mr. Lawrence Cunliffe, Mr. Ron Davies, Mr. Ray Powell, Mr. Mark Fisher, Mr. Tony Banks, Dr. David Clark, Mr. Gregor MacKenzie, Mr. Robin Corbett and Mr. Mark Hughes.

CROSSBOWS (RESTRICTIONS) BILL

Mr. Don Dixon accordingly presented a Bill to restrict and control the sale of crossbows and make their sale to minors a punishable offence: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon 4 July and to be printed. [Bill 176].

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is it in order for the manufacturers of offensive weapons to send misleading information to hon. Members the day before my hon. Friend the Member for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon) introduced his ten-minute Bill? They sought to influence the debate without giving hon. Members a chance to check the information in a report sponsored by the manufacturers.

Mr. Speaker: I am not responsible for any representations that may be made from outside this place to hon. Members.

Social Security

3.45 pm

The Minister for Social Security (Mr. Tony Newton): I beg to move,

That the draft Social Security Benefits Up-rating Order 1986, which was laid before this House on 8th May, be approved.

I understand that it will be for the convenience of the House if we take with this order the four following motions and the prayer in the name of the Leader of the Opposition.

Hon. Members: "Aye."

Mr. Speaker: As that is the wish of the House, we shall be debating as well the following motions:

That the draft Supplementary Benefit Uprating Regulations 1986, which was laid before this House on 5th June, be approved.

That the draft Family Income Supplements (Computation) Regulations 1986, which was laid before this House on 8th May, be approved.

That the draft Child Benefit (Up-rating) Regulations 1986, which was laid before this House on 8th May, be approved.

That the draft Pensioners' Lump Sum Payments Order 1986, which was laid before this House on 8th May, be approved.

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that the Housing Benefits Amendment (No. 2) Regulations 1986 (S.I., 1986, No. 852), dated 14th May 1986, a copy of which was laid before this House on 16th May, be annulled.

Mr. Newton: These instruments, together with the regulations against which the prayer is made, put into effect the proposed uprating of social security benefits that was announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State in the House on 24 February. They also provide for the payment of a £10 Christmas bonus and make a minor technical change to housing benefits that will ease the burden of administration on local authorities without affecting claimants. The social security benefits uprating order is accompanied by a report from the Government Actuary on the effects of our proposal on the national insurance fund. In accordance with his statutory requirements, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has also made a statement explaining the reasons behind the proposed uprating of mobility allowance.

I shall remind the House briefly of some of the main features of the proposed upratings, which are set out in full detail in the schedule published at the same time as my right hon. Friend's statement on 24 February. Most benefits, including retirement pension, widows' benefit and unemployment benefit, are going up by 1·1 per cent., which accurately represents the increase in prices between May 1985 and January 1986, which was the relevant period for this uprating. This means, for example, that a married couple's retirement pension goes up from £61·30 to £61·95, and that for a single person from £38·30 to £38·70 a week. The long-term rate of supplementary benefit and the housing benefit needs allowance will go up by the same cash amount as the relevant contributary benefit. Child benefit will go up by 1·4 per cent. from £7 to £7·10 a week, and mobility allowance will be increased in line with the retail price index to £21·65 a week. I make it clear that the increase in mobility allowance has come at a time when the cost of transport, which is one of the elements that needs to be taken into account, fell in the relevant period for the uprating.

As the House knows, one important feature of the uprating is that it covers a period of only eight months instead of the normal period of a year. This arises from our intention, which has been almost universally welcomed, to change the annual social security uprating cycle from November each yeat to April each year, so that the benefit year is brought into line with the tax and national insurance year and with the time at which local authority rent and rate alterations normally occur. When it is completed, this change will avoid a great deal of unnecessary confusion and difficulty to all concerned, not least, as many hon. Members will know from their postbags and advice bureaux, among pensioners who have suddenly found their tax codes adjusted in the middle of the tax year following the pension increase.

In this transitional year, that problem will be avoided by the provision that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has included in the Finance Bill, which means that the pension increase that the uprating order will bring about in July will not be subject to tax in the present tax year of 1986-87. Therefore, the pattern is this. Last November there was a normal annual uprating based on the measured increase in prices from May 1984 to May 1985. This July there will be a further uprating after only eight months, based on the rise in prices in the eight months from May 1985 to January 1986. In April 1987 there will be another uprating, again after only eight months, based on the increase in prices in the eight months from January 1986 to September 1986. Thereafter, there will be annual upratings in April each year. At every stage, pensioners are being compensated for the actual increase in prices that has taken place using the latest actual figures available when the uprating announcement has to be made in order to implement it on time.

It follows from what I have said that the 1.1 per cent. figure on which the present uprating is based, being related to price increases over eight months rather than 12, cannot be compared with annual rates of inflation, as some have sought to do. But as well as the shorter period involved, this figure undoubtedly reflects an achievement that of itself is of great importance to pensioners and other social security beneficaries — the Government's success in cutting back the rate of inflation.

If the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) is expecting me to apologise for this uprating, he has another think coming. Nothing in decades has done as much harm to pensioners as the inflationary surge created by the Labour policies of the 1970s. Nothing has been more important to the financial welfare of retired people than what the present Government have done to bring inflation to its lowest level for nearly 20 years, and nothing is more important to their long-term well-being than that this achievement of steadier prices should be maintained.

In a world of uncertainty I am willing to make two clear predictions. One is that if the hon. Member for Oldham, West were let loose to spend as he promises, we should have the inflation back. The other is that, when he comes to speak, we shall hear nothing whatever of the context in which these uprating orders should properly be placed.

Let me sum up this part of my speech by making six sinple points. First, pension and other increases come four months earlier than usual with this uprating. Secondly, when taken together with the increase last November, they mean that the pension for a married couple will be increased by £4·65 a week in less than a year. Thirdly, there will be another increase only months later, thus bringing three increases in a period that would normally have seen only two. Fourthly, those increases come with greater price stability than we have seen for decades. Fifthly, they help to give us a more sensible framework for further increases in the future. Sixthly, they are fully in line with our firm and continuing commitment to maintain the pension's value.

With the forthcoming increase in July, the value of the pension will have increased by some 98·5 per cent. since the last uprating before the present Government came into office, and over the same period the rise in prices is expected to have been something around 92 per cent. There has therefore been a real increase in pensioners' purchasing power. In a period when the number of pensioners has itself risen by 850,000—from just over 8·5 million to just under 9·5 million—that is no mean achievement. On the contrary, it is one in which the Government can and do take pride.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): It might be helpful to reinforce the point that my hon. Friend made about inflation, given that the Labour Opposition seem to be bent on policies that will increase inflation yet again with devastating effects on elderly people. Do not a large number of elderly people save for their old age and retirement, and with the sort of policies that the Opposition have pursued in the past, and will wish to pursue in the future, we shall again have very heavy rates of inflation which will mean that year after year swathes of hard-earned savings will be taken from these people by such an uncaring Government?

Mr. Newton: My hon. Friend has emphasised the point in words more eloquent than I can command, and I can only agree with everything that he said.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): I do not want to tackle the Minister on changing the date of the general uprating and the effect that that must have if a series of upratings quickly follow each other. Clearly, the size of the increase will be much smaller than if it were to be done on an annual basis, and I believe that the Government have difficulty in convincing people that they are being generous and fair.

I expect that the Minister has seen the Child Poverty Action Group brief. The CPAG does not dispute the calculation for the eight-month period. However, it says that, given the dramatic fall in inflation during the period in which the calculations were made, a married pensioner couple on supplementary benefit will lose about £8·80 over the whole year—almost as much as the Christmas bonus. Do the Government intend to make that up by doubling the Christmas bonus this year?

Mr. Newton: I shall make two points, one rather aggressive and one more in tune with the way in which the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) put his argument. First, under the last Labour Government, pensioners twice lost their Christmas bonus, while this Government have written the Christmas bonus firmly into the law. Secondly, no doubt to my disadvantage, I have not so far been vouchsafed the brief and I am hesitant to be drawn into comment without seeing the basis on which the figures are calculated. As things turned out, because of the falling inflation rate the 7 per cent. increase in pensions last November was larger than the increase in inflation which proved to have taken place by November. The increase was related to the increase in prices over the year until May.

One can play games with statistics, but I am glad that the hon. Member for Birkenhead has acknowledged that the pension upratings have at every stage been firmly and fairly based on the measured increase in prices over a historic period at the latest date available to carry the upratings through.

Mr. Field: When the Minister is blessed with a copy of this brief, will he open conversations with outside parties as well as hon. Members on whether the Government have acted totally fairly in changing the dates for the upratings?

Mr. Newton: I shall of course undertake to look at the CPAG brief and to consider any points that arise from it. I shall now give way to the hon. Member from the housing benefit world.

Mr. Nick Raynsford (Fulham): I want to ask a question relating to the Minister's earlier remarks about the increase in the value of pensions in this Government's lifetime. What would be the pension value now if the increase in the pension had been related, as it was under the previous Labour Government, to the increase in earnings or inflation, whichever was the greater? By how much are pensioners now worse off because of that unlinking?

Mr. Newton: If I were to be drawn in that way I should want to give the figures for the increase in the national insurance contributions which would have to take place, the numbers of additional people who would be made unemployed as a result and the increase in inflation, which would create hardship for pensioners by a different route.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): On the so-called well-being of pensioners, is the Minister satisfied with the way in which applications for exceptionally severe weather payments were made in Scotland and elsewhere?

Mr. Newton: The Department did all that it could to make clear the system for exceptionally severe weather payments and to process applications as efficiently as possible. There are a series of anxieties about the working of that regulation and the Government are reviewing the operation of the scheme to see what changes, if any, are required.

Dr. Godman: The Minister allowed my hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) to put a supplementary question, and I should like to do the same. A goodly number of pensioners have already approached me about the circumstances surrounding the regulation for next winter. What is the probability of a change in the working of the regulation to deal with the very severe weather that we shall experience in Scotland next winter?

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman's confidence in his weather forecasting is greater than mine and of forecasters generally. I hope that we shall not have a third successive winter like the last two. Whether or not we have a severe winter, we have made it clear that we are looking again at the regulation in the light of the two winters' experience, which was not entirely satisfactory. I cannot make a definite commitment about the outcome of our investigations, but I am aware of the anxieties which the hon. Gentleman has properly expressed on behalf of his constituents. I do not dismiss those anxieties.

Several Hon. Members rose—

Mr. Newton: This is a relatively short debate. Although, with my customary good nature, I am giving way to all and sundry, there must come a point at which I allow the hon. Member for Oldham, West to have his say—unpalatable though that will be to me.

Mr. Frank Field: When visiting our constituents, many of us have noticed that, because of the poor weather, they are still using their heating. Is it not during the summer months that many pensioners and families hope to make savings on their fuel bills towards their winter fuel bills? To what extent will the Government take that into account both when making changes in the weekly additions for heating and in their flexibility on severe weather payments?

Mr. Newton: If the hon. Gentleman is inviting me to go down a path whereby exceptionally severe weather payments are paid regularly throughout the year, I am sure that he will understand my hesitation in commenting too far. However, I note his point.

Several Hon. Members rose—

Mr. Newton: I think that perhaps one of my hon. Friends deserves an opportunity to intervene. I hope that he will ask a more helpful question.

Mr. Tony Favell (Stockport): Indeed, I have a helpful question. Is not the greatest help that we can give to old age pensioners for their fuel bills to hold down inflation and fuel bills—and, indeed, even reduce them—not only during hard weather in Scotland but throughout the year?

Mr. Newton: I very much agree with my hon. Friend. Indeed, during recent weeks it has been striking that there has been held out the possibility of lower fuel bills. I invite Opposition Members to cast back their minds to the last time that that happened.

I wish to make one general and one specific point before I sit down. The general point is that we have not, on this occasion, followed the practice of using different formulae for uprating the different main elements of the benefits system. In particular, the uprating of supplementary benefits has been kept in line with the cash increases in the relevant contributory benefits so as to minimise the problem of people being floated on and off supplementary benefit by tiny variations of a few pence between the supplementary benefit scale rates and the rates of other benefits received by supplementary beneficiaries.

I do not put that before the House in anything other than a spirit of pure pragmatism. We thought that with three upratings in 16 months it was sensible neither for claimants nor for the administration of the system to shuffle people on and off supplementary benefit on each occasion. For similar pragmatic reasons, the regulations do not provide for general changes in the additional amounts paid with supplementary benefits, but only for increases in the adult and children scale rates, the various personal expenses rates and the limited number of additional requirements, but including — this is very important—the higher rate of heating addition that goes to the very elderly, the severely disabled and those with homes that are especially difficult to heat. That heating addition is increased from £5·45 a week to £5·55 a week.

We have adopted a similar approach — this will interest the hon. Member for Fulham (Mr. Raynsford) —to housing benefit needs allowances, partly to avoid changes in other benefits triggering changes in housing benefit and partly because this year the timing of the uprating period meant that it was not possible to apply straightforwardly the normal housing benefit uprating formula, which is of such arcane complexity that I suspect that only the hon. Member for Fulham, to whom I pay full credit, is fully conversant with its ins and outs. However, I do not want that to be seen as an encouragement to him to deploy his expertise at length this afternoon—

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. John Major): Hear, hear.

Mr. Newton: It is obvious that my hon. Friend's enthusiasm for that prospect is even less than mine.

The arrangements set out in these uprating regulations represent what we believe to be a practical compromise that will cause the minimum of administrative problems for local authorities and beneficiaries alike.

My more specific point, which again is connected with housing benefit, relates to the Housing Benefits Amendment (No. 2) Regulations 1986, which contain some provisions apart from those that simply uprate the housing benefit needs allowances. Those other provisions relate to benefit periods—the period of time for which a housing benefit award is allowed to run before it has to be reviewed by the local authority.

The maximum benefit period for a pensioner is usually 12 months and for a non-pensioner seven months. The existing regulations embodying those benefit periods were drafted with annual upratings in mind and local authorities have always planned their review of cases accordingly.

The pattern of upratings during this period of faster and more frequent than usual upratings would cause many local authorities considerable operational difficulties by requiring them to review the circumstances of claimants twice within a relatively short period and at considerable administrative cost. At the request of local authorities, therefore, we have agreed to ease the benefit period regulations to avoid that. The regulations in question include that beneficial change.

I remind the House that even this uprating, after a period of only eight months, will cost some £420 million in a full year, in addition to the £2,000 million cost of last Noven ber's uprating. Total spending on social security will thus stand at almost £43 billion in 1986-87, which is more than 30 per cent. of all public expenditure. That is a massive sum in anyone's book, and a clear demonstration of the Government's commitment to fulfil our obligation to pensioners and others depedent on social security benefits.

In view of what the hon. Member for Oldham, West may want to say in a few moments—I guess that it will include fairly repeated use of the word "cuts"—I must say that the broader context in which this occurs, as is shown in the recent public expenditure White Paper, is that between 1980-81 and 1985-86, far from falling in real terms, social security expenditure rose by £9,500 million in real terms—a real increase of more than 30 per cent. That includes — with many other factors, as I acknowledge — an improvement in support for low-income families in work, a number of important improvements for disabled people — including a real increase in the mobility allowance, the introduction of the severe disablement allowance and the abolition of the invalidity trap—significantly increased help with heating costs for the less well-off, abolition of the married women's half test, which did so much injustice to a number of women, and, not least, that real increase in pensions—and for almost a million more pensioners.

It is not a record for which I will apologise to the House; it is a record that I put before the House with pride. I invite my hon. Friends to endorse the motion and to reject the Opposition prayer.

4.7 pm

Mr. Michael Meacher (Oldham, West): A few weeks ago the Top Salaries Review Body report was published. The batch of social security orders that we are debating might well be described as the bottom salaries review body report. It certainly highlights the huge contrast in treatment meted out to pensioners, to mothers on child benefit and to unemployed families on supplementary benefit when compared with the plush and velvet glove handling of top civil servants, top judges and top military officers.

For the latter in the elite ranks of society the increase this year is £46 a week. For the average-paid worker, earnings this year will rise by £14·50 a week. For low-paid workers, such as those in the ancillary grades in the National Health Service, the increase currently on offer is about £3·25 a week. For a pensioner in retirement, the increase proposed is just 40p a week. For mothers on child benefit, it is precisely 10p a week — an amount so piffling that I suspect most people would scarcely bother to stoop down in the street to pick it up.

I think that the message is not lost on Ministers. I have not before heard the Minister in quite such a defensive mood as he was today. Perhaps he protests too much. I listened to all his caveats, and there could scarcely be a more eloquent testimony of this Government's obsession with one law for the rich and another for the poor.

The Government argue that they have increased pensions and benefits — the Minister, predictably, brought forward the argument today — strictly in line with the retail price index over the relevant period. So they have. That is the reason for the minuscule increases. The Government's argument is wholly fallacious. There is no statutory requirement that benefit increases should be limited to the RPI over the review period. All there is is a floor, a statutory minimum, for increases in benefit. The Government have said from time to time that they would like to improve the basic pension in real terms. In 1980, the Secretary of State for Social Services stated explicitly that it was the Government's intention to allot pensioners a share in rising national prosperity. This year, when the retail price index increase is so minute, the Government were offered a perfect opportunity to achieve that alleged intention. They have ostentatiously turned it down.

This year's increase is the most insulting one for decades. It is worse than that. The Government, by changing the operating periods this year, have cheated pensioners out of a bigger increase that they would have received if the uprating periods had remained unchanged. I shall explore that point which was made earlier. If the uprating had taken place at the normal time in November 1986, single pensioners would have received double the extra cash from a 4 per cent. increase paid for only four months thereafter up to the April 1987 changeover than they will receive under today's uprating from a 1 per cent. increase paid for eight months until April 1987.

The Secretary of State, when he introduced the changes in the uprating periods, chose to present them in terms of simplification, as he so often does. Pensioners have learned from bitter experience that whenever the Government speak of simplification they generally mean a cut. I will not apologise for the use of that word because that is exactly what people's experience is. The present position is no exception. As I said at the time of the announcement of the uprating arrangements on 24 February, the Government's sleight of hand with the arrangements will mean a loss to pensioners of around £120 million, which they will not recover.

The new arrangements matter in view of other aspects of Government policy on pensioners. The critical point in the debate is that, every year, the break in the upratings link with earnings which the Tory Government carried through in 1980 bites ever deeper. The loss grows much more in years in which earnings significantly outstrip prices. This year is a prime example. Earnings are rising at about 7·5 per cent. compared with prices which are rising at about 3 per cent. In other words, if the Government had not broken the link with earnings, and if they had not fiddled the uprating period, the pension increase this year would have been more than double, as it would under Labour's formula, even for the full year. That is a significant difference.

Mr. Martin M. Brandon-Bravo (Nottingham, South): I do not think that the House disputes what Labour party policy was eight years ago. Can the hon. Gentleman guarantee that that policy would not have changed had the Labour party been in office for the past seven years? His party's track record on pensions, the Christmas bonus and the real cuts in the National Health Service might lead people to believe that the Labour party ditched that policy long ago.

Mr. Meacher: It is a bit rich for the hon. Gentleman to challenge us on our record on the National Health Service. If he had considered the views of the electorate on cuts in the National Health Service, he would not have taken that as an analogy. I invite him to listen to the end of my speech when I shall make absolutely clear the full assurance that he seeks, perhaps contrary to what he expects.

The exact figures regarding the earnings link have been provided by the Library. Since the Minister was so coy about the figures, I shall cite them. The statistical section of the Library calculates that if the link had not been broken by the Government in 1980, the single pension, which is £38·30 a week, would have been £42·30 — exactly £4 a week more. The married pension, which is £61·30 a week, would have been £67·60 a week—£6·30 a week more. For millions of pensioners who are forced to eke out their lives never far from want or financial hardship, those are substantial and serious losses.

The size of the loss to pensioners can be seen from the fact that it represents savings to the Government this year at the expense of pensioners of no less than £1·8 billion. That is the total value of the cut in pensions this year as a result of the break with the earnings link.

Mr. Newton: As the hon. Gentleman has accused me of being coy, can he tell me whether the Library has also calculated what increase there would have been in national insurance contributions, how many more people would have been placed out of work as a result, and how much higher the rate of inflation would have been if we had gone down that track?

Mr. Meacher: Coming from a Government which has tripled the rate of unemployment, that is another pretty rich question. As the Minister knows only too well, we are talking about transfer payments between the working population and those who are retired. I think that the Minister knows that we would have run a different kind of economic policy — not the kind of monetarist contractionary policy which has produced a level of manufacturing output that has still not reached its 1981 level. Out of that extra output, it would have been relatively easy to pay a significant increase in pensions.

The link with earnings was instituted by the Labour Government in 1975. That is the fundamental reason for the huge difference in the pensions record between the Labour Government and the Tory Administration. In six years of Labour Government, the pension increased by 20 per cent. in real terms. In seven years under the Tory Government the pension has increased by just 3 per cent. in real terms. I suggest that the difference between the parties in terms of priorities for the pensioner could scarcely be plainer than those figures show.

Mr. David Lightbown (Staffordshire, South-East): Can the hon. Gentleman say what the rate of inflation increased by in the period that he is stressing pensions have increased?

Mr. Meacher: The hon. Gentleman has missed the point that what matter to pensioners is the overall increase in their income after taking account of inflation. I do not know whether he knows the meaning of the words "in real terms". "In real terms" means after taking account of inflation. The inflation rate, at 26 per cent. in Labour's worst year, was too high, as was 22 per cent. in the Tory Government's worst year. Taking account of both of those facts, pensions increased six or seven times more in real terms under Labour than they have, alas, under the present Government. That is the key point.

Mr. Michael Forsyth (Stirling): Can the hon. Gentleman say what happened to the savings in money that pensioners had put aside in real terms?

Mr. Meacher: The same thing happened regarding the too-high rate of inflation in 1975 as happened regarding the too-high rate of inflation in 1981. Of course, inflation damages pensioner savings. We accept that there is a need to reduce the rate of inflation for that reason. Pensioners with significant amounts of savings are in the minority. The real point for the majority of pensioners is the real increase in pension over and above inflation. The record of the present Government is tenuous compared with the record of the Labour Government. In no other respect is the difference between the parties so stark.

It is proposed this year to pay the pensioners' Christmas bonus at a rate that has been unchanged for 14 years. If the £10 rate paid in 1972 had been uprated each year—no matter which party was in power—in line with prices, it would now be no less than £44. I submit that, apart from the huge shrinkage in value to pensioners because the bonus has been kept at the original £10 rate, there is another strong reason why the Government should increase it this year. Each year until now, the annual pension increase has been paid in the month before Christmas. Pensioners therefore have some extra resources with which to meet Christmas costs and some protection against increasing winter fuel bills. This year, that extra pension increase, which is now being paid in July, will not be available as a new increase to pensioners. That is why the failure to increase the Christmas bonus this year—when it has already lost more than three quarters of its real value since 1972 and when this year's pension increase is merely a pathetic 1 per cent.—is so regrettable.

Therefore, our charge is that the Government are treating pensioners extremely shabbily. Of course the Government state that they cannot afford to do more. They always say that. But they can certainly find big money for other, favoured causes. There is a great deal of talk during the run-up to the general election about the Government cutting the basic rate of income tax from 29 per cent. to 25 per cent. That would cost nearly £5 billion. If such amounts can be found, why are pensioners fobbed off with this cheap and insulting option of a 40p pension increase?

Then there is the £3·64 billion—the Treasury's figure — by which taxes have been cut since 1979 for the richest 5 per cent. That is twice as much as would be needed to restore the earnings limit for pensioners. Why should directors on £30,000 or more a year get a huge cash bonanza while pensioners are left out in the cold, literally as well as metaphorically?

It is all a matter of priorities. Our priority, as we have demonstrated, is for the pensioner. The Government, as they demonstrate each year, are for the wealthy and the privileged. By contrast, we shall take back the £3·64 billion which has been handed out to the rich and distribute it instead to the beneficiaries — perhaps I should say victims — of these social security measures. We shall increase the single pension by £5 a week and the married pension by £8 a week.

Mr. James Couchman (Gillingham): When?

Mr. Meacher: It shall be done in the first Labour Budget. We shall increase child benefit by £3 a week. We shall extend the long-term rate of supplementary benefit to all of the long-term unemployed. All of those major improvements for people on some of the lowest incomes can be afforded without any increase in taxation for 95 per cent. of our people. That can be done simply by making the top 5 per cent. hand back what they should never have been given in the first place.

Mr. Frank Field: I am sure that people outside the House will be following this part of the debate more carefully than most of our debates. My hon. Friend has referred to the Labour commitment of a £3 a week increase in child benefit. Is the Labour Front Bench giving a clear commitment that that increase will be given in the first year of the next Parliament?

Mr. Meacher: Yes. They are all straightforward, redistributionable changes, which we intend to make in the first year in our first Budget.

Mr. Favell: My hon. Friend the Minister for Social Security said that the bill to the nation for the uprating will be £420 million. If the hon. Gentleman were standing at the Government Dispatch Box, what would his bill be?

Mr. Meacher: Clearly, the hon. Gentleman was not listening. My point was that we will take back the £3·5 billion, or slightly more, that has been handed out in tax cuts—income tax, capital transfer tax and capital gains tax, the abolition of the investment surcharge to the richest 5 per cent. of our society—and use that money to pay the pensioners, the mothers with young children and the long-term unemployed. We believe that those are the right priorities, and we shall soon take that message to the nation.

Our second major objection to these measures concerns the 10p increase in child benefit, which is derisory. We object to it for several reasons. First, it makes no effort to restore the 35p cut made last year—a cut to mothers of £175 million in real terms. Secondly, the Prime Minister again trumpeted recently her support for a family policy; yet this tiny increase of 10p shows that her actions belie her words. Thirdly, there is no commitment to index child benefit in line with prices, let alone earnings. The Government Whips organised a filibuster a few weeks ago to prevent the proposal of the hon. Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) from even being debated. That reveals the depth of the Government's opposition to any such notion. Fourthly, there is no assurance that the extra £64 million expenditure on child benefit—due to a reported underestimate of the number of children—will not lead to cuts in other benefits or child benefit, as the Government's record might lead one to suspect. I should be pleased to allow the Minister to intervene if he wishes to deny that.

Mr. Newton: It is simple. The £64 million to which the hon. Gentleman refers and which I think surfaced in a report in The Guardian is additional expenditure that was incurred in 1985-86. Obviously, there can be no question of compensating changes to offset expenditure that has already been met.

Mr. Meacher: I am glad to hear that. That will be a welcome announcement, given the suspicions that we hold for genuine reasons, that that type of overrun is always met by corresponding cuts.

Fifthly, over the past 25 years, the fiscal system has moved steadily against families with children. No attempt is being made this year, when there is such a small increase, to reverse that. That is a great pity. Sixthly, and most importantly, bearing in mind that child benefit is widely agreed by both sides of the House to be by far the most effective device to remedy family poverty, it is surely tragic that the Government apparently still intend to phase it down in favour of family credit, which is footling by comparison.

In case I am unfair about this—I should be glad to give way to the Minister again—I ask this one modest question: Will the Minister give an assurance that the real value of child benefit will be maintained at least until 1988? Would the Minister like to give an assurance on that point?

Mr. Newton: All I can do is give the hon. Gentleman the assurances that we have already given and have shown by uprating child benefit in the motions. We continue to attach great importance to child benefit as a universal benefit normally payable to mothers, but we shall continue to take decisions about child benefit in the context of policies as a whole, including the universally supported desire to do more for low-paid families with children, whether in or out of work. That involves from time to time taking decisions about the balance.

Mr. Meacher: That is a carefully worded answer. The implications are clear—we can expect either a freezing or a small increase in child benefit, as there was last year. That is a very unwise decision.

I turn now to the general uprating implicit in these motions. I have already referred to the fact that the switch to a July uprating means a loss to claimants in general over the year. My hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) made the same point. Although it may not be a large loss, the real point is that this year there should not be a loss at all because, at this point, the country can afford a more generous uprating.

With average earnings now rising at 7·5 per cent. a year, as I have said, fully six percentage points above the tax and prices index, it is only fair that the poor and the weak should obtain the same benefits as the rich and the strong. A benefit uprating in line with earnings rather than prices would have been a tangible expression of that sentiment and it would have been supported by the majority of the electorate. When asked whether priority should be given to a 1p cut in the basic rate of tax in the Budget or to increasing benefits for the poor, a recent poll I saw showed that 61 per cent. favoured an increase in benefits compared with 48 per cent. who favoured the tax cut.

I would like briefly to add two other points on housing benefit. This year—the Minister made brief reference to this—supplementary benefit and needs allowances have not been increased by the formulae the Government introduced in 1982. The supplementary benefit formula would have given an increase of 1·2 per cent. Instead, the pension uprating formula has been applied, which yields 1·1 per cent. The difference is, of course, marginal but I would say that it is all the more symbolic for that. If the difference between the two formulae is minute, why do the Government always unerringly choose the lower one rather that the higher one?

No new awards of the supplementary benefit non-householder rent addition will be paid to persons under 25 after July. I realise that that is an order that will come before the House later, so I am making no more than a reference to it. However, it is relevant when we discuss supplementary benefit. I believe that that is a retrograde step. It will further erode the independent status of young people and it is to be condemned as another example of the creeping implementation of the social security review before the Bill is even through Parliament and as another device to save money on transitional protection.

These are not dry or routine social security orders, as I think that the Minister tended to introduce them. We are debating the incomes and livelihood of millions of Britain's poorest families. We will certainly not vote against any improvements proposed in their standard of living, however meagre or limited we might believe them to be. However, I want to put firmly on the record that the incoming Labour Government, which we shall soon see, will take a radically different and more just view of the proper distribution of this nation's wealth between rich and poor. Indeed it is because all of those who are the subject of these orders today — the pensioners, the mothers, the unemployed and the low paid—have a vote that that Labour Government will not be long in coming.

4.32 pm

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams (Kensington): I have a feeling that a number of hon. Members were not certain what the nature of the debate would be when they came into the Chamber this afternoon, because it is extremely difficult to vote against a series of orders and regulations which have the effect of increasing the amount of benefit that will be available to millions of people. Therefore, if the House is to make constructive use of this short debate we should try to focus our minds on some of the longer-range issues behind the system, which has surfaced again this afternoon, where Ministers have to come to the House at stated intervals to recommend changes in the level of benefit that will be available to different classes of people through our various systems for the redistribution of income.

I think that it might be worth while for the House to consider the ways in which we redistribute income and whether these upratings, and the way in which we calculate the right amounts and the people who will be eligible for the benefits, are what we want, and whether this is a permanent system that will remain in place year in, year out. From the speech that we have just heard from the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher), from the Opposition Front Bench, it seems that the Opposition are determined to make major changes. However, they have not escaped the criticism that major improvements in the system have to be paid for from somewhere.

My first point is that when we talk about the redistribution of income we have not only to consider who the money is going to and how much it is to be, but to decide where the money is coming from and who will make contributions to the system.

I think that it is worth considering the basis for the entire redistribution of income, because I want to do something that I have done many times before in the House, which is to emphasise that we must look at the income of the redistributive system as well as the outgoings. That leads me to the same conclusion as I have always been led to before, which is that progressively we must move towards integration of the income tax system, national insurance contributions, national insurance benefits, supplementary benefits and the rest. We must work towards the integration of the tax system and the benefit system so that both sides are seen to be fair and administratively comprehensible and simple.

I do not think that anyone on either side of the House would disagree that, for the majority of citizens, the present system is arbitrary, incomprehensible and a disincentive for the millions, divisive in a way that is socially extremely dangerous and on the verge of administrative collapse. The House cannot be satisfied simply to approve the uprating regulations and allow a situation to continue in which there is general agreement on the underlying state of affairs. I do not think that hon. Members would challenge me on those accusations.

It seems that we have never really clarified our thinking on the basis of entitlement to benefits. We are talking about millions of people who will receive benefit as a result of these measures, but we do not really know precisely why we are giving them the money. Is it because we are trying to provide them with a basic income guarantee that is sufficient to live on? If that is the case, in many aspects the amounts that we are paying will not be enough. Is it because there is an actuarial relationship with the contributions that they have made during the course of their working lives which decrees that certain payments must be made?

That certainly is not so, not just because inflation is making all our figures turn to jelly, but because we have changed the basis of entitlement to claims for pensions, and so on, as the years have gone by, so that what people have paid into the system in the past and what they are paying now and what they are entitled to draw out of the national insurance system have no actuarial relationship whatsoever. Therefore, we are not relying on arithmetic.

I believe that the system can be divided into four. First, there are the universal benefits. Some of them began to be instituted in the 19th century. I am thinking particularly of public education. In the 20th century there have been great strides forward. The National Health Service is a universal benefit, broadly speaking, and of course there is child benefit, which is a universal benefit, which is paid in cash. I think that there is a considerable degree of public dissatisfaction about all the major universal benefits. I do not think that people are happy about the administration of the Health Service, they are not happy about the administration of public education and there is a considerable degree of opinion that child benefit is not at a sufficient level, considering the real cost of raising a child. There is plenty of room for debate on this subject, and the debates are going on.

Secondly, there are the contributory systems. As I have mentioned, the figures have turned to jelly and nobody has any idea of the relationship between obligation and entitlement in national insurance.

Thirdly, there are the means-tested benefits, not just supplementary benefit, but the housing allowances, which differ very much in different parts of the country. I was given an appalling figure in a parliamentary answer a few weeks ago. I asked how many people in this country were living in families which were dependent, in one way or another, on support obtained through proof of need. The answer was 14 million. As far as I am able to ascertain, that number is rising. There can hardly be a more desperately divisive state of affairs than having 14 million people who are dependent on proof of need to sustain their living standards.

The fourth welfare state that we operate—it is less obvious than the others, but none the less real—is the tax concession system, which produces differentiations of hundreds of pounds a year between people with identical incomes on account of their different commitments and marital circumstances.

I have had the feeling for a number of years that no serious thought has been given, either in the Treasury or the DHSS, to the way in which the redistribution of income is to be handled.

Where are we heading? It seems that there is a steadily rising number of people who are dependent on proof of need. I do not think that many Members realise that the figure has risen to 14 million. My interpretation of trends that can be observed is that that figure is likely to rise. In making an effort to provide a minimum income guarantee so that no one slides into destitution we are dependent increasingly on the old-fashioned means test in various forms. This is disastrous. It means that millions know instinctively, or because they have made the necessary calculations, that there is not too much point in working or in saving.

Hon. Members in all parts of the House, and especially those on the Government Benches, know that the success of our economy, and of living together as a society, depends on people recognising the value of thrift and hard work. If 14 million come to realise that there is something wrong with those motives and that they are not borne out by the way in which life treats them in practice, that is disastrous. If it is true that the number in that position is rising steadily, it is a matter that requires the urgent attention of the House.

Mr. Frank Field: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that there is another rather dangerous tendency, which is that of individuals continuing to recognise the value and importance of hard work, but not that of combining hard work with honesty? In other words, they are not declaring their incomes. The more we push people towards means testing, the more we shall increase the incentive to engage in deception.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: That is an important part of what I have described as the approaching administrative collapse. The black economy is attracting people more and more because they are losing their sense of honour as a consequence of the Government's system of redistribution. They know that more and more people are breaking the rules, and they are becoming increasingly disposed to break the rules themselves.

Another trend is reflected in the rising proportion of the population who want to have cash resources of their own. It is possible that this has something to do with long-term social changes, especially, perhaps, with female emancipation. In Victorian times women were willing to be dependent on the breadwinner, the male head of the household, to provide them with the money that they needed or such comforts as they required. They want now to be able to make their own choices. That is a phrase that the Prime Minister uses with considerable effect. People want to be able to make their own choices, but in the life that we lead we must have our own resources and have command over our own finances, if we are to make our own choices. That is one reason why there is increasing pressure for women to have their own special tax relationship. Many do not want to be regarded as chattels or adjuncts of their husbands. They want to have a one-to-one unisex relationship with the tax inspector, and I think that they are right in that.

If there are an increasing number of people who want to have discretion in the way in which they handle their own affairs, we must adapt our administrative system to meet that wish. Hon. Members on both sides of the House know that I am enthusiastic about child benefit. I believe that the rate of child benefit should be increased, and should certainly not be diminished. One of the reasons why it is such a popular benefit and has an almost universal take-up is that it is paid normally to the woman in the household, which allows her to exercise her own discretion and make her own choices, at any rate with that small part of the family's overall resources. The Government are fighting against a trend that will prove to be stronger than the Government if they think that they can eat slowly into child benefit and dimish it. I hope that they will not make that serious mistake.

Perhaps more important is the fact that millions of people are restrained from entering the working population, and even from taking on part-time work, because they will commit an offence if they take part-time work at the same time as drawing various benefits. We must work our way towards a wholesale reform. I am disappointed that the Government do not appear to be doing any fundamental thinking on this subject.

I was a member of the Committee which considered the Social Security Bill, which has now gone to another place. I was even more convinced at the end of our deliberations than I was at the beginning that the Bill did not represent final answers to the various questions which I have posed and was not enough. I could not do more than vote against the Bill. At any rate, hon. Members know what I think.

What are we asking the Government to do? We must not lose sight of the fact — Opposition Members are open to serious criticism because they do lose sight of this — that one of the Government's primary requirements is to secure the good health and expansion of the economy so that there are resources to be distributed. All too often Opposition Members forget that and call for increases in benefits without explaining how the money is to be generated.

Much of what the Government are doing is right, but I believe that the changes that they are making in the tax system and the provisions that they are making for investment are not sufficient. I hope that they will find ways of breaking through the social security system quickly and introducing a radical overhaul of the system and its administration. It is not good enough to continue from month to month and year to year with DHSS officers being required to make more than 90 million manual entries every week to keep the administrative system going. A much more urgent matter than Ministers recognise is to get something done about that appalling state of affairs.

I understand that progress with the computerisation of the pay-as-you-earn scheme is going very well. Much of the hardware is well on the way to being installed. The restraints that have held us back from a radical reconstruction of the system of income tax and social security are being eliminated at a practical level. The development of the necessary software for the pay-as-you-earn system is still taking a long time. The work should never have been embarked upon before thinking had been done about the sort of service that was wanted.

I ask my right hon. and hon. Friends in the DHSS and the Treasury to think again about the way in which the long-term evolution of the redistribution of incomes is heading. I am sure that it will be agreed that as individuals increase their income they cannot face a sharp reduction in their entitlement to benefit. Millions are entitled to benefits through one or another of our various systems, and we recognise that whenever they lose their benefits sharply there is a disincentive to increase their resources beyond that point. Tapering has become the order of the day. Rather than taking away their benefit on a taper, surely it would be simpler to make them contribute more as their incomes rise through the income tax system. Let them retain their benefit and require them to make a greater contribution through the income tax system. The loss of benefit must be partial if there are not to be disincentive effects. Let the loss of benefit express itself through the payment of more income tax. That would avoid the problems that arise when benefit is eliminated stage by stage as someone's circumstances improve. May we have a promise today, or very soon, that the Government will reconsider this problem in the recognition that the various measures which they have brought forward in recent years are not sufficient to meet the case?

4.49 pm

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): I enjoyed listening to the speech made by the hon. Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams). He has a distinguished history and reputation and he argued the case for wholesale reforms. As the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) recognised, the hon. Member for Kensington voted accordingly in Committee. I certainly pay great attention and regard to that.

I agree with many of the arguments presented by the hon. Member for Kensington on the need for wholesale reform. I accept the mild rebuke that he made in the direction of the Opposition Benches about the source of the resources needed to generate the money to enable the redistribution of benefits. I hope that all hon. Members will address that point.

When the Minister of State introduced the debate on the detail of the uprating orders, he mentioned the current context. That is an important element in the equation which we must not ignore.

I begin by admitting that the reduction in the rate of inflation to the present level of around 3 per cent. is a valuable contribution to those people who rely on benefits for their income. However, I am worried about the disparity, which has continued to widen since the Government came to office, between the best-off and the worst-off in our society. I eschew the sophisticated statistics that can be floated about that argument from both sides of the House. I am worried about the distance that now exists. In spite of the Government's best endeavours to try to improve the position, there is evidence that persuades me that the gap between the best-off and the worst-off is becoming worse.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Would the hon. Gentleman be worried if the gap between the worst-off and the best-off was widening if the consequence was that more wealth was created in order to meet the benefits bill, to which he referred at the beginning of his speech? Will he acknowledge that that is happening?

Mr. Kirkwood: That is not happening. We could have an interesting discussion about the relative positions of the lowest 10 per cent. of our society in terms of generating income and their available disposable income and as to whether they are worse off now than at the beginning of the Government's term of office, but I would like to return to my second point in the context of today's debate.

The Government seem to be set on the road to further tax cuts as opposed to the redistribution and increased transfer of payments. The DHSS should make the position clear. The Liberal and Social Democratic parties voted against the 1p reduction in income tax, as the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State will be aware. That is only a partial answer to the problem, but we should go further than that. I do not know how the figures match up, but we must be prepared to face the fact that we may need to maintain levels of taxation to obtain the money to redistribute benefits.

The formulation of the Government's policy on that question is absolutely crucial. I hope that we will hear from the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State when he replies that he will ensure that resources are found even if that involves forgoing the Government's present policy.

Mr. Favell: We never hear the Opposition referring to the question of incentives on these matters. Does the hon. Gentleman accept that tax cuts produce an incentive to work harder and to save more for old age and bad times? The greater the tax, the less incentive there is to work. What does the hon. Gentleman think about that?

Mr. Kirkwood: I agree that a balance must be struck. That balance has gone wrong in terms of the amount of income that we are asking pensioners to live on. I hope that the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State will comment on that.

There is a fear across party lines about the operation of child benefit. The hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) referred to that point and I want to support his comments and those comments made on the matter by other hon. Members, including Conservative Members, in previous debates. There must be a commitment at least to retain the value of child benefit in future. I understand the Minister of State's reply to that point, as he has the Treasury Ministers at his shoulder and he may not be able to go further than that this afternoon. However, I warn the Under-Secretary that if there are cuts, such as the 35p reduction, he will face a major rebellion from the Opposition Benches and from the forces that sit behind him.

I hope that the Under-Secretary of State will be able to clarify matters about the retail price index. That is a rough and crude instrument to measure the increase in prices. Has the Minister had a chance to examine a report commissioned by the Chartered Association of Certified Accountants and carried out by the Institute of Fiscal Studies called "The RPI and the cost of living"? The report reached several conclusions. It stated that the Government had been paying more than they needed in terms of uprating benefits for substantial periods during the past 10 years. To support my argument, the report states that the poorer families in our society suffer more and the real costs of inflation, rather than the statistical calculations, are significantly higher than the general increase in the RPI. I hope that the Department will study the report with care. The Department needs to refine the retail price index in a way that would benefit the least advantaged families in society.

Under what circumstances does the Under-Secretary of State believe that the Social Security Advisory Committee report's recommendations will be implemented when it states that there should be not every year, but occasionally, a linking of increased benefits to earnings so that an inexorable disparity does not appear between the increase in the cost of living enjoyed by people in work and those who are dependent on benefits? There was a case to consider this year for moving towards the average earnings increase.

We have heard that there has been almost a 7·5 per cent. annual earnings increase, which is 6 per cent. higher than the tax and prices index. Can the Under-Secretary of State tell us whether these figures, like the figure of £8·80 annual loss caused by the disposition of the timing of the payments of the increase, will be made good in the round eventually? It is very important that losses sustained because of the timing of the uprating—which was unfair—should be made good.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I have been waiting so long to intervene that I have nearly forgotten my point. However, if the hon. Gentleman is so concerned about wealth creation and finding the resources to meet a decent social security system — which we all want — how does he reconcile that with the view that benefits should be indexed according to earnings if the earnings are over and above the country average? That would be a recipe for creating a benefit system which we could not possibly afford. That is the opposite to what he was arguing for.

Mr. Kirkwood: I do not understand why it is difficult, improper or in any way impossible to increase benefits according to the increased average earnings. If average earnings are increased, the tax take increases and that would mean more money to be redistributed. There is no difficulty about that.

Mr. Forsyth: The difficulty is that, if, as is happening at the moment, the country is paying in wages more than is being earned and we index benefits accordingly, we will have a monstrous bill which will be paid for only in the destruction of other people's jobs and a higher bill which we will not be able to meet. That would be the consequence of the hon. Gentleman's policy.

Mr. Kirkwood: I fully accept that. The hon. Gentleman takes us into public sector pay and price and incomes policies. We would face up to that by ensuring that there is a system that ensures that people do not get paid more than the country can afford.

The hon. Member for Oldham, West mentioned the Christmas bonus, which is being substantially eroded. Do the Government have any plans to try to make it as valuable as it would have been if it had increased in line with prices or earnings? Its value has been largely discounted. Something must be done about that.

The Government could have done a bit more without breaking their back. I am most anxious that the Minister should be prepared to go into the current public expenditure round with some of the issues that I have outlined in the front of his mind so that he will fight for his Department's budget and so that he can redistribute more in future.

5.1 pm

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle (Lincoln): I should like to make my speech in the context of the general background to the proposed increases. It is generally recognised that the Government promised to ensure that benefits would increase at least in line with inflation. What is proposed accords precisely with our promise to the country at the general election, which has been repeated during the past few years.

We should consider the overall level of inflation. The increase in benefits must be related to the increase in prices. There is no doubt that inflation is the greatest threat to people in receipt of benefits. They are generally those who most need support and they are often the weakest. High inflation and rapid price rises undermine people's confidence. When they go to the shops to buy the necessities of life they see increases each day, but the increase in benefits lags well behind price increases, so people do not understand how they can possibly keep up. The elderly who have some savings see high price increases destroying their life's work. Price increases eat away at savings that have been made over many years of work.

Inflation has a bad effect on people who both major parties say they want to help. The hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) was completely wrong to say that inflation does not matter and that the important thing is the increase in benefit after taking account of inflation. He showed a great misunderstanding of the worry caused by inflation. It is a matter of peace of mind. In a period of high inflation, the confidence of pensioners, one-parent families on benefit, the unemployed and people in receipt of housing benefit is greatly affected, as they simply do not know how they will meet increased prices in the shops.

In times of high inflation, the weakest suffer most. That has been proved time and again. It is important to such groups, therefore, that inflation is kept low and that price increases are conquered. There are other effects of high inflation. Declining currency value and rapidly rising prices destroy the morality of a country. We get used to a declining currency and become cynical about it, and we no longer pursue sound values which give hope for the future.

Another effect is unemployment. There is no doubt that the inflation of the 1970s and early 1980s bred unemployment. Businesses found that they could not sell their goods competitively on world markets, and they continually sought more cash to replace stocks to make products. The strains on business, failures and a fall in growth, or even decline, have an inevitable effect on jobs. All those effects of inflation can be seen throughout the country, but it is the weakest who suffer most. That is why the Government should take credit for keeping price rises low, and why their main aim should be the continuing control of inflation.

It is important that people who are in receipt of benefit have confidence in the system that is used to calculate increases. In that respect, I echo what the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) said. Are we certain that the system is as good as it should be? Does it reflect the costs that people on benefit and the elderly have to meet every day? Such expenditure is quite different from that of someone in a well-paid job. I am aware that our statisticians refine the system occasionally, but it should receive continual examination.

We must also consider the economy as a whole. As my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) said, we must pay for the increases. It is no good promising the world. Indeed, it is evil to promise the world when one does not have the means to provide it.

Mr. Marlow: My hon. Friend mentioned increases. Is he aware that, despite the massive increase of last year, the value of child benefit and child tax allowance — the benefits that we give per child—is now £2·70 less than it was in 1955? Whereas there have been increases in some areas, assistance for families with children, especially those with significant numbers of children, is now much less than it was in 1955.

Mr. Carlisle: My hon. Friend has gone back to 1955. I suppose that I must have been in receipt of child benefit then. I cannot recall what the level was. Matters have changed so much that it is not very helpful to go back that far, but I believe that since 1979 the real value of child benefit has increased.

Before my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) made that rather interesting intervention, I was considering the overall economy. When promising massive increases in social security payments, the Opposition have a responsibility to consider what they hope to achieve. They must face the reality of how they will pay for the increases. They have promised increased social security payments and increased expenditure on the industrial front, the Health Service and education. There is not a programme that has not been promised extra money.

My right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary has estimated that to pay just for the Opposition's firm promises would require £40 billion of additional expenditure each year, to be carried on year after year. To pay for that, the Opposition would, for example, have to increase VAT to 42 per cent. Such an increase would have a devastating effect on a whole range of people who receive benefit. If the Opposition do not pay for that expenditure by increasing VAT, they will have to raise the money, if they are honest, by some other form of tax, which will have to be paid by all taxpayers, including those in receipt of benefit. The alternative is to borrow. In that case, inflation and interest rates would increase, with all the evil effects that I have already mentioned.

The Opposition's promises are given blandly, but no doubt with genuine sincerity. However, any analysis leaves one sceptical of them, especially given the havoc that would be wrought on the country's economy if those promises were carried out.

Our record of controlling inflation and of trying to get the economy on a course for growth has not been bad and should not be scorned. My hon. Friend the Minister described how we now spend £43 billion a year on social security. That is 30 per cent. of all public expenditure. All benefits have increased by more than the rate of inflation since 1979. The new benefits have also substantially helped the worst off. As my hon. Friend the Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth) said, one has to tie any increase in social security directly to the economy's ability to earn the resources to make those increased payments.

I now wish to concentrate on the reform of the social security system. We are talking about one of three upratings over 18 months. The uprating will move forward to April. Thus, we are looking not at an annual uprating but at one for a shorter period when the rate of inflation is low. We are honouring our promise. Many of my constituents will welcome the annual upratings when they move forward to April. I have always received many complaints about the fact that the upratings have been delayed until the autumn. We genuinely welcome the move to April.

I also welcome the reform of social security that is being undertaken. It is generally recognised that, despite the thousands of millions of pounds spent on our social security system it is not directed at the right people. For example, it is accepted that one-parent families and families on low earnings have fallen behind. It is right that we should undertake a substantial review of the social security system so that the large resources available are directed to the right people.

My hon. Friend the Member for Kensington, who has given deep thought to this issue, raised an important point, with which I agree, when he said that the present social security system is far too complex. Even when it has been reformed, it will be difficult to understand it. I urge the Government to reconsider the reforms to see whether, with the aid of computers, they can link tax and social security. In this way we could avoid the absurdity of people receiving social security and paying tax. Given the will and the technology that we now have, it must be within our means to devise a much simpler system.

I am glad that I have taken part in the debate, and I shall end by returning to my main theme. Inflation is the worst enemy. Indeed, rapidly rising prices are the worst enemy of all those on social security. If inflation stood at 100 per cent., we could easily double social security benefits annually. That would look very good on paper, and the hon. Member for Oldham, West clearly would not mind that, but I assure him that much agony would be caused to those of our constituents who are on benefit and who are poor. It is they who would suffer most.

The Government's aim to increase social security at least in line with inflation is good. We have honoured our promise. I have no doubt that when the economy generates the necessary wealth those on social security will in turn benefit in a far more stable way, which will give them, not worry, but more security in future.

5.15 pm

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): I am sure that the hon Member for Lincoln (Mr. Carlisle) will understand if I do not take up all the points that he covered in his wide-ranging speech. However, I should like to comment on a few of them. He concentrated on inflation. I hope that hon. Members will read carefully the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher). I thought that for the first time I noticed a much greater realisation of the importance of inflation in terms of both crude politics and votes, and of what it means to our supporters.

I do not follow the line that a Labour Government need worry only about those on statutory benefits. Many of our supporters have only small savings by comparison with the Government's supporters. One could easily construct an argument that those small savings are more important to the saver. Indeed, those of greater means have more expertise available to them and are far more able to protect their wealth than those with small savings.

I therefore took the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West to be very coded. I understood that he was coming round to the view that a Labour Government would not embark on public expenditure policies and discussions on wage levels that would lead to a rapid increase in prices. We need to think that through carefully and to put it with care to the electorate so that those who vote for our package know the price and the responsibilities that will have to be paid by them in seeing that programme through. It will come as no surprise to those who have heard me speak before that I believe that that means that part of our programme must involve policies on levels of prices, wages and salaries. I make no excuse for that. It is crucial. No one in his right mind would want to return to the inflation levels that existed under this Government and under the previous Labour Government.

Rising prices have a terrifying effect on those at the bottom of the pile. The closest analogy is perhaps with totalitarian regimes which want to create such uncertainty that people do not know what will happen to them next. That is the effect of rapidly rising prices on those who have least. I therefore welcome what I understood to be a coded message from my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West. I hope that we shall become clearer as the election approaches.

Mr. Marlow: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Field: The hon. Gentleman may entice me to give way later. Many hon. Members wish to speak in the debate. I enjoy interventions, but I am aware that time is limited.

The hon. Member for Lincoln echoed the comments made by the hon. Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams). It is rare for me to disagree with the hon. Member for Kensington, who is held in an esteem in the House on a par with few other hon. Members. That is not just because of the knowledge which he brings to our debates, but because of the firm resolution with which he is prepared to see those views through in the Lobby, even if it means voting against the Government. It is easy for Opposition Members to do that, but it is much more difficult for a Government supporter.

The hon. Member for Kensington said that we should aim for a system of combining taxes and benefits. I wonder whether that is the best way forward. Those who set the policies for benefits and those who set our tax policies should know what each is trying to achieve. Have we reached the stage when we can move safely towards combining taxes and benefits?

My hon. Friend the Member for Fulham (Mr. Raynsford) will no doubt talk about housing benefit. It is worth remembering that, when that reform was introduced, we were told that it was a simple reform. That simple reform has become a nightmare for our constituents and ourselves. If our ability to understand the world is so limited that this simple reform became such a God-almighty cock-up, what will happen with a big issue such as combining taxes and benefits? Most of us would be resident seven days a week in our surgeries trying to answer queries. I will not support the growing consensus for a combination of taxes and benefits. I want both sides of government to talk to each other occasionally, to understand what their objectives are and not to have contradictory policies.

I shall present in straightforward Tory language some of the arguments which I hope the Government are presenting to the Treasury on child benefit. The DHSS has had and will continue to have a battle with the Treasury over child benefit. That is why, when the uprating statement was made, I welcomed the 10p increase in child benefit. I was mindful of the Government's record the previous year, but, given that the Treasury was aiming for child benefit not to be increased this year so that it could be established that child benefit was not normally increased when other benefits were increased, that was a crucial battle won by the DHSS.

When we debate next week the private Member's Bill to be introduced by the hon. Member for Kensington, we shall have an opportunity to vote on child benefit. Although Ministers may protest otherwise, if many Conservative Members joined us in the Lobby, especially those who have registered their views in early-day motions and in letters to pressure groups in support of child benefit and its automatic uprating, it would massively strengthen the Department's hand with the Treasury.

The arguments that the Department should pursue with the Government in Tory terms are as follows. First, among all benefits, child benefit strengthens the family. The Conservative Government say that they are about strengthening the family, not in a paternalistic way with officials putting their sticky fingers into people's private lives, but by giving them the resources to build the lives that they want. That would add massively to people's dignity.

Secondly, for a Government who believe that they should not interfere with wages, at least not in the private sector, child benefit is important in lessening the pressure for massive wage increases by family wage-earners, who are often men, but sometimes women. Thirdly, the bigger the child benefit, the bigger the incentive to work, for the reasons that were outlined by the hon. Member for Kensington.

Fourthly—this is the flip side of the coin—the bigger the benefit, the easier it is for people to remain honest. I note the decline in standards of honesty in our society, and it is harder for people at the bottom of the heap to abide by public notions of morality than it is for people who have bank balances. It is absurd for us to expect the poor to be more righteous than others. One reason why I want a Government who will campaign against poverty is that poverty is not some warm overcoat in which people happily shuffle round, but an evil that destroys them. That is part of the reason why people behave less honestly than they might otherwise do.

The fifth Tory reason for indexing child benefit along with other benefits is that it maintains tax equity. The only way in which we can ensure that we do not shift the tax burden from single people and childless couples to people with children when we increase personal allowances is to increase the tax-free income of those with children by a similar amount.

The sixth reason is the effectiveness of child benefit in tackling poverty. Although I would have put that at the top of the list, it does not come first on the list of Tory priorities.

Mr. Marlow: Could I add a seventh reason why Conservative Members should support child benefit? That is the paradox that those in work used to receive a child tax allowance. Child tax allowance no longer exists; we have child benefit instead. The reality is that, when there was child tax allowance, Conservative Members would accept its indexation and thought it was right and proper. Now some Conservative Members feel that child benefit should be given only to selected members of society. If we move in that direction, as the hon. Gentleman said, we would be taking money out of the pockets of families and putting it elsewhere. I believe, as the hon. Gentleman believes, that that is no thing for a Conservative Government to do.

Mr. Field: All that I would add to the hon. Gentleman's helpful intervention is that it would not just be taking money from the pockets of families; it would be putting money into the pockets of single people and childless couples. I said earlier that the Government told us proudly that they support the family.

I disagree with the hon. Member for Lincoln on another point. As I walk round Birkenhead, I am not set upon by many people who say that they long for the uprating date to be changed to April. I have had no inquiries about that. The Government are changing the uprating date to April because it is more convenient for them, not for my constituents or those of other hon. Members. That being so, the Government are duty-bound to ensure that, in the changeover to April, no beneficiaries will lose in the process. I do not argue that it is a mean-minded, miserable little uprating. If inflation was a little more than 1 per cent., and we linked benefits to prices, benefits would increase by only a small amount. However, some of my hon. Friends feel strongly on that point. As the change is for the Government's convenience, they are duty-bound to ensure that people will not be made worse off as a result of the move.

The evidence that I presented earlier from the Child Poverty Action Group brief — the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) has a copy with him — shows that there will be a small, but significant, reduction in the increase in benefit as a result of the changeover. A married couple in receipt of supplementary benefit will be a little less than £10 a year worse off. We must tell the Government that losses of that size, which may be unimportant to hon. Members but are crucial to many of our constituents, should be made up. The most effective way of doing that would be to grant an additional Christmas bonus or to introduce a new summer bonus.

5.29 pm

Mr. Michael Forsyth (Stirling): I look forward to studying in the Official Report tomorrow the speech made by the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher). I listened to it carefully, but I could not break the code to which the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) clearly has access, which apparently tells us that the hon. Member for Oldham, West is in favour of keeping down inflation and recognises, if I may say so without embarrassing the hon. Member for Birkenhead, the powerful argument that he advanced that high inflation hurts most the poorest and the pensioners in our society. The name of the game in this debate is not to argue about which Government would give the largest upratings in benefit, but which Government are capable of producing the largest increases in real terms and creating the conditions which enable the private sector to generate the wealth necessary to meet the bills.

When listening to the hon. Member for Oldham, West, I thought he was saying that inflation was not important in considering those who were poorest in our society because they are covered anyway by indexed benefits. At the risk of saying something that has been said many times, the hon. Gentleman—he is not here, but I dare say that he will study the Official Report—would do well to read again the remarks made by the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) who pointed out that inflation is the father and mother of unemployment. While the hon. Member for Oldham, West is happily creating inflation in order to fulfil promises rashly made, he will be putting more and more people out of work, who will present yet further demands upon the social security system.

I want to explore the central part of the argument of the hon. Member for Oldham, West, which was whether it was better to have a system which indexed benefits according to prices or according to earnings. Of course, he said earnings because the Labour party is the caring party and is therefore in favour of providing more. That is the deception which he presents to the House and to the country. The reality is that if we were to embark on that path—to his credit, the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) changed his view half way through his speech, having started off on that path himself — it would result in our having commitments to the poorest in our society which we simply could not meet.

The reality is that even under a Conservative Government, who are determined to control inflation and public expenditure, we are paying ourselves more than we are earning. We are paying ourselves, as we have done for more than a generation, well beyond what we are producing as a nation. If we continue to do so, it will be the poorest who will suffer most and more people will lose their jobs. If we were to follow the prescriptions of the hon. Member for Oldham, West, we would be asking my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer to add to the burden on the wealth-creating sector. We would be penalising those elements in our economy which are capable of generating the resources which we need to meet our obligations.

Mrs. Margaret Beckett (Derby, South): I am listening with great care to the hon. Gentleman, just as I listened with great care to his interventions in the speech of the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood). I should be grateful if he would explain a little more the point that he is making. On the one hand, he is saying that there should be more wealth creation. He raised that first in his point on greater incentives. Therefore, he is presumably arguing that people in work should be paid more and that the tax burden should be less, and so on. On the other hand, he is lambasting people who are in work for being paid too much. It is not clear to me how he reconciles those two sides of his argument. I am sure that he does, but I am fascinated to know how.

Mr. Forsyth: I am grateful to the hon. Lady. I think that I can help her out, and I hope that she will abandon the policies which are based on such ignorance. The position is simple. I am arguing, not for higher pay, but for higher take-home pay by reducing taxation. If the Government succeed, as I am sure they will, in reducing the basic rate of income tax still further, the effect will be that those on average or below average earnings will have higher take-home pay and the pressure on employers to provide inflationary pay increases which are more than has been generated by increases in productivity will be reduced. One of the key reasons why it is important to reduce the burden of taxation on those in work is to moderate wage demands,. If we succeed in moderating wage demands, we shall be more competitive as a country, we shal generate more wealth and, in turn, increase the overall revenues from a lower rate of taxation. That is the first side of the equation.

Dr. Godman: Now we shall move on to privatisation.

Mr. Forsyth: I should be happy to follow the hon. Gentleman down that road.

The crucial part of the argument is surely that to increase Government commitments in the form of increases in national insurance or taxation in line with artificial increases in pay is to store up problems for the future. The gap will be filled only by borrowing or printing money, which in turn will create more inflation, which in turn will mean that more money has to be found to meet the indexing of benefits which are the consequence of a rise in prices. That is a spiral of decline. That is exactly the position in which the previous Labour Government found themselves.

The sheer hypocrisy of the hon. Member for Oldham, West takes the cake. He comes into the Chamber and berates the Government for not increasing the Christmas bonus. I should be happy to see it increased by 10,000 per cent. plus £10 on the levels that were paid by the Labour Government in 1976 and 1977, because a 10,000 per cent. increase on nothing is nothing.

Mr. Marlow: Was there not another misunderstanding in what the hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) implied? I think she was saying that there was no difference between increased pay and reduced taxation because the benefit to the worker is the same, but there is a massive difference. If pay is increased, the cost of production is increased and unit costs are increased. We become less competitive and lose masses of jobs. Is that not one reason why the Labour party seems to be at odds with any understanding of economic policy?

Mr. Forsyth: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I completely support his analysis, although I would not go along with the views that he expressed earlier on child benefit. I shall come to that.

The other extraordinary thing about the views of the hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) on tax cuts—

Mrs. Beckett: I have not yet had a chance to give my views on tax cuts.

Mr. Forsyth: I shall gladly give way to the hon. Lady so that she can give us her views on tax cuts, if she cares to do so, but I understand that the position of her party, which I assume she supports, is that it does not think there should be tax cuts. Indeed, several Opposition Members have argued that tax cuts are irrelevant and that what we should do is help pensioners. They all seem to have forgotten that 2·4 million pensioners in Britain pay tax totalling £2·9 billion, which is 9 per cent. of the total tax take.

Yet again we see an inconsistency in the Opposition's argument, which was clear in the promises made by the hon. Member for Oldham, West. He was busily telling us how he would take back all the money that the Government had given away in tax cuts and use it to fund his promises. He mentioned directors earning over £30,000 a year. If we tax people with earnings of over £30,000 a year at 100 per cent., it will be done once, because on the whole people do not work for nothing, as one of my hon. Friends has pointed out, and that will raise £1·8 billion, which will not get anyone very far down the road towards meeting the cost of the bill which would arise from the promises made this very afternoon alone by the hon. Gentleman. Opposition Members must come to terns with the fact that there are simply not enough of the Tory fat cats whom they dream about to meet the bills which a Labour Government would generate. Indeed, the hon. Member for Birkenhead was moving in that direction in his speech.

Mr. Frank Field: We shall make a start.

Mr. Forsyth: When the Labour party does that, it will end the whole process of wealth creation, making life even more intolerable for those whom it seeks to represent.

Mr. Frank Field: The hon. Gentleman's argument that if we reimpose the level of taxation that existed under the Labour Government we will receive no additional revenue in year two is clearly fallacious, because the Labour Government continued to raise revenue. The hon. Gentleman shakes his head. It is disconcerting to stand up and face the Tory Benches, only to see brightness and light. Normally when I face Tory opponents that is the last thing I expect to see. To correct the hon. Gentleman through the sunlight, we are thinking not of imposing a 100 per cent. tax on incomes above £30,000 a year, but of reverting to the previous level of taxation, which continued to raise a certain sum even under the Labour Government.

The argument that cutting taxation would lead to lower output puts the hon. Gentleman into equal difficulties, because there is not much difference between the growth rate under the Labour Government and that during the whole period in office of this Government. It may be that tax cuts are not the panacea for a relatively high growth rate in the British economy.

Mr. Forsyth: The hon. Gentleman is asking me to resolve a difficulty which exists in the Labour party. The Leader of the Opposition has said that a Labour Government would not increase taxes for those earning less than £30,000—he started with £20,000 and changed the figure to £30,000. Having set those guidelines, I am merely pointing out that if one taxes all earnings above £30,000 a year at 100 per cent. that will raise £1·8 billion, which does not go far towards the £25 billion programme of additional expenditure to which the Labour party is committed. Nor does it go far towards meeting the promises made this afternoon.

I agree with the hon. Gentleman that if one wishes to embark on a programme such as he would wish one must tax people who at present are paying tax at the basic rate. There are 18 million people on or below average earnings who, as it is, face penal rates of taxation. It is not in the interests of the country or of eliminating poverty to increase the tax burden on them which would be the consequence of the policies to which the hon. Gentleman is committed. He must address himself to that.

The hon. Gentleman argues that wealth will be generated despite penal rates of taxation on the rich. That is an ideological difference between us and he will have to work extremely hard to convince me that people who pay 98 per cent. tax, as they did previously, will continue to work within the white economy. I thoroughly agree with the hon. Gentleman's emphasis on declining moral standards and the increase in the black economy. That is a consequence of high taxation, and the hon. Gentleman must face the fact that if the Labour party's policies are pursued people will have a greater incentive to work in the black economy and to make demands on the social security system. The hon. Gentleman raised an extremely good point, but it is one which his party needs to resolve and which it has singularly avoided doing today.

I disagree with what my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) said about child benefit. My hon. Friend the Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon) put it in a nutshell when he asked why we should pay tax-free benefits to duchesses. It is a monstrous waste of money and resources to tax people who pay high marginal rates of tax only to pay their wives child benefit. I am happy to declare an interest, in that I receive child benefit. It is an immense tax-free perk, for which I am grateful, but to have many bureaucrats collecting revenue from, and many others dishing it out to, the same family is not a sensible way to run a country. I would far rather see child benefit being taxed or not being available to those who earn high incomes and pay high marginal rates of tax, and instead being directed to families in greatest need. As an across-the-board benefit it is completely unacceptable at a time when we have finite resources and considerable demands.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: Does my hon. Friend agree that the simplest way to increase the tax burden on people earning high incomes is to increase the higher rates of tax, not to take away their child benefit? To take away child benefit simply means that they are less well off. If one wishes to penalise high earners, which seems to be the gist of what my hon. Friend is saying, the simplest way to do that is to raise their rate of tax.

Mr. Forsyth: Clearly I have picked up some of the code of the hon. Member for Oldham, West, because my message was somewhat different. I am not in favour of increasing the tax burden on anyone. On the contrary, I should like to see it reduced, because that will result in an increase in the wealth generated. I believe that by reducing tax rates we can increase Exchequer revenue, which has been the United States' experience.

My desire to see child benefit not being paid to those on high incomes is not based on a desire to see those people paying higher rates of tax. I simply think that it is madness to have two bureaucracies involved in transferring money from one pocket to the other. Most families with high incomes—I gave the example of duchesses—do not need child benefit to look after their families.

Mr. Frank Field: Fortunately or unfortunately, depending on one's political perceptive, the country is not made up of duchesses. First, there is a difference between making child benefit selective—in other words, only paying it to poor families—and taxing it. There may well be a case for taxing child benefit, provided the revenue goes back into child benefit and increases its value. Secondly, if the hon. Gentleman wants to abolish child benefit—this question was implicit in the intervention of the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow)—how will he maintain tax equity between those with children and those without children? In other words, how does he propose to increase the tax-free income of those two groups on a par? How will he avoid transferring the tax burden to those with children?

Mr. Forsyth: There are opportunities to do that through the new social security system.

Mr. Frank Field: What opportunities?

Mr. Raynsford: How?

Mr. Forsyth: Through family income. [Interruption.] I agree with the hon. Member for Birkenhead that the country is not made up of duchesses. The hon. Gentleman is something of an expert in this area and he knows the figures. He knows that we are paying well over £1 billion in child benefit to people on well above average earnings. I should like to see that money redistributed to those in greatest need. I do not have a strong view about whether that should be done through taxation or by some other process. At present the system is wasteful and creates an unnecessary dependancy.

Mr. Frank Field: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Marlow: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Forsyth: I may be short in the tooth, but I know what I am interested in. I give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Frank Field: The hon. Gentleman says he does not have a strong view on this issue. I do not want to be unkind to the hon. Gentleman, because he has given way to me, but the feeling that I had was that on this matter he did not have a view at all. When pressed to take his argument beyond the slogan, he was hard pushed, to put it politely, to suggest how his alternative would work. I urge him to think carefully after the debate about the points that he is putting to the House and about how in practice his suggestions could be implemented. I do not believe that they could be.

Mr. Forsyth: If the hon. Gentleman is pressing me to express a view, I have to say that I would prefer a tax on child benefit, but that has the great disadvantage that it does not overcome my principal objection, which is that we would still have large numbers of bureaucrats giving out and taking back money. That would mean that less money would be available for the pockets of the families who needed it.

I should like to return to my broad theme, which arises from the speech of the hon. Member for Oldham, West. The Opposition make promises which they cannot possibly fund or keep, and they direct the whole of their energy to misrepresenting the real benefit achievements and the benefits to the Health Service that have been made by the Government.

The most astonishing thing about this uprating is that it costs £420 million, and we are being attacked by the Opposition and by people outside the House over the small percentage increase which arises as a result of our success in reducing inflation. If Britain were ever to be "blessed" with a Labour Administration with a commitment to create inflation of the sort that we heard about from the hon. Member for Oldham, West, the cost of simply meeting the obligations to keep up with prices would be so enormous that the Labour Government would be unable to meet the existing commitments to the benefits system.

The hon. Member for Oldham, West told the House that the Government's record on the Health Service was a disgrace and that it was repudiated all over Britain. To say that shows as much nerve as the nerve that he had when he spoke about the pensioners' Christmas bonus. The last Labour Government made cuts in the Health Service capital programme and cut the spending programme. That is in contrast to the present Government's record. I did not intend to speak in this debate until I heard the hon. Gentleman's speech, but perhaps I could conclude on a lighter note. I obviously missed the code defined by the hon. Member for Birkenhead, but as I listened to the Opposition speeches I was reminded of the lines by Kipling:

> "Dreaming of things they meant to do,
> All complete in a minute or two,
> Something noble and grand and good,
> Won by merely wishing we could."

5.53 pm

Mr. Nick Raynsford (Fulham): I shall confine my remarks to the upratings in the housing benefits scheme and ask for the indulgence of the House for going into relatively complex and difficult calculations. I have to do that because this is a difficult and complex subject. The increase in the needs allowance under the statutory instrument that we are considering is substantially less than it would be if the traditional formula that applied in previous years had been adopted. Therefore, it will be necessary to outline the traditional formula.

The needs allowance that has existed effectively since 1972, when a Conservative Government introduced a rent rebate and allowance scheme, has four elements. The first element is the supplementary benefit long-term scale rate; the second is 40 per cent. of the average council house rent; the third is 40 per cent. of the average rates; and the fourth is 100 per cent. of the average water rates. The logic behind that is that people who receive standard housing benefit, as it is now known, have an income that is generally above the supplementary benefit scale and have to meet a proportion of their rent and rates and 100 per cent. of their water rates. The formula was calculated to try to ensure that they are left in a broadly comparable position to people on supplementary benefit who receive a larger amount of assistance towards those housing elements.

This year the traditional formula has not been applied and the Government have said that they are applying the same increase to the housing benefit needs allowance as they have applied to the increase in the pensions, that is, 40p for a single pensioner and 65p for a couple. Let us leave aside for the moment the fact that that increase is insulting and derisorily small and has been almost universally condemned by people interested in the welfare of pensioners.

The critical question to be asked is: what would the increase in the needs allowance have been if the traditional formula had been applied? This is relatively easy to establish. We know that the supplementary benefit long-term scale rate being put forward by the Government for a single person is £37·95. Forty per cent. of the average council house rent, which is currently £16·57 a week, amounts to £6·63, and 40 per cent. of the average rates, currently around £7·50 a week, is £3, and 100 per cent. of the average water rates is £1·78. That gives a total of £49·36. Allowing for the normal practice of rounding that to the nearest 5p, we arrive at a figure of £49·35. That is the figure for the needs allowance of a single person had the traditional formula been adopted.

Instead of applying the traditional formula, the Government have brought forward a statutory instrument proposing that the actual needs allowance will be £48·10. That is, £1·25 a week below the amount that it ought to be. There has been no explanation from the Government about this shortfall and no apology for it. It has simply been presented to us in the hope that the obscure nature and complexity of the formula will result in no one noticing the difference. It is not a shortfall of a few pence, as one might have inferred from the speech by the Minister who opened the debate. He implied that there were various adjustments because it was only an interim increase, and that the amounts involved were only a few pence. By no stretch of the imagination is £1·25 a week a few pence: it is a significant shortfall.

What are the implications of that £1·25 shortfall? According to the last answer given by the Minister to a question that I put to him about a month ago, approximately 3·99 million households receive standard housing benefit. That is one in five of the population and represents a significant number of people. What is the average loss to those people because of this strange change in the formula for uprating their benefit? It is not £1·25 because, of course, the formula is complex. The £1·25 is the amount of the needs allowance, but the actual benefit depends on the amount of a person's income in relation to the needs allowance. If a person's income is exactly equal to the needs allowance, he will receive 60 per cent. of his rent and rates.

Someone whose income is exactly equal to the needs allowance will suffer a loss of 75p, which is 60 per cent. of £1·25. For those people whose incomes are above or below the needs allowance, the loss will vary, partly depending on how far the income is above or below the needs allowance, and partly depending on other factors. It is impossible to give an overall figure for every claimant, but I should like to come back to certain parameters. For a person on the needs allowance, the average loss will be 75p a week, equal to £39 a year. That is the sort of loss that these people will suffer as a result of the Government's increase and the Government have not had the honesty to tell anyone about that loss.

Mr. Frank Field: Give way and allow the Minister to answer now.

Mr. Raynsford: I will give way to the Minister in a moment if he wants to reply.

If that loss of £39 a year applied to every housing benefit recipient—and I do not claim that it does—the total saving to the Government would be £155 million a year. That is a significant amount. In reality, I expect the Government's savings will be less because of the complex formula. I have consulted the Library on this, and it gave me the estimate that the total savings for the Government are likely to be about £100 million in the course of a year. We are dealing with a Government who are making covert savings of between £100 million and £150 million without having the honesty to tell the House about it. That is a serious matter.

I put these figures forward not in the confidence that they are precisely accurate because, as I have explained, a complex formula is involved and it is difficult to be precise, but because I have no other option. A month ago, I asked for detailed figures on this. I asked the Secretary of State for Social Services:

"what savings in expenditure on housing benefit he expects to make in the 1986-87 and 1987-88 as a result of his proposal to increase the main housing benefit needs allowance in July 1986 by the same cash amounts as the retirement pension rather than according to the normal uprating formula."

The hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major) replied:

"No comparison is available since the traditional uprating formula, which has sometimes produced reductions in entitlement in the past"— that is an interesting comment because in my memory there has never been a reduction in the needs allowance—

"could not be used on this occasion because the measurement period for the transitional July uprating covers only May 1985 to January 1986."—[Official Report, 12 May 1986; Vol. 97, c. 381.]

That was a convenient answer for the Minister because it allowed him to avoid facing the fundamental question about the amount of the saving.

[Mr. Raynsford]

Our complaint is that, because the Government have gone away from the traditional uprating formula, there has been a significant cut in housing benefit and a significant saving for the Government, about which they have not come clean. I notice that the Secretary of State is seeking advice on this point. I hope that he gets good advice so that he will be able to inform the House of it.

Who will lose as a result of these changes? In total, about 3,990,000 households receiving standard housing benefit will be affected. Of those, 2·63 million pensioner households will be affected, and will have losses inflicted upon them because of this covert cut in benefit. Some 1·5 million home owners and 1·85 million council tenants will suffer losses because the Government have chosen, secretly and furtively, to cut housing benefit, but have not had the honesty to admit to the House that that is what they are doing.

Mr. Major: Before the hon. Gentleman proceeds with categorical assertions such as this, I point out that it is within the recollection of the House that a few minutes ago he said that he does not have confidence in his figures. Until such time as he does have that confidence, I hope that he will make it clear to the House that his assertions are based on figures that have not yet been examined, and certainly not conceded by the Government.

Mr. Raynsford: As the Minister will also recall, I was talking about the number of households that will suffer losses. I have been able to give these figures categorically because the Minister gave me these figures in answer to a question that I posed a month ago. The figures that I said that I could not give precisely are of the total savings to the Government, because he declined to give me that answer. Therefore, I can state on the basis of his answers that about 4 million households are affected, including about 2·5 million pensioner households, 1·5 million owner-occupiers and 1·8 million council tenants. Those are the Minister's figures. The extent of the loss and the total savings to the Government I cannot give because those figures have been denied me. I hope that the Minister will answer that challenge.

I remind the House that this is not the first time that recipients of housing benefit have suffered loss at the hands of the Government. Some 2·2 million households lost benefit in April 1983 as a result of changes to the housing benefit formula at that stage. In April and November 1984, a further 2 million households lost as a result of further adjustments — cuts imposed by the Government that some Conservative Members had the courage to oppose. In April 1985, a further 90,000 households lost as a result of further changes involving people in areas with high rents, and in November 1985 a further 2 million households lost because of changes to the rate rebate taper formula, a complex issue.

The Government's cuts to the housing benefit scheme have caused extensive losses involving hundreds of millions of pounds. Additionally, the Social Security Bill, which the House recently considered, proposes further swingeing cuts in housing benefit, which will reduce benefit to millions of households and will give the Government a saving of about £450 million. On top of that, we have an unannounced cut that could involve the Government in savings of upwards of £100 million, about which they have not come clean.

What is the Government's case? The two possible answers that I sensed from the opening speech made by the Minister for Social Security were that the increase has been done in a way aimed at preventing administrative problems to local authorities and the DHSS caused by having different upratings for different benefits. That is a somewhat unconvincing argument coming from a Government who have consistently adjusted the formulae for housing benefit, often at short notice and involving considerable administrative problems for local authorities to make cuts. Why is it that, on this occasion, when doing the thing properly would have been to the benefit of households in receipt of housing benefit, the Government are not prepared to do so? If they can make administratively difficult adjustments to make cuts, can they not do the same to be fair to claimants? Going on the basis of their previous cuts in housing benefit, that argument seems pretty crude and unconvincing.

The second argument that the Government may advance is that they could not adopt the formula because the uprating came earlier than usual and they did not have the information on the increase in rent and rates to make the assessment. This would be a convenient argument if it carried water, but it does not because the Ministers in the DHSS had only to ask their counterparts in the Department of the Environment what sort of figures they were anticipating for average rent increases in April this year and they would have had an answer. When the new needs allowance was announced by the DHSS, the Department of the Environment was giving advice to local authorities that it was expecting — and this was the basis on which subsidies to local authorities were being calculated — an increase in rents of about 65p.

It would be nice if there were more co-ordination between the Government Departments and if the DHSS actually spoke to the Department of the Environment and asked about these figures. Had it done so, it would have had a solid basis on which to make the uprating assessment. Sadly, this appears to be yet another occasion when the DHSS did not speak to the Department of the Environment about matters that require co-ordination for social policy purposes. One thinks of the long, sad history of the board and lodging allowance cuts, of the proposed cuts on mortgage support in supplementary benefits. In particular, one thinks of the housing benefit cuts, in which the DHSS appeared to be taking unilateral action that had a serious impact on housing policies, but did not have any discussion with the Department primarily concerned with housing policy before making its announcement. Those arguments are unconvincing. If there were a will, undoubtedly a way would be found to ensure that the proper uprating would have been given.

If the Government wanted to apply the normal formula, they could have found a pretty sound basis for doing so. Instead, they chose conveniently to ignore the traditional formula. It was convenient to them because their alternative formula cut benefit increases and substantially reduced expenditure. I shall be interested to hear what the Minister has to say about this.

This occasion contrasts markedly to what happened a year ago, when the DHSS made a swingeing increase in the non-dependent deductions under the housing benefit scheme of some 18 per cent., far ahead of the uprating in benefits. They justified it on the ground that there is an arcane formula used for assessing non-dependent deductions, although anyone in the know knows that that is based entirely on owner-occupier costs and the majority of housing benefit recipients are tenants, so it is a most dubious formula. However, the Minister justified the increase on the basis that his time-honoured formula had to be adopted. If that logic was good enough when cuts were in the wind, why is it not acceptable now when claimants have a right to receive a proper and reasonable increase?

The Minister's arguments were unconvincing. A third argument that may be advanced is that this is only temporary because next year, when the April increase takes place, the rent increases that apply this April will be taken into account and it will all catch up in the end. That argument is equally unconvincing on two counts. Why should claimants have to wait that length of time in order to catch up and, secondly, in effect it will not be catching up because by that stage it will be a year after the rent increase before the formula comes into effect. In other words, there will have been a one-year time lag, as a result of which claimants will have lost money.

I can find no justification whatsoever for the Government's action. This proposed increase, which breaks the traditional formula, is a dishonourable action. I am concerned about the lack of any frank information and the Government's unwillingness to answer my questions. The House deserves proper answers from Ministers. In the absence of such answers we should insist on these regulations being annulled and instead insist on a fair and proper increase in the housing benefit needs allowance.

Mr. Martin M. Brandon-Bravo (Nottingham, South): I deeply regret that the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) is no longer present, because it was obvious from the way in which he delivered his speech that he believes his brief. He must also believe that the British people are just about the most gullible in the world if he thinks that they will swallow what he said. We were treated to a stream of telephone numbers in relation to the kind of money that the hon. Gentleman would spend if he became Secretary of State.

The hon. Gentleman ignores — and I know that his leader tries to ignore — the fact that he is not the only shadow spokesman who talks in telephone numbers when informing us of what Opposition Members will spend when they come to speak — I hope that they never do — from the Government Dispatch Box. Depending on which newspaper one reads, the figure varies between £24,000 million and £30,000 million more in a financial year——

Mr. Major: And that was before this afternoon.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: My hon. Friend is quite right.

The hon. Member for Oldham, West ought to note what was said by his right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) just after the general election in 1983. I hope that the House will forgive me, because I do not have the Hansard with me, but I think that I paraphrase the right hon. Gentleman correctly. He said that his party had pledged additional spending of £17,000 million a year, that the British public would not be fooled and that his party's policy therefore lacked credibility. We are going through that same process again, and the Labour party's case lacks the same credibility.

I wish to speak about our pensioners, who constitute a substantial part of our population. They also will not have been fooled by the speech of the hon. Member for Oldham, West. After all, those people grew up with very different values from those that the hon. Gentleman would support. They valued thrift and independence rather than dependence, a philosophy of which the Labour party seems to make a virtue.

The Labour party also seems to dismiss as irrelevant and unimportant those pensioners who have savings. I think the comment was made that there were not many of them.

Mr. Frank Field: The duchesses.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: Not duchesses, Mr. Birkenhead, just ordinary working class pensioners who have put a little bit by for the eventual rainy day, and who after five years of Labour rule found that their little nest egg had become worthless.

Mr. Field rose

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: I shall not give way for the moment, because we are running short of time. We are not going down that road again

Mr. Raynsford rose

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: The hon. Gentleman spoke for a long time and another of my hon. Friends or perhaps even another Opposition Member may still be waiting to speak.

All too often we tend to forget that at long last, after many years, people's savings that are locked away in building societies are now earning a greater return than the rate of inflation. That is important to many of our pensioners who want their savings protected and who rely on the little extra that building society interest gives them. As my hon. Friend the Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth) pointed out, it is foolish to talk as though squeezing the rich will be sufficient to deliver all the fancy promises that we have heard from the Labour party.

I think that it was at the Labour party conference in 1976 [HON. MEMBERS: "Were you there?"] We all watched the television — that the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) then used the phrase that the Labour party would squeeze the rich until the pips squeaked. But as my hon. Friend the Member for Stirling said, he discovered that there were not enough such people to deliver the kind of promises that had been made by the Labour party, and at the end of the day everyone was paying more.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent): It should not escape our attention that the view of the shadow Chancellor about who would need to be taxed more heavily changed markedly when he discovered the average take-home pay of a prison officer.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: My hon. Friend makes a valid point. Indeed, the figure identifying the wicked rich has been raised from £20,000 to £30,000, because people do not have to hold very important posts for a husband and wife to discover that they are over the £20,000 limit. Those are the very families that the shadow Chancellor would wish to squeeze.

I hope that the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) does not think me patronising, but I believe that he was the first Labour Member at least to have the honesty to say that one must present a balanced package. Labour Members must be honest enough to say that, if they wish to spend astronomical sums, they must come to terms with how they would raise them. The honesty of the hon. Member for Birkenhead is perhaps the reason why he speaks from the Back Benches rather than from the Opposition Front Bench.

Like Ministers, I share a sense of unease and uncomfortableness about the 40p adjustment. I know the reasons for it. I was delighted, as was everyone, at just how low inflation had fallen. On that basis, the 40p was technically correct. Some said that it was so small a sum that perhaps it should not have been paid at all and that the payment should have been left until April. I have no doubt that if the Minister had taken that view we should have heard an even louder squeak from the Opposition Benches because pensioners would have had to wait for 18 months. It was the classic Catch 22 the no-win situation.

If we can maintain that very low rate of inflation as I believe we can and if the economy continues to grow, I hope that Ministers will persuade senior colleagues that we should do a little more for our pensioners next April than merely deliver our promise. I am glad that we made that promise and that it has been kept, but we should offer pensioners a little more out of the growth of the economy so that they can enjoy some of the benefits flowing to those in work.

I say that because I am conscious that the cost of living for our pensioners is different from that shown in the conventional cost of living index published in newspapers. I have no figures to prove my assertion, but I guess that the average pensioner does not benefit from a fall in the mortgage rate or from a fall in the cost of petrol. I do not know by what mechanism we can truly establish the cost of living for the bulk of our pensioners, but if it can be established, I hope that my senior colleagues will try to make some move towards delivering a rise next April for our pensioners in line with their cost of living, which is so different from ours.

Mr. Raynsford: In view of what I said earlier about 2·5 million pensioners suffering losses because of the failure to uprate housing benefit needs allowance properly, does the hon. Gentleman accept that an effective improvement could be made for pensioners, including those with savings whose income is above the supplementary benefit level, by pressing the Government for a proper increase in housing benefit this July?

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: When the hon. Gentleman rose and apologised to the House for getting involved in technicalities, I guarantee that, 30 seconds later, he had lost the attention of most hon. Members. That happened not only on the Government side; I saw blank looks of amazement on the faces of most of his hon. Friends.

In Nottingham this winter the local newspaper ran a magnificent campaign for the old and cold. It raised a lot of money, with which it made specific grants to people identified by their neighbours as being in trouble over heating payments. It was with a sense of unease that I accepted that the newspaper had to conduct such a campaign, but I was glad that it did. It was good to see the public responding so well to the appeal.

An interesting sidelight on that campaign for the old and cold is not addressed by all the arguments about additional heating payments. Two or three weeks ago Nottingham university staged an open day. One of the exhibitions was about cold and its effect upon human beings. I suppose that I was subconsciously aware of what the exhibition demonstrated, but it had never been brought to my attention in such a forceful way.

The exhibition was about the effect upon our elderly of a poor diet. The professor at the university said that poor diet probably had a greater impact on death through hypothermia than the temperature in an elderly person's home. On reflection, most of us will realise older people want a higher temperature in their homes than we find comfortable. Many elderly people have the strange belief that they do not need to eat as much as most of us. They eat less and less as they get older, and that is one of the major causes of the tragic loss of life through hypothermia.

Perhaps the Government can do something about that. I hesitate to make suggestions because it is difficult to persuade an old person that eating properly is as important as keeping the gas fire on all day.

I agree with hon. Members on both sides of the House that the weakest in our society are affected by inflation. It is no good saying, as members of the Labour party and of the alliance say all too often, that a few extra points on the cost of living index do not matter. They really do. We do no service to our community by arguing that it does not matter if inflation is a few points higher so long as benefits go up in line with that inflation. We cannot have it both ways. If we accept that philosophy, we shall be back to the earnings-related benefits argument. I hope that the Government continue to make inflation their top priority. If we can keep inflation down to tiny percentages, even if we cannot achieve zero, we shall do the greatest service to those at the bottom of the income scale and to our pensioners.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): I wish to speak briefly to the second order, on supplementary benefit uprating, but first I should like to respond to what the hon. Member for Nottingham, South (Mr. Brandon-Bravo) said. Surely he was not saying that research at Nottingham university demonstrated that diet is more important for the elderly than a warm house. I should have thought that a sensible diet and a warm house are very important to the elderly. The hon. Gentleman might not have said that, but that is what I understood.

The hon. Gentleman spoke about people in work. I am sure that he does not need to be reminded that the numbers of people in work and out of work are not evenly distributed throughout the nation. A large proportion of my constituents are utterly dependent on supplementary benefit and other payments. Indeed, over the past six years there has been a 94 per cent. increase in the number of supplementary benefit claimants in Greenock and Port Glasgow.

About 21 per cent. of the population in Scotland live on or below the supplementary benefit level. In Strathclyde the figure is 26·8 per cent.; in Glasgow 39·5 per cent. of people with dependants live on social security payments, while in my constituency about 33,000 people live on or below the supplementary benefit level. Therefore, upratings are of great importance. It is both inevitable and predictable that there will be pronounced and profound differences in this House on the means by which we reform the system of social security. As I said many times in the Social Security Bill Committee, we have a ramshackle system of social welfare, of which these upratings are a part.

The Minister said that the regulations covering severe weather payments were being reviewed. I hope that it will not be too lengthy a process. I have spent some considerable time arguing the case for these payments. My hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) asked whether those payments could be made to those saddled with additional fuel bills because of the past few weeks of unseasonably cold weather. He was not being facetious. The severe weather payment is based upon the additional costs brought about by the additional fuel consumed in unseasonably cold weather. Indeed, the Minister said that in February such payments were made to 57,000 pensioners and others in Scotland. It is an important issue and my hon. Friend was right to request payments because of our exceptionally cold summer. Despite what the hon. Member for Nottingham, South said, people need warm rooms, and this has been a dreadful summer.

I also agree with much of what my hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead said about the dangers of inflation. He made sound sense. However, as well as the spectre of inflation and the distress caused by constantly increasing prices to those on low incomes, especially pensioners, we also have the problem of structural unemployment. More and more people are deeply affected by economic decline. The male unemployment rate in my constituency is at the scandalously high level of 26 per cent., and there has been a 94 per cent. increase in the number of supplementary benefit payments during the past six years. To some extent, that has been generated by the disastrously inadequate and antiquated economic policies of this Government.

It is right and proper that we should all put our minds to the reform of the system of social welfare, although there are bound to be differences across the House. We must consider an increase in taxation for some of those in work, especially the better off. We all have an obligation to protect and promote the interests of the needy in our constituencies. As I have already said, 33,000 people in my constituency are on or below supplementary benefit level yet it is not the area most heavily affected by structural decline on the Clyde or in other parts of Scotland. It is right that we should examine ways to change the system. I believe that the Labour party system is much better than that supported and promoted by the present Administration.

Mrs. Margaret Beckett (Derby, South): This has been an extremely interesting debate. I apologise for not having been present throughout, although I have been here for the larger part. I have certainly been here long enough to realise how many of the main points of concern have been ably expressed by hon. Members on both sides.

My main point, which has been made already but bears repeating, is the extent to which our debate is about an opportunity lost. The hon. Member for Lincoln (Mr. Carlisle) suggested that the Government should take credit for the lower levels of inflation that we now enjoy. Over the past few years they have done nothing else, although they have not wanted to take the blame for some of the problems that have accompanied that.

Because the rate of inflation is comparatively low, it gives the Government a great opportunity to do more than the rate of inflation and to do so, relatively speaking, inexpensively. It has been an extraordinary feature of this and other uprating debates that Tory Back Benchers, clearly following the arguments put to them, speak as though it would be inconceivable generosity were the Government to do rather more than increase benefits in line with the increase in prices—as though the standard of living of the poorest members of the community was being fully protected by this and other upratings.

It is important to remember that when in 1980 the Government decided to break the link between earnings and benefits and to retain only the link between benefits and prices the then Secretary of State, in specific and unqualified terms, said that the Government's intention was not merely to increase benefits in line with prices year after year but to take the opportunity—this is his argument, not mine—presented by the economic difficulties in which the Government found themselves to break the link with earnings that was at that time a statutory and bounden duty on the Government and to retain only the statutory duty to increase in line with prices.

I was under the impression that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, let alone the Secretary of State for Employment, believes that we are now in a time of prosperity—that there has been great success in the Government's economic and industrial policies and that things are now substantially better than for many years past. On the basis of the argument put forward by the previous Secretary of State in 1980, surely it is now opportune for the Government to do as they indicated in 1980 they had every intention of doing—from time to time to make a one-off increase in benefits in line with earnings, although they did not intend to do that every year.

The reason that the Secretary of State of the day gave that assurance was a reason of importance which stands today. His recognition that to link benefits only with prices meant, as it means now, a steady and inexorable decline in the standard of living of the poorest members of the community. That is clearly evident now regarding pensioners. The figures are known. A single pensioner has lost about £4 a week through the break with earnings, and a married couple have lost about £7 a week.

It is evident how much people have dropped behind in terms of living standards when one looks at the long-term predictions of the Government Actuary regarding pensions. Even before the Government got their grubby hands on the state earnings-related scheme, the Government Actuary showed that over a period of years the basic pension so declines in value when linked only with prices that even with the addition of an untouched earnings-related scheme the total pension gradually declines until it is below that of a basic pension today. Those are the Government's own figures and predictions.

The value of child support is being eroded. Not even the £175 million cut last year from child benefit has been restored. The value of child support is now less than it was 30 years ago.

I could not say that one would welcome a decision to leave non-dependent deductions in housing benefit where they were but, as my hon. Friend the Member for Fulham (Mr. Raynsford) said, the Government, having introduced that deduction at an exorbitant and unjustified level, disproportionate to the cost of rent and rates, increased it last year by an amount substantially above the rate of inflation. The fact that the Government did not choose to increase it this year is, I suppose, to be welcomed, but it does not mean that we have forgotten how much they took from such families last year. The deduction affects poor families with young adults who are in work. The decision to scrap the non-household rent addition is a blow to many needy families with young adults out of work. It is a further blow to their independence.

It has been said that, since the Conservative party has been in government, about £1·5 million has been saved at the expense of the young in particular and that substantial savings along those lines are likely in the Social Security Bill. How much do the Government expect to save from the change? We know that, when the Government made similar changes in 1983, they saved £20 million. A further set of changes in 1985-86 saved another £45 million. We shall be interested to learn how much has been saved at the expense, in particular, of young people forced to depend on benefits.

My hon. Friend the Member for Fulham, in an interesting and excellent speech on housing benefit, not only educated many hon. Members — as the hon. Member for Nottingham, South (Mr. Brandon-Bravo) conceded — in the intricacies and byways of housing benefit but put most pertinently to the Government a number of questions on the impact of their changes. It remains for me only to say that I hope that on this occasion the Minister will say whether my hon. Friend the Member for Fulham was correct in asserting that savings of £100 million or £150 million will be made. If he says that my hon. Friend is incorrect, he might tell us the order of magnitude of the sums involved.

The Government have lost an opportunity to restore some of the determination in living standards over recent years for the poorest members of the community. They have seized an opportunity to make more savings along the way, hoping that, because they are made by way of obscure technical adjustments, no one will notice — that is, no one other than the 4 million households which will be affected by the changes in housing benefits. They have seized an opportunity to make the minimum possible increase in benefits.

Much has been said in the House about the amount of the social security budget, implying that the Government are being generous. It should be clearly on record that every year since the Government broke the link with earnings they have given the minimum possible — the minimum that they are forced to do by law — to the poorest members of our community, whereas in every Budget they have brought in they have been generous to those whose needs are least.

My hon. Friend the Member for Fulham said that the Government could have taken account of changes still to come and not made the full savings that they can make because of the time of the uprating, if they had consulted their colleagues in the Department of the Environment. If not this year, in which year will the Government make up the losses? The hon. Member for Nottingham, South said that he hoped the year would come when the Government felt able to give back to the poor some of the living standards that they have lost over recent years. We all hope that that year will come, but since it has been six years since the change was made, we wonder when that will be. Perhaps the hon. Member for Nottingham, South should pin his hopes, as should the pensioners and the unemployed, on a pre-election giveaway. Judging from the Government's track record so far, I am not sure that even those hopes should be strong.

The Government say that the poor are being protected in the uprating just as they say that the National Health Service is prospering, the economy is booming and everything is for the best in the best of all possible worlds. Even Conservative Members clearly realise that that is not the reality of how the Health Service or much else is perceived. There have been some signs in today's debate that they are beginning to realise that the same is true about the rest of the welfare state. We welcome their conversion. We hope that the pressure that they bring to bear will mean that next year's uprating will, for once, implement the pledges given by a former Secretary of State six years ago.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. John Major): This has been an intriguing debate, spiced with assertion that has, as is traditional on these occasions, ranged far further than the question of uprating. I have no objection to that. As usual, there has been a mixture of informed and constructive comment, and other comment which it would be kindest to characterise as unhelpful. What has been consistent about the contributions from the Opposition Benches is that there have been times when one might been forgiven for believing that the debate was about reductions in benefits rather than orders which increase the main benefit rates and add some £420 million in a full year to social security spending. As I noted what was said, I wondered whether we were debating the draft regulations that I have considered carefully over recent days.

It is worth re-emphasising at the outset that the uprating fulfils our undertaking to increase pensions and other linked long-term benefits in line with the movement of prices. It is an oddity that the pursuit of low inflation, which has been the prime aim of Governments for 20 years, should, once achieved, give rise to criticism over benefit increases.

If the Opposition were presiding over, say, a 16 per cent. inflation rate — I pick the average rate during their last term of office, fearing that their spending plans would re-create that wicked cycle of rising prices and falling prospects — they would no doubt regard it as a matter of pride to protect benefit values by increasing rates by a similar amount. But when we protect benefit values, and savings too — as one of my hon. Friend's trenchantly pointed out — by bringing down inflation, that is a matter for criticism regarding benefit increases.

In reality we must get used again to living in a world of low price rises, when neither benefits nor, I hope, earnings need to go up by enormous amounts simply to keep up with the cost of living. Clearly, it will take some psychological adjustment. I am sorry to see that many Opposition Members are clearly maladjusted in that respect. The only logical conclusion one can draw from much of what they said was that they would like inflation to be higher so that pensioners and others can be given a larger increase.

Although the circumstances of the uprating are exceptional, and the small increase in benefits is due partly to the interim nature of the uprating, it is clear that the downward path of inflation, which thankfully looks as if it will continue, means that it is possible for future uprating debates to be held against a background of low inflation. I am grateful to my hon. Friends the Members for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth) and Lincoln (Mr. Carlisle) and the hon. Members for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), and Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) for acknowledging clearly and without equivocation the full value of low inflation for those on modest incomes.

The hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) made a rather expensive speech. No doubt it was enjoyed by Labour Back Benchers but it will conceivably mean misery for that unlikely creature of the future, a Labour Chancellor. I was concerned, not just with what the hon. Gentleman said, but, substantially, with what he left out. He talked of what the Christmas bonus would have been worth if it had been index-linked, but he certainly did not mention what it was worth in the years when a Labour Government found it impossible to pay it. He talked of the level of pensions and what it would have been if pensions had been index-linked to earnings, but, despite being challenged, he did not say what the cost would be in national insurance contributions, lost employment and increased inflation.

The hon. Member for Oldham, West did say — I acknowledge this — that he would claw back £3·6 billion in tax from what he loosely called "the rich" to pay for his new spending programme. I must tell him that £3·6 billion may seem a large sum to him, but his promises would cost a minimum of £4·6 billion in the very first year, of which £1·5 billion would be for child benefit. The Opposition will need to look far wider than the hon. Gentleman suggested if they are to fund their promises.

Mr. Meacher: It is a fantasy.

Mr. Major: To be accused by the hon. Gentleman of citing fantasy figures is surely one of the delights of life.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stirling successfully exploded the myth that these benefit increases could be paid for by taxes on the rich. I commend his speech to the hon. Member for Oldham, West, who was unavoidably absent at that time.

The hon. Member for Oldham, West compared the Government's record with that of their immediate predecessor. Again, there was much that he neglected to say. For example, he did not say, although it is highly relevant to pensioners, that the real value of savings for a pensioner with a building society account fell by 33 per cent. during the period of the last Labour Government, largely because of precisely the same policies that the Labour party now proposes and precisely the same policies that it would use to pay for the better provision about which the hon. Member for Oldham, West talked. Some help that would be to the pensioners. I shall with relish refer the hon. Gentleman's remarks to the tender researches of my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary, who will doubtless check carefully to ascertain whether the hon. Gentleman's promises are within the £24 billion cost of Labour's programme to date or are a substantive addition to that sum.

The hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) suggested that, as inflation was now so low — I am grateful for that acknowledgment — we might have done better and that it was trivial of us not to increase benefits by a larger sum. I must say to her, because arithmetic is not a strong point on the Opposition Front Bench——

Mr. Marlow: It is non-existent.

Mr. Major: It is non-existent. My hon. Friend is characteristically less generous than me. Each increase of 1 per cent. in benefits costs some £360 million, which is in no sense a trivial sum.

My hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) made a typically thoughtful and constructive speech on a theme that he has pursued valiantly for many years. He will not expect me to respond to his philosophical observations, and I shall not disappoint him. But I shall confirm that we are making giant strides towards

Mrs. Beckett: Tenpence.

Mr. Major: The hon. Lady should wait to hear what I say before she disputes it. I was going to say — I shall repeat it from the beginning so that she may have its full rich flavour — that we are making giant strides towards the efficient computerised system in the Department of Health and Social Security that my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington seeks so that we can deliver an accurate and swift social security service to the public. That is what we seek and what our operational strategy seeks to deliver. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington, who, I understand, has some objections to the social security reforms, will appreciate the structural changes in the Social Security Bill which will make a significant contribution to the increased efficiency that he seeks.

Mr. Favell: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Major: I hope that my hon. Friend will forgive me, but I must respond to a large number of points and I want to deal with as many as I can.

The hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire invited the Government to re-examine the retail price index. [Interruption.] No doubt he is now examining the Liberal party's defence policy! The hon. Gentleman invited the Government to examine the retail price index in the light of the results of recent reports by the Institute for Fiscal Studies. My hon. Friend the Member for Lincoln raised the same question and added that the RPI needed continuing investigation. It gets that. The construction of the RPI is the responsibility of a committee of statistical experts. At present, the retail price advisory committee is sitting. It will consider the RPI and the special pensioners' price index. I assure the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire that the committee will take full account of the type of criticisms made by the Institute for Fiscal Studies and, as normally happens, any recommendations for re-weighting will be taken into account in the RPI from January next.

The hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire may not be aware that the RPI has done much better for pensioners than the index of changes in their spending arrived at through the special pensioners' index—the so-called pensioners' price index. The RPI has risen by some six percentage points more than the pensioners' index and the level of retirement pension by 16 percentage points more in the period from November 1978 to November 1985. Whatever criticism there may be of the RPI, it has delivered a fairer level of benefit to many people than might have been the case with other, apparently more selective, examinations of their spending patterns.

The hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire raised a number of other matters concerning future upratings, but I shall not surprise him by responding to them, because he would not realistically have expected me to do so.

The hon. Member for Fulham (Mr. Raynsford), with his special expertise in housing benefit, suggested — "accused" would perhaps be too harsh a word — that the Government had made covert savings in housing benefit as a result of changes in structure. I shall examine the hon. Gentleman's speech carefully, because I appreciate his depth of knowledge, but I do not for one second accept the assertion that that was a covert cut or the charges that he sought to make.

Mr. Raynsford: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Major: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will forgive me and hear what I have to say. In any event, he will notice that time is pressing. I shall carefully examine his comments. However, I do not believe that he was accurate.

If the Opposition vote for the prayer, they will vote against the expressed wishes of local authority associations, which were consulted and which advised us to make the change. They will vote for a reduction in help for many standard housing benefit recipients. I shall await their decision on that point with some interest. That is precisely what will happen, whether the hon. Member for Oldham, West likes it or not.

The hon. Member for Oldham, West made a great deal of the standard of living of 9·5 million pensioners and many millions of other beneficiaries. My hon. Friend the Minister for Social Security said that our record was substantial and beneficial. I confirm that. It is a record of which we are proud. It is demonstrably the case that retirement pensions have kept appreciably ahead of inflation since 1979, and it cannot be denied. It is demonstrably the case that total benefit spending on elderly people has increased in real terms by 26 per cent. in the past five years, and it cannot be denied.

That is not all. Taking together cash benefits and other programmes supporting elderly people, our spending in relation to gross domestic product is the third highest in the European Community. The hon. Member for Oldham, West chose not to mention that. Perhaps he did not know it, or perhaps he simply did not like the fact that it reflected the Government's commitment to the elderly. It is vital to consider pension levels not in isolation but in the context of all the services provided. It is those which, taken together, set the standard of living. It is those facts which the Opposition perennially ignore. The problem with the hon. Member for Oldham, West is that his spending plans are index-linked to his own verbocity. Every speech he makes has a substantial price tag.

We have carefully weighed the resources available to us and been able to achieve many key objectives without damaging the economic aims that make all social security payments possible. Without economic success there are no resources for those social security payments and that might be borne in mind. Economic success benefits nobody more than social security beneficiaries. It is reflected substantially by the uprating orders before the House and I invite my right hon. and hon. Friends to reflect upon that success and give the orders their support, and defeat the prayer should it be moved to a Division.

It being Seven o'clock, MR. SPEAKER proceeded, pursuant to the Order [9 June], to put forthwith the Questions necessary to dispose of the motions.

Resolved,

That the draft Social Security Benefits Up-rating Order 1986, which was laid before the House on 8th May, be approved.

Procedure

7.13 pm

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Norman Lamont): I beg to move,

That, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the practice of the House relating to matters which may be included in Finance Bills, any Finance Bill of the present Session may contain provisions taking effect in a future year with respect to activities of entertainers not resident in the United Kingdom and sportsmen not resident in the United Kingdom.

It might be for the convenience of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker, if with this we take motions Nos. 8 to 16:

That, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the practice of the House relating to matters which may be included in Finance Bills, any Finance Bill of the present Session may contain provision with respect to the limit imposed by section 4 of the National Loans Act 1968 in relation to loans made by the Public Works Loan Commissioners in pursuance of section 3 of that Act.

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Finance Bill, it is expedient to authorise any increase in the sums payable out of or into the National Loans Fund which is attributable to any provision of that Act increasing to £42,000 million, with power to increase by order to £50,000 million, the limit imposed by section 4 of the National Loans Act 1968 in relation to loans made by the Public Works Loan Commissioners in pursuance of section 3 of that Act.

DOUBLE TAXATION RELIEF: ADVANCE CORPORATION TAX

That provision may be made amending section 100 of the Finance Act 1972.

PAYMENTS ON RETIREMENT OR REMOVAL FROM OFFICE OR EMPLOYMENT ETC.

That provision may be made amending Schedule 8 to the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1970.

STAMP DUTY (LOAN CAPITAL)

That provision may be made with respect to stamp duty in relation to loan capital.

STAMP DUTY (DEPOSITARY RECEIPTS)

That provision may be made with respect to stamp duty in relation to instruments transferring securities to persons concerned with depositary receipts.

STAMP DUTY (CLEARANCE SERVICES)

That provision may be made with respect to stamp duty in relation to instruments transferring securities to persons concerned with clearance services.

STAMP DUTY RESERVE TAX (DEPOSITARY RECEIPTS)

That provision may be made for charging stamp duty reserve tax where securities are transferred, issued or appropriated after 18th March 1986 in pursuance of an arrangement (whenever made) relating to a depositary receipt.

STAMP DUTY RESERVE TAX (CLEARANCE SERVICES)

That provision may be made for charging stamp duty reserve tax where securities are transferred or issued after 18th March 1986 in pursuance of an arrangement (whenever made) relating to the provision of clearance services.

Mr. Terry Davis (Birmingham, Hodge Hill): I think that it would be a good idea if the Financial Secretary to the Treasury were to explain to the House why the Procedure and the Ways and Means motions are necessary. Indeed, I think that the Minister has an obligation to do so, having presented the House with a record number of extra motions.

We realise that all Governments, Labour and Conservative, have found it necessary to introduce extra Ways and Means motions during the proceedings in Committee on the Finance Bill so that the Committee can deal with matters that it would not otherwise be able to consider. I accept that there is often a need for some extra motions to be put before the House. We have, however, been presented with an exceptional number of extra motions. I have looked back over the past 12 years, and I think that on this occasion the Government have tabled a record number. It is a record that can be added to the Government's other records on unemployment, real interest rates and the imbalance in our trade in manufactured goods. We now have a record number of motions so that the Government can get out of the jam that threatens them in Committee on the Finance Bill.

As I have already said, I accept that there is often a need for some motions of this sort to be tabled, but we are being confronted with an exceptional number in this instance. There are no fewer than 10 Procedure and Ways and Means motions on the Order Paper.

We are bound to draw the conclusion that the Government are an Administration of indecision and dither, if not incompetence. Some of the matters that we are being asked to refer to the Standing Committee were included in the Budget statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I should have thought that it would have been possible to include such matters in the Finance Bill. If that was not possible, they could at least have been included in Ways and Means motions at an earlier stage. I think that the Financial Secretary owes us some explanation of why it was not possible to include the matters now before us in the original motions, and why it is necessary to come to the House with these motions at such a late stage in the proceedings of the Committee that is considering the Finance Bill.

Mr. Lamont: The Procedure motions are permissive instructions to the Finance Bill Committee. They will enable it to include items in the Bill which it would not otherwise have been able to do. The Procedure motions cover two matters, one relating to a future year and provision for the taxation of entertainers, and the other covering borrowing through the Public Works Loan Commissioners. The money resolution is necessary because it is a charge to the Exchequer. Again, it relates to the Public Works Loan Commissioners.

One of the Ways and Means motions refers to double taxation relief and another is directed to golden handshakes. The majority of the Ways and Means motions that are causing concern to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) relate to stamp duty. It has been necessary to make a number of changes in the Government's intentions on stamp duty, which is an extremely complicated tax and extremely difficult to amend. Therefore, it has been necessary in many instances to table new clauses. A new clause on stamp duty was tabled on 3 June and a Ways and Means motion was tabled on 5 June. My hon. Friend the Economic Secretary to the Treasury wrote to the hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) in anticipation of these changes and explained what the Government intended. I hope that that was some advance warning and explanation.

As the hon. Gentleman knows, the new clauses that have been tabled today will not be discussed in Committee until next Tuesday. I hope he will consider that that gives him some time to consider my explanations as well as the explanations that have been given by my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary. The hon. Gentleman is correct in saying that there have been a substantial number of Government new clauses this year. There have been 17. I am not sure——

Mr. Terry Davis: The hon. Gentleman has missed the point. I am not complaining about the number of new clauses that have been tabled. I have not mentioned the new clauses. I am complaining about the Procedure and Ways and Means motions, of which there are no fewer than 10. I believe that there are more than we have ever had in the House before. I accept the need for new clauses, but why are we having to deal with so many matters which apparently were not envisaged when the Bill was published?

Mr. Lamont: As the hon. Gentleman knows, the Ways and Means motions relate to new clauses, and specifically to changes in stamp duty. I do not think that they represent an unprecedented number of new clauses. As stamp duty is a tax that is so difficult to amend, some of the new clauses might be considered more in the nature of amendments. I do not want to weary the House, but there are precedents for taking new clauses and amendments together. The number of changes that the Government have made is not unprecedented. The changes are necessary for the reasons outlined by my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary to the Treasury in his letter to the hon. Member for Thurrock.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): As a member of the Finance Bill Committee and one who the Minister would agree has created some trouble over the question of stamp duty, it appears to me that these motions show that the Government, in their proposals of 19 March, had not thought through the problems about stamp duty. Indeed, a Minister admitted in the Committee that the one thing that he had done wrong as a member of the Committee was that as new Ministers had come to the Committee he had not shifted the responsibility for stamp duty to someone else. I suggested to him that perhaps he should simply resign.

We have had stamp duty since before the 1850s, and it is a well-known form of taxation. However, it requires careful and considered thought if amendments are to be made to it. It is not good enough that my hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) should receive a letter on 3 June saying that further amendments and new clauses are to be tabled for debate next Tuesday. When will the Government think through their philosophy on this matter?

The truth is that every time the Government make a suggestion a pressure group somewhere puts a little more pressure on them and they change their mind. The result is that there are now 17 new clauses. I do not know how many more there will be before we reach the Report stage, but I suspect that newer and newer clauses will be tabled in the same way as we have newer and newer Ministers on the Committee who do not understand what the old Ministers were doing. I suppose that that is the price that we have to pay on that Committee.

I should like to take this opportunity, on behalf of those who have to pay stamp duty, to put a plug back into the matter now as I did in Committee. I hope that the Government will reconsider stamp duty, especially in relation to good will and the reconstruction and amalgamation of companies, as was proposed in the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act 1985. I hope that we shall have some sanity in the matter.

Treasury Ministers collectively ought to buy a book about stamp duty, sit down, read it and learn what the law is about. They should ask their hon. Friends who sit around them, and who have knowledge of these matters, for some decent professional advice and return to the Committee with a little sanity, instead of the awful gobbledegook from which the Committee is suffering.

7.22 pm

Mr. Terry Davis: I should like to refer briefly to the comments made by the Financial Secretary. I shall not make a great fuss about the need for new clauses about stamp duty. I can understand the need for that. I appreciate that I have been told about the effect that some unfortunate illnesses have had in that respect. I am not making a fuss about that or about the lack of consultation. I appreciate the difficulties, which I believe are due to personnel problems in the Government.

That does not excuse all the motions. The Financial Secretary glided over the first two motions.

I draw the Minister's attention to motion No. 7, which deals with the future taxation of entertainers and sportsmen who are not resident in the United Kingdom. This provision was included in the Chancellor's Budget statement. Why, therefore, was a clause not included in the Bill? Why was there not a Ways and Means motion to cover that point when the other Ways and Means motions were tabled and considered by the House and agreed formally at the time?

I also draw the Financial Secretary's attention to motion No. 8. This is a Procedure motion to allow us to discuss in Committee a new clause affecting the amount of money that can be borrowed from the Public Works Loan Commissioners. I understand the need for such a clause. However, this must have been known before the Chancellor's Budget statement and before the Bill was published. It must have been known that it was necessary to increase the limit on the amount of money that can be lent by the Public Works Loan Commissioners. This must have been known before the Bill was published and before the new clause was tabled a short time ago.

I am not criticising the period for consultation. We will deal with that point in Committee if necessary. It shows a certain incompetence and lack of grip on legislation that these matters were not covered in the Bill in the first place.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I am pleased that the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) agrees that there has been ample time for consultation.

Mr. Terry Davis: I did not say that. I said that I was not complaining about that. We will deal with these matters in Committee. The Financial Secretary should not put words into my mouth. I said I was complaining about the fact that these matters were not covered in the Bill as originally drafted. I did not want to take up the time of the House on that issue.

I must tell the Financial Secretary that I am not surprised that the Leader of the House is present, because the threat to the Government's legislative programme by this kind of behaviour is very serious. If the Opposition so wished, we could mount the kind of exercise that was mounted by Conservative Back Benchers last Thursday.

Mr. Lamont: I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's statement that he is not complaining about the period of consultation.

The motion relating to entertainers is necessary because it relates to a future year. A conscious decision was also made that a motion was needed to cover the Public Works Loan Board. We decided that the Finance Bill was a convenient vehicle to advance the motion.

The hon. Member for Hodge Hill referred to innumerable changes, but he and his hon. Friends will know that this happens every year with the Finance Bill. In fact, in 1976, when the Labour party was in office, there were no fewer than 161 Government amendments to the Finance Bill—many more than there are now. As I have said, some of the proposals must be put forward in the form of new clauses because stamp duty is not a tax that can easily be amended. I think that at least one of the Ways and Means motions on stamp duty—that relating to loans—is more like an amendment. Today's procedure is no different from what has happened in the past when Governments have made amendments.

Mr. Terry Davis: The Financial Secretary has missed the point. He is obviously incapable of replying to my arguments. We will discuss this matter again in Committee and I do not want to delay the House by attempting to teach the Financial Secretary so that he can understand what I am saying.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the practice of the House relating to matters which may be included in Finance Bills, any Finance Bill of the present Session may contain provisions taking effect in a future year with respect to activities of entertainers not resident in the United Kingdom and sportsmen not resident in the United Kingdom.

PROCEDURE (LOANS BY PUBLIC WORKS LOAN COMMISSIONERS

Financial Services Bill

As amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

Ordered,

That the Financial Services Bill, as amended, be considered in the following order, New Clauses, Amendments to Clause 1, Schedule 1, Clauses 2 to 10, Schedule 2, Clauses 11 to 35, Schedule 3, Clauses 36 to 83, Schedule 4, Clauses 84 to 96, Schedules 5 and 6, Clauses 97 and 98, Schedule 7, Clauses 99 to 110, Schedule 8, Clauses 111 to 117, Schedule 9, Clauses 118 to 142, Schedule 10, Clauses 143 to 166, Schedule 11, Clause 167, Schedule 12, New Schedules and Amendments to Schedule 13.

Sir William Clark (Croydon, South): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I should like to make a plea on behalf of Back Benchers. We are now considering a Bill which originally had 176 pages, 167 clauses and 13 schedules. We now have 278 amendments of which 249 are Government amendments. There are also 17 new clauses, of which 14 are Government new clauses.

I hope that the Government will consider Back Benchers on both sides of the House because there has been little time for us to consider the amendments and new clauses. The Government are pushing the working of the House too hard.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State will assure me that this will not create a precedent, as it puts Back Benchers into an impossible situation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): I am sure that the Government Front Bench have heard what the hon. Gentleman said. I shall, of course, keep a careful eye open for him and any other hon. Member who may wish to catch my eye on the amendments.

New Clause 1

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE FOR EMPLOYEES' SHARE SCHEMES

'(1) Section 153 of the Companies Act 1985 (transactions not prohibited by section 151) shall be amended as follows.

(2) After subsection (4)(b) there shall be inserted—

"(bb) without prejudice to paragraph (b), the provision of financial assistance by a company or any of its subsidiaries for the purposes of or in connectin with anything done by the company (or a company connected with it) for the purpose of enabling or facilitating transactions in shares in the first-mentioned company between or for the benefit of any of the following persons—

(i) the bona fide employees or former employees of that company or of another company in the same group; or

(ii) the wives, husbands, widows, widowes, children or step-children udner the age of eighteen of any such employees or former employees,".

(3) After subsection (4) there shall be inserted—

"(5) For the purposes of subsection (4)(bb) a company is connected with another company if—

(a) they are in the same group; or

(b) One is entitled, either alone or with any other company in the same group, to exercise or control the exercise of a majority of the voting rights attributable to ordinary share capital which are exercisable in all circumstances at any general meeting of the other company or of its holding company; and in this section "group", in relation to a company, means that company, any other company which is its holding company or subsidiary and any other compant which is a subsidiary of that holding company.".'.—[Mr. Howard.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Michael Howard): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it may be convenient to discuss amendment No. 10, in Schedule 1, page 134, line 28 at end insert

'(1A) Paragraphs 12 to 16 do not apply to anything done by or on behalf of a body corporate, or a body corporate connected with it, or trustees appointed by a body corporate, for the purpose of or in connection with the establishment, operation or administration of an employees' share scheme (as that expression is defined in section 743 of the Companies Act 1985).'.

7.30 pm

Mr. Howard: In response to the point of order raised by hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark), I should like to say that the vast majority of the Government amendments to which he referred emanate from points made in Standing Committee and from correspondence, often from Back Benchers. I hope that he accepts that, in large measure, they represent an attempt by the Government to respond to various anxieties that have been expressed.

New clause 1 springs out of a largely technical matter. As I said when we discussed a related point in Committee, the Government support the introduction of employee share schemes. One incentive that companies might wish to offer with such schemes might be the provision of facilities to allow beneficiaries of the scheme and their dependants to trade easily between themselves. There is room for doubt about whether the provisions of section 153(4)(b) of the Companies Act 1985 are wide enough to allow such facilities to be provided. This clause is intended to put it beyond doubt that they may be provided, up to the limits prescribed in section 154.

Amendment No. 10 concerns an issue that was not raised in Committee. Although I can sympathise with the concerns underlying it, I am not convinced that it is necessary. The Government are strongly in favour of employee share schemes and it is not our intention that employers who introduce such schemes should be required to be authorised. I believe that the existing exclusions in part III of schedule 1 are sufficient to achieve the desired result. I hope that, with that assurance, the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) will find it unnecessary to press his amendment.

Mr. Bryan Gould (Dagenham): I cannot help but notice that the new clause is tabled in the name of the Secretary of State, and I cannot continue without expressing, on behalf of, I am sure, the whole House, our most sincere condolences to him on his tragic loss today.

I was interested by the Minister's response to the point of order raised by the hon. Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark) and I was grateful to him for conceding that the length of our agenda and many of the amendments reflect the success of the Standing Committee in persuading the Government that some substantial amendments were required. That is a tribute to my right hon. and hon. Friends and other members of the Committee.

New clause 1 is curious. The Minister conceded that it is technical. It has little to do with the central purpose of the Bill. It is more a matter of company law than authorisation for investment business. I was grateful to the Minister for his brief explanation of what the new clause is meant to achieve.

The Minister was right to say that we debated employee share schemes in Committee. I expressed the clear view of the Labour party that we favour such schemes in principle. The Minister and others will recall, however, that we argued that the exclusion of such schemes, as provided by paragraph 19 of schedule 1, was rather far-reaching as employees in those circumstances were likely to be inexperienced investors and in a vulnerable context, as they would be subject to all of the pressures of superiors at work. They are also potentially at risk from people with some form of inside information. On that basis, we argued and divided the Committee, when we had the support of the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown). He voted in favour of an Opposition amendment which suggested that some form of independent advice ought to be provided in an employee share shop.

The Government opposed the amendment, partly on the ground that it would cost more money than was thought acceptable. I imagine that one of the purposes of new clause 1 is to authorise expenditure on setting up a share shop and I wonder whether the Minister has had a moment to reconsider his objection to our earlier amendment. Is he able to enlighten us? Is there anything implicit in the new clause which goes some way to removing his objections to what seemed to many of us a sensible limitation of employers' complete freedom when selling shares in their companies to their work force?

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): Amendment No. 10 was not intended to make a substantial change but to clarify a point. I am advised that paragraph 19 of schedule 1 is not clear enough about whether employee share schemes are included. It seems that the Government's intentions are clear but I am advised that the wording is rather too broad. Perhaps the Minister would be kind enough to explain why he believes that the matter is covered elsewhere to give us some argumentation.

Employee share schemes ought to be covered because a company which operates arrangements for employees or trustees who subscribe to or purchase shares, whether at the outset or on an exercise of options later, seems to fall clearly within paragraphs 12 and 13 of schedule 1. Paragraphs 15 and 16 would seem to apply to other activities which such a share scheme might require. The matter is not defined in the exclusions in clause 67, as is the case with occupational pension schemes.

We believe that if employee share schemes are to be included in paragraph 19 of schedule 1, that should be clear so that there can be no argument about it later. I should be satisfied if the Minister would explain why he thinks the matter is covered elsewhere.

Mr. Howard: Perhaps I may give the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) the explanation for which he has asked. We should consider, first, schemes which are operated by the company. The company may, for instance, create new shares to issue to its employees, or arrange for the transfer to them of existing shares, or grant them options. The first case is excluded from the definition of investment business by paragraph 23(3) of schedule 1, which covers the issue by a company of its own shares. The other two cases would both be covered by the exclusion in paragraph 19. This paragraph disapplies paragraphs 12 and 13 generally when the purpose is to facilitate transactions in shares between or for the benefit of employees and their dependants. Given the broad definition of "disposal" in paragraph 23(2), the allotment of shares to employees following the exercise of an option in this context would seem to be a transaction in shares for their benefit. It would therefore be excluded from the definition of investment business under the terms of the paragraph.

When a scheme is run by trustees, they will not benefit from the exclusion in paragraph 19, but unless the trustees are operating the scheme by way of business, the Bill will not apply to them, and no exclusion is necessary. That is why I asserted earlier that amendment No. 10 is not necessary.

I accept, however, that uncertainty is undesirable. The amendment would go too far, but I am prepared to consider whether the clause covers the hon. Gentleman's point completely. If it is necessary to provide greater clarity, I shall ensure that any necessary amendments are brought forward in another place.

I have to disappoint the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould), although I suspect that that will come as no great surprise to him. The purpose of the new clause is to facilitate the giving of certain assistance by employers in order to encourage share schemes for their employees and to enable them to spend money if they so wish in a manner in relation to which there is a certain amount of doubt in the present law. That does not begin to constitute a justification for the imposition of additional and unwanted burdens by way of expenses, which led me to oppose the hon. Gentleman's amendment in Committee, which was then the subject of considerable debate.

I fear that the new clause will not give the hon. Member for Dagenham much comfort, but I hope that it commends itself to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 2

Restriction of Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974

'(1) The Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974 shall have effect subject to the provisions of this section in cases where the spent conviction is for

(a) an offence involving fraud or other dishonesty; or

(b) an offence under legislation (whether or not of the United Kingdom) relating to companies (including insider dealing), building societies, industrial and provident societies, credit unions, friendly societies, insurance, banking or other financial services, insolvency, consumer credit or consumer protection.

(2) Nothing in section 4(1) (restriction on evidence as to spent convictions in proceedings) shall prevent the determination in any proceedings specified in Part I of Schedule (Restriction of Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974) to this Act of any issue, or prevent the admission or requirement in any such proceedings of any evidence, relating to a person's previous convictions for any such offence as is mentioned in subsection (1) above or to circumstances ancillary thereto.

(3) A conviction for any such offence as is mentioned in subsection (1) above shall not be regarded as spent for the purposes of section 4(2) (questions relating to an individual's previous convictions) if—

(a) the question is put by or on behalf of a person specified in the first column of Part II of that Schedule and relates to an individual (whether or not the person questioned) specified in relation to the person putting the question in the second column of that Part; and

(b) the person questioned is informed when the question is put that by virtue of this section convictions for any such offence are to be disclosed.

(4) Section 4(3)(b) (spent conviction not to be ground for excluding person from office, occupation etc.) shall not prevent a person specified in the first column of Part III of that Schedule from taking such action as is specified in relation to that person in the second column of that Part by reason, or partly by reason, of a spent conviction for any such offence as is mentioned in subsection (1) above of an individual who is—

(a) the person in respect of whom the action is taken;

(b) as respects action within paragraph 1 or 4 of that Part, an associate of that person; or

(c) as respects action within paragraph 1 of that Part consisting of a decision to refuse or revoke an order declaring a collective investment scheme to be an authorised unit trust scheme or a recognised scheme, the operator or trustee of the scheme or an associate of his, or of any circumstances ancillary to such a conviction or of a failure (whether or not by that individual) to disclose such a conviction or any such circumstances.

(5) Parts I, II and III of that Schedule shall have effect subject to Part IV.

(6) In this section and that Schedule "associate" means—

(a) in relation to a body corporate, a director, manager or controller;

(b) in relation to a partnership, a partner or manager;

(c) in relation to a registered friendly society, a trustee, manager of member of the committee of the society;

(d) in relation to an unincorporated association, a member of its governing body or an officer, manager or controller;

(e) in relation to an individual, a manager.

(7) This section and that Schedule shall apply to Northern Ireland with the substitution for the references to the said Act of 1974 and section 4(1), (2) and (3)(b) of that Act of references to the Rehabilitation of Offenders (Northern Ireland) Order 1978 and Article 5(1), (2) and (3)(b) of that Order.'.—[Mr. Howard.]

[Mr. Howard]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Howard: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following: amendment (a) to the new clause, in subsection 6(e) at end insert

'or employee who has contact with clients or prospective clients with a view to obtaining or soliciting orders on behalf of the investment business, advises clients or commits the investment business, for transactions in investments covered by Schedule 1, paragraphs 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 7 or 8.'.

Government amendments Nos. 232 and 273.

Mr. Howard: A few moments ago I omitted to say, on behalf of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, how grateful I was for the condolences offered by the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould). I am sure that all my right hon. and hon. Friends will wish to associate themselves with them.

In Committee, I undertook to bring before the House a partial disapplication of the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act. The clause and its related schedule fulfil that undertaking. The complexity and length of the provision indicate the care with which we have focused the disapplication. We have sought to ensure that relevant convictions will be disclosed and that the provisions of the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act will not prevent information about them from being used in appropriate cases when they call into question the fitness and properness of a person to carry on investment business.

But I have been equally mindful of Parliament's intentions in passing the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act and have sought to limit the disapplication, so as not unacceptably to undermine previous legislation passed by the House which significantly affects the rights of individual citizens. I have restricted the provision so that it concerns only individuals in certain senior positions, and then only in relation to certain offences.

The clause will affect sole traders, partners and those who hold or are to be appointed to senior positions in authorised businesses, or businesses which are applying for authorisation: the positions covered, broadly speaking, are those of director, manager or controller in a company, with appropriate modification for partnerships and unincorporated associations. I propose to follow broadly the definition of manager given in the Banking Act and have tabled an amendment to clause 163 to that effect. The House will see that, under this definition, only those near the top of the hierarchy of a business will be deemed to be managers. Persons holding the same position in companies which have, or apply for, official listing will be affected in the same way: so the new clause will replace clause 130 in the present text of the Bill which provides a less focused disapplication of the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act.

The limiting of a disapplication to those persons who hold these senior positions follows the precedent of the Banking Act. The disclosure of spent convictions by less senior employees of an authorised business would both deprive a large number of people of their rights under the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act and should anyway be unnecessary as their activities will be properly supervised by the management and directors of the authorised business.

Those who will be able to put questions about spent convictions include regulators, be they the Secretary of State, a designated agency, a self-regulating organisation or recognised professional body, the competent authority for listing and a business which is authorised or an applicant for authorisation or official listing.

One novel feature of this provision is that only certain types of spent convictions will need to be disclosed or may be taken into account when determining an application. These are convictions relating to fraud or dishonesty and to offences under specified legislation of a type related to financial services banking, credit, building societies and so on. It is spent convictions of this nature which may materially affect judgments about an individual's suitability to be in charge of an investment business. Other offences which are of less relevance to the financial services sector will be outside the scope of this clause and the usual provisions of the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act will apply.

Information about relevant spent convictions may be used in determining whether authorisation should be granted, a power of intervention used or employment of a particular individual prohibited. The competent authority may use such information to refuse an application for listing.

I should remind the House that the 1974 Act contains its own built-in safeguards. Convictions do not become spent until substantial prescribed periods have elapsed. Where a conviction results in a custodial sentence in excess of 30 months, it never becomes spent, nor will any other convictions be subsequently incurred. The Act also provides that in any proceedings before a judicial authority evidence relating to spent convictions may be admitted and required if the authority is satisfied that justice cannot otherwise be done. The Act defines "proceedings before a judicial authority" widely, and proceedings concerning authorisation or admission to listing would be covered. So convictions not covered by the specific disapplication which is the object of the current clause will still be able to be taken into account in appropriate circumstances.

I believe, therefore, that the new clause provides the right balance between the need to protect investors by ensuring that responsible authorities are fully aware of the relevant previous convictions of applicants and can take them into account, and the need to maintain important rights granted by Parliament under other legislation.

The amendment tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) raises a matter which I know to be of concern to the stock exchange. Current estimates suggest that several thousand, perhaps over 5,000, employees of stock exchange member firms will be registered traders and representatives and thus would be caught by the amendment. Many more employees of other investment businesses in similar lines of investment business but not employed by stock exchange firms will also be caught, because the text of the amendment is not confined to the stock exchange.

The amendment would substantially increase the number of those who would be deprived of their rights, given to them by Parliament, through the provisions of the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act. Such a wide-ranging disapplication runs counter to the intentions of the 1974 Act.

Those carrying on the activities described in the amendment will be employees of an authorised business.

They will be subject to the managerial controls of that business and should be properly supervised. There are also safeguards in the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act itself, to which I have just referred.

Whenever one draws a dividing line, one runs the risk of being told that it should have been drawn elsewhere, but I believe that the proposals in the new clause strike the right balance. This amendment would tip that balance too far and deprive too many individuals of their rights under the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act.

Mr. Gould: The Minister was right to remind the House that we debated this matter in Committee. Our short debate then showed clearly that the problem facing the Minister, which he has explained to us again this evening, was to balance two conflicting principles.

The first was the protection and rehabilitation of those who had committed offences. Indeed, that was very much the purpose that Parliament had in mind in passing the 1974 Act. In our debate, that point was stressed by the hon. Member for Chichester (Mr. Nelson). But running counter to that was the importance, in the interest of protecting investors, of making available to the regulatory authorities all the relevant information about those who were authorised. There is inescapably implicit in the notion of authorisation some form of statement by public or quasi-public authorities that the authorised persons have in a sense passed some test or have a clean bill of health. That makes the conflict between the Act's original intention and our quite proper concern for effective investor protection quite difficult to resolve.

The Minister has done an excellent job of drafting the new clause and the schedule. By limiting the class of offence to which the disapplication applies to crimes of dishonesty in relation to financial matters, by limiting the disapplication to procedures essentially created, or provided, by the Bill, and by fairly accurately defining the sorts of relationships between those entitled to ask the questions and those obliged to answer them, the Minister has properly limited the extent of the disapplication. As a consequence, the Minister has struck the right balance in what is clearly a difficult matter.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): The debate in Standing Committee underlined the fact that there is a conflict of principles. It is a question of balance and of judgment as to where one draws the line. When it comes down to it, I am more interested in protecting the investor than I am in protecting the former crook. One would not know from the debate that that is not a novel restriction. Immediately after the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act was passed, the Government introduced an exception order in 1975 containing exceptions for dealers in securities, insurance companies and authorised unit trusts.

The proposal in the new clause is not unprecedented. In one sense, it is narrower than the existing exceptions, and in another sense it is wider. The proposal is wider because it extends to all the investment business which is covered by the Bill, but narrower because the existing exceptions cover dealers in securities who are not necessarily principals in their firms.

The new clause extends only to directors, managers, partners and their equivalents. Those who will be in the front line dealing with investors may be partners, directors and managers, but often they will be employees. That will be the case in stockbroking firms, which is why the stock exchange has suggested this amendment. This will also be the case with life assurance salesmen. The stock exchange suggested the amendment because it is worried about the ambit of the new clause and because it believes that the parallel with the Banking Act 1979 is not realistic as the two businesses are different.

The stock exchange says about the Banking Act:

"This Act does not have the same aims as the Financial Services Bill, and deals with an area of business which is quite different from the securities industry. Banking and stockbroking are still quite different and it is very unusual for the employee of a bank to give advice to a member of the public or solicit business on a regular, day-to-day basis without referring to his superiors in the way that the employee of a stockbroking firm does."

The employee of a stockbroking firm gives advice to the public without referring to his superiors because he must take decisions quickly. There is no time to refer to a superior about investment advice when prices change regularly. He must make decisions at his discretion and off his own bat.

The stock exchange has a fair point. We should be a little worried about the lack of application of the new clause to life assurance salesmen who will be knocking on doors selling life policies. The Government have decided that there will be no register of life assurance salesmen, but a blacklist. If such information was available, we could compile a blacklist.

Mr. Anthony Nelson (Chichester): It is important in the context of debating the new clause to remember the atmosphere in which the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974 was introduced. Hon. Members who were in the House at that time will recall that there was much debate in Standing Committee and in the House to try to ensure that the extent of the restrictions was limited and that the ambit of that legislation was cast sufficiently wide to ensure that those who had spent convictions and had paid their debts to society could, in certain circumstances, start again and make new lives for themselves.

As hon. Members on the Standing Committee will know, I believe that that was a worthy objective and one that we should be circumspect about limiting. We must be clear about the ambit of restriction that we will provide in the new clause. Having said that, I pay tribute to my hon. and learned Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, who, in drafting the new clause, took account of the opinions on both sides of the Standing Committee about the matter. Although I may not lean to the same side of the balance as my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith), I believe that the Minister has struck a reasonable balance between the two conflicting objectives of the Bill and the previous legislation to try to restore and revitalise the opportunities to rehabilitate offenders.

Before we pass such a new clause, it is important to ask ourselves two questions. First, why are we seeking a restriction with regard to this form of activity? It might be argued in the context of other consumer legislation or other departmental legislation that there were similar grounds for restrictions in other parts of the 1974 Act. I would not wish the passage of the new clause to be considered as something to be built upon in other legislation, in terms of limiting the ambit or reducing the protection to rehabilitated offenders, provided under the 1974 Act. That must be seen as exceptional in the context of new legislation and not something to be extended or repeated elsewhere.

Secondly, it is reasonable to ask whether the rationale behind the new clause is that there is clear evidence that the rate of recidivism among those who have been convicted of fraudulent or other dishonest offences is significantly higher than in other areas. As my hon. and learned Friend the Minister said, the 1974 legislation applies to some and not all spent convictions. One would need to be satisfied in those areas where it applies that there was a danger to the public and that if the new clause was not passed the public would be at greater risk.

I ask my hon. and learned Friend the Minister how it will be apparent to individuals applying for authorisation to carry on a business that they will need to disclose such a spent conviction. Many people who have spent convictions under the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act, and are acutely aware of the provisions of that legislation, may be under the erroneous impression, despite the passage of the new clause, that they need not answer a question put to them by the regulatory authority or anyone else about whether they have had a past conviction. Such a question should be put by the authorising or regulatory authority only when it is seeking to give them authorisation to carry on a business. It must be made clear at that time that they are not covered, as they thought they were, by the terms of the 1974 Act. Otherwise, for genuine reasons, many people might unwittingly transgress the new legislation thinking that they are protected by the provisions of the 1974 Act.

I also ask my hon. and learned Friend whether the disclosure of a spent conviction for the purposes of the legislation necessarily means that the supervisory authority will not grant authorisation to that sole trader or business. It is exceedingly difficult to ask either the Secretary of State or the designated agency to say in some cases, "Although you have declared a past conviction, we nevertheless believe that it was not sufficiently serious or not so relevant to the business for which you are seeking authorisation that we must refuse your application."

In some cases, a sole trader setting up an investment business with such a spent conviction may have reasonable grounds for being allowed to proceed with such a business and it should not mean automatic disqualification. If it implies automatic disqualification, there will be a further disincentive on the individual to come clean about that.

Many of those points have been covered to some extent in the drafting of the new clause, and I commend it, as other hon. Members have, to the House. I refer to a representation made to me, which does not agree with my view but which refers to the amendment moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield. Today, I received a letter from the chairman of the Securities and Investments Board, which states:

"We believe that as presently worded the clause is too narrow in its scope since it would permit the non-disclosure of convictions by employees (and prospective employees) of authorised businesses, some of whom might be placed in positions of great trust and responsibility; and also by anyone seeking exempt (or appointed) representative status under Clause 41. There is obviously a difficult balance to be struck here between the interests of investors on the one hand and the underlying aims of the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act on the other, but we still feel that rather more weight should be given to the former, as was done in relation to securities businesses in the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974 (Exceptions) Order 1975."

For reasons that I have already adduced, I do not go along with that representation, but in all fairness it should be put before the House tonight.

8 pm

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): I do not want to prolong the debate, but I want to ask a question, although it does not specifically relate to the matters that we are dealing with under the Bill so far as we are not dealing with Lloyd's. Will the Minister explain whether the disclosure arrangements which would exist under the Bill, subject to the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974, have their parallel under the Lloyd's Act 1982? Are managing agents and operating officers within syndicates of Lloyd's required to comply with a similar provision? If not, to what extent is investor protection as adequately covered as it appears that it will be if the new clause were to have the approval of the House?

Mr. John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West): I rise briefly merely to say that I obviously respect the views put forward by my hon. Friend the Member for Chichester (Mr. Nelson) whose personal commitment and that of his family to the rehabilitation of offenders is well known to hon. Members. Nevertheless, I feel, rather as does my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith), that if we are to strike a balance, in these particular circumstances we must err on the side of caution since the people about whom we are talking will be dealing with other people's money, usually the money of relatively small investors and usually money which is on an extremely large scale for those investors. Therefore, I tend to agree with Sir Kenneth Berrill that we should err even more on the side of caution than my hon. and learned Friend the Minister suggests in the new clause.

Mr. Howard: First, I thank the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould), whose endorsement of the new clause was rather more enthusiastic than that of my hon. Friends. I am grateful too for the endorsement, however qualified, of my hon. Friend the Member for Chichester (Mr. Nelson) and I shall endeavour to respond to his three specific questions. First, I regret that I am not in a position to give him any of the statistics on recidivism which would assist him in formulating his position on the new clause. I doubt whether they are available, but whether they are or are not they are certainly not available to me this evening.

My hon. Friend's second question was whether someone would know that the 1974 Act was disapplied and that he was obliged to answer the questions being put to him. I think that my hon. Friend will find that that matter is specifically and expressly covered in paragraph 3*(b)* of the new clause, which provides that the person questioned has to be informed when the question is put that by virtue of the section convictions for any such offence are to be disclosed. I think that that covers my hon. Friend's point.

Thirdly, my hon. Friend asked whether the disclosure of such a conviction would amount to an automatic disqualification rather than simply something to be taken into account in assessing whether the applicant should be employed or authorised. There would be no question of automatic disqualification. The conviction would be a matter to be taken into account together with the rest of the record of antecedents and character of the person concerned. I hope that that satisfies my hon. Friend on those three questions.

Of course, I understand the concern which my hon. Friend drew to the the attention of the House, which has been put forward by the Securities and Investments Board and which was commended to the House by my hon. Friends the Members for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) and for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill). As I think everyone recognises, this is a difficult balance to strike. Clearly, it is not the sort of balance on which it is possible to please everyone. Had I pleased my hon. Friends the Members for Beaconsfield and for Bournemouth, West, I should not have pleased my hon. Friend the Member for Chichester, nor indeed the hon. Member for Dagenham. We have attempted to strike the best balance in our judgment. It is perhaps easier for the stock exchange or, indeed, the Securities and Investments Board, which tend, perfectly understandably, and properly from their point of view, to look at a question such as this from a particular point of view and to see only one side of the question or to see one side of the question in a much more immediate perspective than the other side.

We in this House have a duty to make a much more balanced judgment. It is incumbent upon us to take into account the policy considerations that led to the passing of the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act and to give them full weight in any judgment that we make. It is for that reason that I suggest that the proper balance is that which is represented by the new clause which I commend to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 3

POWERS OF ENTRY

'(1) A justice of the peace may issue a warrant under this section if satisfied on information on oath laid by or on behalf of the Secretary of State that there are reasonable grounds for believing—

(a) that an offence has been committed under section 4, 44, 52, 111, 114 or 141(2) or (3) above or section 1, 2, 4 or 5 of the Company Securities (Insider Dealing) Act 1985 and that there are on any premises documents relevant to the question whether that offence has been committed; or

(b) that there are on any premises owned or occupied by a person whose affairs, or any aspect of whose affairs, are being investigated under section 92 above documents whose production has been required under that section and which have not been produced in compliance with that requirement;

but paragraph (b) above applies only if the person there mentioned is an authorised person, a person whose authorisation has been suspended or who is the subject of a direction under section 32(1) (b) above or an appointed representative of an authorised person.

(2) A justice of the peace may issue a warrant under this section if satisfied on information on oath laid by an inspector appointed under section 81 above that there are reasonable grounds for believing that there are on any premises owned or occupied by—

(a) the manager, trustee or operator of any scheme the affairs of which are being investigated under subsection (1) of that section; or

(b) a manager, trustee or operator whose affairs are being investigated under that subsection, any documents whose production has been required under that section and which have not been produced in compliance with that requirement.

(3) A warrant under this section shall authorise a constable, together with any other person named in it and any other constables

(a) to enter the premises specified in the information, using such force as is reasonably necessary for the purpose;

(b) to search the premises and take possession of any documents appearing to be such documents as are mentioned in subsection (1)(a) or (b) or, as the case may be, in subsection (2) above or to take, in relation to any such documents, any other steps which may appear to be necessary for preserving them or preventing interference with them;

(c) to take copies of any such documents; and

(d) to require any person named in the warrant to provide an explanation of them or to state where they may be found.

(4) A warrant under this section shall continue in force until the end of the period of one month beginning with the day on which it is issued.

(5) Any documents of which possession is taken under this section may be retained

(a) for a period of three months; or

(b) if within that period proceedings to which the documents are relevant are commenced against any person for an offence under this Act or section 1, 2, 4 or 5 of the said Act of 1985, until the conclusion of those proceedings.

(6) Any person who obstructs the exercise of any rights conferred by a warrant issued under this section or fails without reasonable excuse to comply with any requirement imposed in accordance with subsection (3)(d) above shall be guilty of an offence and liable—

(a) on conviction on indictment, to a fine;

(b) on summary conviction, to a fine not exceeding the statutory maximum.

(7) The functions to which section 96 above applies shall include the functions of the Secretary of State under this section; but if any of those functions are transferred under that section the transfer may be subject to a reservation that they are to be exercisable by the Secretary of State concurrently with the designated agency and, in the case of functions exercisable by virtue of subsection (1)(a) above, so as to be exercisable by the agency subject to such conditions or restrictions as the Secretary of State may from time to time impose.

(8) In the application of this section to Scotland the references to a justice of the peace shall include references to a sheriff and for references to the laying of information on oath there shall be substituted references to furnishing evidence on oath; and in the application of this section to Northern Ireland for references to the laying of information on oath there shall be substituted references to making a complaint on oath.

(9) In this section "documents" includes information recorded in any form and, in relation to information recorded otherwise than in legible form, references to its production include references to producing a copy of the information in legible form.'—[Mr. Howard.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Howard: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

I shall have a word with the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) and answer the point that he made in the previous debate. I apologise for not having done so during the course of the debate.

During the debate in Committee on amendments tabled by the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) on powers of entry, I undertook to look again at the matter, and this new clause has been tabled to make provision for search warrants to be issued by justices of the peace on the Secretary of State's application. There are precedents for our proposals in the Prevention of Fraud (Investments) Act 1958, which is to be replaced by this Bill, and in the Companies Act 1985.

[Mr. Howard]

Warrants may be issued with a view to obtaining documents in three types of case. The first relates to suspected offences. The corresponding provision in the Prevention of Fraud (Investments) Act relates only to breaching the restrictions on advertising. That is too narrow and the new clause therefore also embraces a number of other offences concerning unauthorised investment business, misleading statements and practices, restrictions on promoting insurance contracts, unlisted securities and insider dealing.

The second and third types of case covered by the clause are designed to reinforce the investigation powers in clause 92, when investigating authorised and certain other persons, and in clause 81. If these powers are used to require the production of documents which are not produced in compliance with the requirement, a search warrant may be issued. A corresponding provision exists in section 448 of the Companies Act, designed to reinforce the power to obtain documents in section 447.

We have considered carefully whether to limit the exercise of these powers in relation to entering the premises of third parties. A limitation is not considered appropriate where a criminal offence is suspected, but use of the power to reinforce an investigation under clauses 81 or 92 may only permit entry of premises owned or occupied by the person under investigation, or by the manager, trustee or operator of a collective investment scheme.

The new clause provides for the powers which a warrant may authorise the police and other named persons to exercise, including the power to seize documents, and to demand explanations of them. Obstruction is to be an offence.

The Secretary of State's function of applying to a justice of the peace for a search warrant is one which may be transferred to the designated agency. The normal criteria for transferring functions will have to be met, and the Secretary of State may also impose conditions and restrictions on how the function is to be exercised in the case of a suspected offence. We consider that these are sufficient safeguards for applications by the agency, which will, like the Secretary of State, have to satisfy the justice of the peace that there are reasonable grounds for believing that relevant documents are on the premises in question. It would be cumbersome if the agency had to ask the Secretary of State to make applications for search warrants on its behalf, and delay would carry the risk of documents being moved or destroyed. It would be possible for the Secretary of State to retain the ability to apply for a warrant without affecting the agency's powers to do so.

The Government believe that these new powers, founded on precedents in other legislation, will improve the effectiveness of the new regulatory regime.

Mr. Gould: The new clause is a welcome recognition of the fact that the powers hitherto provided by section 14(8) of the Prevention of Fraud (Investments) Act 1958 are still necessary.

The Minister was right to recall that in Committee I tabled an amendment to the same effect, but not so expertly drafted as the new clause. At that point the Minister took the view that clause 92 provided adequate powers, but I gather from what he now says that he recognises that a power of entry into premises is important. That is the view that we took at the time. We argued that, particularly in today's circumstances, it was of immense importance, when dealing with hardened unscrupulous criminals, that it should be possible to insist on entry to make a search, and that if that power was thought to be necessary in 1958, it was much more necessary today.

The Minister agreed with the suggestion of my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) to consult the Securities and Investments Board about this matter. I am glad that the SIB is to have a concurrent power in this matter. The Minister's consultations with the SIB have produced a welcome outcome.

We perhaps raise an eyebrow at the limitation of the right to enter premises occupied by third parties, but I understand the Minister's reasoning for that. In broad terms we are satisfied that this power, for which we argued so strongly in Committee, is now to find a place in the Bill.

Mr. Nelson: The new clause marks a significant extension of the powers of investigation, which I welcome generally, in aid of the protection of investors.

First, I understood my hon. and learned Friend the Minister to say, and it is my understanding from the terms of the new clause, that the claim for a warrant comes into effect only where the request to disclose documents has not been satisfied. Can he confirm that that is correct? I cannot imagine many circumstances, for example, in a case of suspected insider dealing, where an individual who is asked to produce his stock contracts to show whether he has been engaged in share transactions and refuses will leave those contracts lying around long enough for a warrant to be issued and a search to be made. I am not sure whether it is intended that the powers can be invoked and a warrant issued before the other means of investigation have been satisfied.

Like the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould), I am pleased that these powers can be applied concurrently by the SIB — the designated agency. That leaves a necessary option open which will ensure that the SIB has the means and ability to do its job, not just to supervise academically.

My second question relates to the relevance of the new clause to unauthorised persons. I am not entirely clear whether, under subsection (1), the powers to request a warrant apply only in the case of authorised businesses. What is the position for a suspected unauthorised person who may be committing a criminal offence under these provisions? What is the position for any individual, authorised or unauthorised, who may be committing the criminal offence of insider dealing? As I understand it, the power to claim a warrant in such circumstances is already provided for in separate legislation. Will my hon. and learned Friend clarify that this right to claim a warrant applies in all cases, not just those of authorised businesses?

Mr. Campbell-Savours: This debate gives the House an opportunity to have an early shot at one of the more controversial areas of the Bill. The issue is not so much the powers, which the majority of hon. Members accept as being important if the protection of investors is to be upheld and the law is to be complied with, but whether it is right that a private organisation should be able to exercise such powers in our society. I know of no precedent for this.

It is important to establish for those outside that the SIB is a private company. A private company which is no different from Securior or a private policeman will police the City. [Interruption.] We have discussed the matter at length over 22 sittings in Committee, and during the past few months most of the arguments behind the scenes have been about that or the question of immunity, about which the Minister has been more flexible and has, perhaps, produced a reasonable alternative.

8.15 pm

Clause 93 states:

"The Secretary of State may authorise any officer of his or any other competent person to exercise on his behalf all or any of the powers conferred by section 92."

Basically the Secretary of State is allowing a private company to exercise these considerable responsibilities. Therefore, under the new clause a private company will be allowed to apply to a justice of the peace to secure a warrant, and with that warrant it will be able to enter "on any premises owned or occupied by a person whose affairs, or any aspect of whose affairs, are being investigated under section 92."

That is a substantial power to give to a private organisation, and I must register my strong objection at this stage. It is not that we wish to vote against the matter tonight we do not have the time to do so because we have many amendments and important matters to discuss —but this area shows up the deficiencies that lie at the heart of the legislation.

Mr. Howard: I am grateful for the support for the new clause extended by the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) and my hon. Friend the Member for Chichester (Mr. Nelson).

The answer to my hon. Friend is that it is not necessary, contrary to his understanding, that a prior request should have been made for the documents if an offence is suspected and a justice of the peace is satisfied that there are grounds for believing that the documents are on the premises concerned. The answer to the questions about whose premises may be entered pursuant to the powers granted in the new clause, where an offence is suspected of the type that is identified in subsection (1) of the new clause, is that anyone's premises may be entered. I hope that those two answers reassure my hon. Friend.

I have no desire to cross swords with the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours), particularly at this early stage in our proceedings. I make no apology for the fact that these powers are to be entrusted to a private body. As I made plain repeatedly in Committee, it is my firm conviction that the role that is to be entrusted to a private body under the legislation will be discharged the more effectively because it is a private body. To suggest, as the hon. Gentleman did, that the private body would be just like Securicor, which was his analogy, is fanciful. Before the private body was designated by the Secretary of State it would have to satisfy exacting criteria prescribed in the legislation. This provides a real safeguard of the responsibility of the private body to which these powers could be entrusted.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): If the Minister is thinking along the lines that the power of investigation of this new body can be enhanced by these new powers of search and seize, will he consider extending similar powers to Lloyd's or to other self-regulating bodies for the investigation of insurance frauds?

Mr. Howard: We are not concerned with Lloyd's or with other self-regulating bodies in the new clause or in the legislation, and I have given the reasons for that. I have carefully considered the points that were raised during our proceedings in Committee and I have been persuaded that it is appropriate for powers of this kind to be preferred. I commend the new clause to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 5

EXEMPTION FROM LIABILITY FOR DAMAGES

'(1) Neither a recognised self-regulating organisation nor any of its officers or servants or members of its governing body shall be liable in damages for anything done or omitted in the discharge or purported discharge of any functions to which this subsection applies unless the act or omission is shown to have been in bad faith.

(2) The functions to which subsection (1) above applies are the functions of the organisation so far as relating to, or to matters arising out of

(a) the rules, practices, powers and arrangements of the organisation to which the requirements in paragraphs 1 to 6 of Schedule 2 to this Act apply;

(b) the obligations with which paragraph 7 of that Schedule requires the organisation to comply;

(c) any guidance issued by the organisation;

(d) the powers of the organisation under section 49(2), 59(4) or 92(2)(a) above; or

(e) the obligations to which the organisation is subject by virtue of this Act.

(3) Neither a designated agency nor any member, officer or servant of a designated agency shall be liable in damages for anything done or omitted in the discharge or purported discharge of the functions exercisable by the agency by virtue of a delegation order unless the act or omission is shown to have been in bad faith.

(4) Neither the competent authority nor any member, officer, or servant of that authority shall be liable in damages for anything done or omitted in the discharge or purported discharge of any functions of the authority under Part IV of this Act unless the act or omission is shown to have been in bad faith.

(5) The functions to which subsections (1) and (3) above apply also include any functions exercisable by a recognised self-regulating organisation or designated agency on behalf of another body by virtue of arrangements made pursuant to paragraph 4(2) of Schedule 2, paragraph 3(2) of Schedule 3 and paragraph 3(2) of Schedule 5 to this Act.'.—[Mr. Howard.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Howard: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): With this it will be convenient to discuss also the following: amendment (b) to the new clause, in subsection (1), after "damages", insert—

'at the suit of any member of the self-regulating organisation or of any person, whether authorised or not, whom the organisation is authorised by this Act to investigate or supervise'.

Amendment (a), after subsection (2), insert—

'(2A) Neither a recognised professional body nor any member, officer or servant of that body shall be liable in damages for anything done or omitted in the discharge or purported discharge of the functions exercisable by the body by virtue of a recognition order unless the act or omission is shown to have been in bad faith.'.

Amendment (c), after subsection (2), insert—

'(2A) Neither a recognised professional body nor any of its officers or servants or members of its governing body shall be liable for damages or purported discharge of any functions to which this subsection applies unless the act or omission is shown to have been in bad faith.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker]

(2B) The function to which subsection (2A) above applies are the functions of the body so far as relating to, or to matters arising out of

(a) the rules, practices, powers and arrangements of the body to which the requirements in section 18(2) apply;

(b) any guidance issued by the body;

(c) the powers of the body under section 49(2) or 92(2) (a) above; or

(d) the obligations to which the body is subject by virtue of this Act.'.

Government amendments Nos. 42, 44, 161, 179 and 230.

Mr. Howard: This new clause touches upon a matter that has perhaps aroused a degree of controversy since the Government's decision was announced. The new clause is of considerable importance and it is appropriate for me to speak about it at greater length than I have spoken about the new clauses that we have so far considered.

When we debated this matter in Committee I said, and no doubt I shall be reminded of it, that in principle regulators should be liable for damages and that the onus was on those who favoured immunity to make the case for it. I remain of that view. I was not then convinced that a case had been made for granting immunity for recognised self-regulatory organisations. However, consistent with the open-minded and receptive attitude that I hope the House will think I have sought to display throughout the proceedings, I am now convinced that the case has been made for doing so.

Mr. Gould The Minister feels that his conversion is consistent with an open-minded attitude, but is it consistent with the principle that he expressed in Committee?

Mr. Howard: Of course it is. Principles must govern our approach to these things, and it is in the application of those principles that flexibility is appropriate. I shall seek to explain to the House why I have changed my view. I would not have been prepared to consider granting immunity to recognised self-regulatory organisations unless I believed that it was necessary to do so to ensure the effective enforcement of the Bill's provisions. On reflection, I have come to the view that immunity along the lines proposed will significantly strengthen the Bill.

Two factors led me to that conclusion. The first is that, if regulation is to be effective, a recognised self-regulating organisation needs to be able to act swiftly and decisively, sometimes on less than conclusive evidence, if it seems necessary to do so in the interest of investors. However, its financial resources will often be smaller than those of its members or others affected by its actions. There is a real risk that the prospect of a number of large claims for damages would deter a recognised self-regulating organisation from taking the actions that it believed to be necessary. That would not be in the interests of investors.

Mr. Budgen: It seems to be put abroad by the stock exchange that every time, with the benefit of hindsight, that it could be said that a judgment was mistaken, that would lead to a successful claim for negligence. If it was obvious to a judge that a regulatory authority had to move swiftly and decisively, he would have that factor in mind. That would lead to his saying that there had not been negligence. It is right, is it not, that the stock exchange has no immunity, but has never been successfully sued?

Mr. Howard: Everything that my hon. Friend says is correct. The fact that speedy action had to be taken would be taken into account in assessing whether the regulating organisation had been negligent. What my hon. Friend said about the record of the stock exchange is also true. However, he underestimates the inhibition under which an organisation of this kind may labour if at every turn, and whenever it has to make a difficult decision of this kind, it has to contemplate the possibility of action. That is at the heart of this matter. The stress and demands on the financial resources of the self-regulating organisations that are likely to arise through litigation, even if, ultimately, the regulating organisation were to be successful in that litigation, also have to be taken into account.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Perhaps the Minister could clarify his response to the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen), who asked about the stock exchange. I understand that the stock exchange produced a report on the Westland affair and the trading of shares. I also understand that it was not able to publish that document for fear of litigation and a series of actions. That document has still not been published. Is that not an example of how the fear of litigation is enough to quell the keenness of an organisation to pursue what is right and proper?

Mr. Howard: I hope that the hon. Member for Workington and the House will forgive me if I do not yield to the temptation to comment on specific cases. As a general principle, there is little doubt that the principle which I have put before the House and which, I think, is endorsed by the hon. Member for Workington undoubtedly applies.

Mr. Bermingham: Does the Minister not agree that the mere threat of litigation acts as a form of discipline? If one is answerable for one's decisions, one tends to take them carefully.

Mr. Howard: The hon. Gentleman leaves out of account the nature of the decision that a regulating organisation has to take. The important thing is that it should not be inhibited from taking action. It is not simply a question of making sure that the action that it takes is correct, but the fact that the action needs to be taken very often on information that is less than 100 per cent. accurate. No doubt a regulating organisation would like it to be 100 per cent. accurate. It may be less than wholly convincing, perhaps flawed, but nevertheless it may justify the self-regulating organisation in taking immediate action. The prospect of litigation brought by big battalions with large pockets may well inhibit the taking of that kind of effective action in the circumstances that we are postulating.

Mr. Ashdown: Why did the Minister not respond earlier with that sort of argument? The case was put to him in precisely the same terms in Committee and it took the arm twisting—no other phrase is appropriate—of a sitting in order to make him move position. In Committee he did not listen to precisely the same argument to which he is now responding.

Mr. Howard: The hon. Member for Workington's reading of the situation is much more perceptive and accurate than the construction that the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) seeks to place on it. Of course one listens, but one is not necessarily convinced immediately.

One reflects upon the argument, and in some circumstances one reaches a more mature and wiser conclusion.

Mr. Butterfill: Does my hon. and learned Friend agree that perhaps ISRO is a far better example than the stock exchange? Decisions can be taken involving hundreds of millions of pounds or dollars. In cases like that, if ISRO were liable, it could not possibly function.

Mr. Howard: My hon. Friend is absolutely right.

I shall now pass on to the second factor of which I have taken account in arriving at my view on this matter. I make no apology for drawing it to the attention of the House, because it is a factor to which any responsible person making judgments on these issues would have to give a great deal of weight. As it became clear on considering this matter, there is a real danger that individuals might be reluctant to work for, or serve on, the governing bodies of RSROs if there were a risk of a personal liability in damages for actions undertaken in good faith. It is essential — I hope that this at least will be common ground — if self-regulation is to work properly that RSROs should employ and be run by people of the highest calibre. Anything that would deter such people from joining RSROs could seriously affect the effectiveness of the organisations in regulating investment business. This would clearly be an undesirable development which we should avoid if at all possible.

8.30 pm

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): The Committee went in great detail into the questions of who are fit and proper persons and who should run these organisations. My hon. and learned Friend gave me an extremely learned letter from his Department about who was a fit and proper person. However, a further question arises here. Does the act or omission by anybody within such an organisation have to be shown to have been in bad faith? That leads us to the alternative question that arises in connection with acts or omissions that amount to negligence. If my hon. Friend cannot answer now, perhaps he will let me have a note about whether this matter could be dealt with by insurance arrangements, whether inquiries have been made as to what the potential liability would be, and whether it would not have been possible for the self-regulatory organisations to arrange insurance in those circumstances.

Mr. Howard: I am happy to promise my hon. Friend that I shall let him have a note on those matters, although I cannot promise that it will be as long and as learned as that which he received on the definition of "fit and proper". I can give him some preliminary signs. There is no doubt that inquiries were made about the availability of insurance, and it is no secret that the availability of insurance in this sector is becoming increasingly difficult and expensive. I put the matter in modest terms as a preliminary response, and I shall endeavour to add to it when I write to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Budgen: Might there not have been a case for giving some form of temporary immunity, or partial immunity, so that when the Act, if the Bill is passed, and the insurance matter have settled down it might be possible to see that the regulators are insured? If it is not possible for them to be insured, it might not be possible to have a system of private regulation of this market.

Mr. Howard: My hon. Friend makes a tempting point, but the absence of insurance was not the only factor that weighed with me. As I have sought to explain, there were a number of factors, and, even if insurance were available, it would not have met all the factors that I have identified.

For those reasons, I came to the conclusion that it would be right to grant RSROs an immunity similar to that which was in any event provided for the designated agency and the competent authority. This new clause brings all the immunity provisions in the Bill together, and clause 118(9) and schedule 7, paragraph 3, are therefore to be deleted. In each case the immunity is granted to the body itself and to its officers and servants for any acts or omissions in discharge or purported discharge of certain functions — effectively, the functions which they perform in maintaining the regulatory structure for which the Bill provides. The immunity is restricted to an immunity from liability for damages, and it does not apply when an act or omission can be shown to be in bad faith.

The proposed immunity will still leave interested parties with the possibility of redress. Investors who have suffered loss as a result of a business breaching an RSRO's rules will still be able to sue the business for damages, and compensation schemes will be available. Members of an organisation will be able to use the organisation's appeals procedures against unfair decisions. It will still be possible to seek a declaration setting out the rights and wrongs of the situation or an injunction to stop or prevent an unlawful act or requiring an RSRO to act lawfully. Damages can still be sought where an act or omission is the result of bad faith.

In the light of the immunity conferred under the new clause, the second half of clause 14(7) is no longer appropriate, and it is deleted by amendment No. 42. Amendment No. 44 similarly deletes the second half of clause 20(5). A failure to provide information required by clause 14 or 20 will still provide grounds for revocation of a recognition order or in the case of an RSRO the exercise of the Secretary of State's or designated agency's intermediate sanctions. Amendment No. 161 has the effect that the same consequences would follow from a failure to provide information required under clause 91.

I believe that the balance that we have struck should remove lingering fears on the part of potential RSROs while leaving adequate remedies in place for aggrieved parties. I commend the proposals to the House.

My hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) and the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan) have proposed that recognised professional bodies should have a similar immunity, but that suggestion overlooks, it seems to me, the differences that there will be between RPBs and RSROs. The RPBs will be regulating a much narrower range of business on a much smaller scale than will RSROs. The prospect of a number of large claims against an RPB is therefore much smaller than in the case of an RSRO. In these circumstances, I do not believe that it would be appropriate to extend immunity to RPBs. Further, it would certainly be anomalous for RPBs to have immunity when they are incidental aspects of their members' business when they do not have it, and do not appear to have needed it, in relation to the regulation of their members' mainstream professional practice.

The hon. Member for Dagenham suggested that an RSRO should still be liable for damages to investors, but this could still leave it at risk from a number of large claims. A regulator will face a number of difficult choices in deciding when to act. One of the most difficult issues is deciding when to remove a business's authorisation, particularly on solvency grounds. The situation is rarely clear-cut. There are always arguments that, given another week or so, more capital can be found or a valuable asset sold and the problem will be resolved. The interests of existing clients and others already dealing with a business will often suffer if authorisation is removed, but such action may nevertheless be necessary to prevent harm to future clients.

Existing clients and those dealing with a business would, of course, suffer more seriously if the business collapsed, but they may claim that the supervisor's action was unnecessary and that the business would not have collapsed if given more time. They might then bring an action for damages against the supervisor on the ground that their loss was the direct result of the supervisor's intervention. The parties bringing such an action might themselves be large financial businesses — the big battalions of the international financial world. For example, a United States securities firm might use a British RSRO member to manage its clients United Kingdom portfolio. If the RSRO expelled the British business, or stopped it undertaking particular activities, because of concern about its solvency, the US firm might sue the RSRO for the loss that it suffered as a result — for example, of missed opportunities or damage to reputation. This threat could be a very serious one, and could put the RSRO's future at risk.

Supervisors should not have such a threat hanging over them when taking difficult decisions. If they have, the quality and effectiveness of regulation and the interests of investors will suffer. As I have explained, investors will still be able to claim against a business which had broken the rules or, if appropriate, the compensation fund, and I do not believe that the proposed immunity will seriously affect their interests.

Mr. Bermingham: Can the hon. and learned Gentleman explain the difference between a supervisor or a regulator in those circumstances and a liquidator acting either under a debenture or some other power? The liquidator or receiver is equally liable for his actions, his misfeasances and the mistakes that he makes. Why is the regulator in a different position?

Mr. Howard: There are two answers to that question. First, I do not believe that liquidators operate in the same kind of world that we are contemplating in the context of this legislation. I do not believe that they run the risk in the same way of actions being brought or threatened by the largest financial battalions in the world which might well be able to use the very power of mounting effective and expensive litigation to bring pressure to bear on the regulators.

Secondly, and on a purely practical basis, so far as I am aware no one has refused to act as a liquidator because immunity of this kind is not available. But, as I said earlier, I make no apology for the fact that if we are to get an effective regulatory system in operation, it is essential that we get people of the right calibre to accept the responsibilities of serving on these organisations. That is not a difficulty that is encountered in the context of liquidators, but it most certainly is a difficulty encountered in this context.

Mr. Ashdown: The Minister's comments have been very revealing. The reason for this remarkale Pauline conversion — no doubt the result of this time bomb that has been ticking away in his head as a result of the arguments advanced in Committee — is revealed as being brought about the refusal of the SROs to recruit people to be their officers and members unless such immunities have been granted. In other words, his arm has been twisted to change his mind.

Mr. Howard: The hon. Gentleman fails to understand the position. The fact that it was important to ensure that people of the right calibre were prepared to serve on the SROs was a matter that I took into account. I suggest that anyone who failed to take that into account would have been utterly irresponsible.

I have also reflected on the other arguments that were put in Committee, which I have summarised this evening. It is on a totality of those considerations that I suggest that the view that I presently take is to be preferred to the view that I expressed in Committee.

Mr. Gould: Listening to the debate, I had the sense of watching one of those courtly dances, where at a given moment in the tune the dancers suddenly exchange positions and take up those formerly occupied by their partners. The Minister's manoeuvre has been so bewildering that one is entitled to ask who is calling the tune. The hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) is right to suggest that the Minister has changed his mind in such a bewildering way because he has been got at by extremely powerful interests in the City. They have done so in such a way, and so thoroughly, as to call into question something that had hitherto been common ground, at least within the Committee — the desirability of self-regulation.

The Minister fairly recalled that the whole question of immunity for SROs was raised through an amendment tabled by myself. We pointed out that for very good reasons immunity had been granted to the Securities and Investments Board or to the designated agency, and we felt that it was equally necessary in respect of the SROs. That view was supported across the Committee, although not by every hon. Member. Indeed, I seem to recall that the hon. Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill)— who has also done his little minuet — was very much opposed to any form of immunity, let alone the blanket immunity now proposed in the new clause. However, there was all-party support for some form of immunity, and that in turn was given powerful support by a campaign mounted by the SROs and the SIB.

The case advanced by myself and others who spoke in favour of immunity was to the effect that without it any SRO would be inhibited — indeed, frustrated — in the performance of its duties not by the constant threat of being liable for vast damages but by the real possibility of the issuing of writs and so on. We felt that the SRO would simply find itself incapable of proceeding against those whom it was its duty to regulate. It therefore seemed to us to be extremely important that, if we were to place reliance on the SROs, they should not be frustrated from the outset by being put at risk as a result of actions by those whom they were meant to be regulating.

8.45 pm

The Minister's reaction was to say:

"In principle, regulators should be liable for damages."

We advanced the argument that that was indeed a good principle, but that there was a countervailing principle which meant that in the interests of effective regulation the SROs needed a limited immunity. The Minister later returned to the argument when he said:

"It is common ground between us that self-regulating organisations should not have immunity from suit on the part of investors." [Official Report, Standing Committee E, 11 February 1986; c. 174, 182.]

That was something with which I readily agreed, but the whole burden and thrust of my argument was that it was immunity at the suit of those who were supposed to be regulated that was important and desirable.

Yet, after these firm statements of principle and agreement with me about the importance of absence of immunity in the case of actions brought by investors, the Minister is suddenly converted not only to the idea of immunity against those who are to be regulated: he also abandons the common ground that he had sought with me and staked out. He now says that there should be not only immunity of the sort covered by the amendment but a blanket immunity that will extend to actions from any quarter, including actions brought by small investors who may well feel aggrieved at some glaring dereliction of duty on the part of an SRO.

It may be that the Minister was so appalled by the admission that he made to the Committee, elicited from him by a question by my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours), that he was prepared to contemplate SROs going bankrupt—that he has now swung around entirely in order to expunge from his memory the fact that he ever made such an astonishing confession.

But, for whatever reason, I believe that the Minister has now trod a path that we know is fraught with difficulties and danger. In Committee, I drew attention to the provisions of the Lloyd's Act, and reminded the Committee that when Lloyd's piloted its own private Bill through the House it had strongly argued for immunity on the ground that I was prepared to argue for—that it needed that immunity in order to be an effective regulator. In other words, it needed to be able to be tough with those in respect of whom it was entrusted with the duty of regulating, without being threatened with action.

I pointed out that Lloyd's was tempted—I suspect more than tempted and, indeed, set about—to use that immunity in the case of the PCW scandal not in order to be a more effective regulator but to protect itself against its own failures as a regulator. It would use that immunity to prevent any action brought by aggrieved investors in the PCW syndicates who believed that Lloyd's had fallen down in its duty.

The clear view of many people is that Lloyd's did fall down in its duty, and, while one does not necessarily have unlimited sympathy for Lloyd's members, it is entirely right that where they lose money through the clear failures of the supervisory authority they ought to be able to turn to that authority for recompense if—here I associate myself with the telling point made by the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen)—they can make their case in the court. That is not as easy as it seems. It is difficult to think of individuals who have been able successfully to sue bodies of that nature for regulatory failures. That must tell us something about the balance of power and of probability in such circumstances.

Mr. Butterfill: Mention has been made of the PCW names at Lloyd's and it is suggested that it is proven that the case resulted because of a failure by the regulator. I believe that it is far from proven. The information that I have heard suggests that it was not due to a failure by the regulator but because the syndicates of which they were a part took extremely ill-advised underwriting business. It was high-risk business, no doubt for high rewards. It seems that an attempt is being made to evade responsibilities in the underwriting of that business.

Mr. Gould: We could have a long debate about the rights and wrongs of the PCW affair. I believe that investors lost money through fraud and theft and then through ill-advised business, undertaken to maximise premium income to cover the tracks of those criminals. All of that took place under a supervisory regime for which Lloyd's was responsible. But that is not the point. The point is whether we should enact, as we did in the case of Lloyd's, a provision which prevents PCW investors from resolving in the courts the debate which the hon. Gentleman and I have just had. Should we say that the PCW investors should be precluded from having their day in court to establish their case?

Mr. Budgen: Can the hon. Gentleman confirm to those outside that if a plaintiff fails against a regulatory authority the cost of bringing the proceedings is likely to be large and, having failed, he will have to bear not only his own but the defendant's costs?

Mr. Gould: The point is well taken. There is another explanation, one assumes, for the relative rarity of such actions.

One could elaborate the case at length, but I do not propose to do that. I want to raise the general principle at the heart of the issue. If self-regulating organisations are to be made immune from suit, from whatever quarter, the nature of the self-regulation with which we have imagined that we are dealing is misunderstood. We have imagined that the self-regulating organisations are an instrument for exercising statutory powers and that they exist because they have particular expertise and the ability to monitor activities day by day.

That type of self-regulation is suddenly revealed by such a measure not to exist. Under the provision we are confronted with self-regulation on the bad old model where self-regulation is undertaken by groups or professional cliques whose real purpose is to defend the interests of their own members against the outside public. Such a provision will make it impossible to break down the wall built around those organisations, which will be impregnable by the outside investor.

If we were to enact the provision, the self-regulation which we have hitherto been prepared to support would become a much different proposition. We could not easily tolerate a City regulated by bodies against which there was no possibility of sanction by those who would lose as a consequence of their failures.

In drawing the line between actions brought by members, or the regulators, and actions brought by investors and members of the public, I am not excluding the possibility that very large investors with very deep pockets might sue self-regulating organisations. That was a possibility which a few months ago the Minister was prepared to contemplate.

[Mr. Gould]

The difficulty is that the Minister must now make a choice. Does he provide effective investor protection for the small investor, or is he so mesmerised by the possibility of large investors threatening self-regulating organisations that he is prepared to throw investor protection out of the window? That is the consequence of the new clause.

The investor who wishes to sue the self-regulating organisation will limit his argument in such a way as not to threaten the continued viability of that self-regulating organisation. That is not achieved by any of the proposed amendments. The Minister should be able to come up with a solution which would provide a balance between protecting the self-regulating organisations and protecting the interests of the investor. If he cannot do that, the notion of using self-regulating organisations to carry out the purpose must be re-examined.

If the Minister believes that self-regulating organisations need to be protected against actions for damages by anybody, one must conclude that self-regulating organisations are not the appropriate instrument for carrying out that function. That is the essential question which must be answered. That is why we believe that the Minister's conversion, while welcome to the extent that we had urged it upon him, has gone too far. The Minister has not adequately explained why he has so demonstrably changed his position.

Mr. Bermingham: Does my hon. Friend agree that, if the Minister has been converted — I use the word advisedly because I suspect that he does not know where the road from Jerusalem to Damascus really is—could it be because of his fear of the multinational financial institutions? If that is so, perhaps the regulation should be by Government bodies rather than private bodies.

Mr. Gould: My hon. Friend is right. That is the conclusion that I arrived at. If the contest between the self-regulating organisations and the large City investors, who in most cases will be members, is so unequal, it is hard to see how the self-regulating organisations can bear the weight of the burden.

Mr. Budgen: I am not sure that the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) has persuaded me that it would be right to grant immunity to the regulated. It is difficult to draw a line between the regulated—particularly the big regulated—and those who are also investors. That is particularly difficult since we now have a multiplicity of capacities in the City. It is difficult to see, when an organisation might be a clearing bank, a stockbroker and a stock jobber, how one can precisely describe it as a big investor or a person regulated by the authority.

We are not really talking about that tonight. We are talking about whether the Government are wise to grant blanket immunity to all persons who have to deal with the self-regulatory authority. I am grateful to my hon. and learned Friend for the courteous way in which he gave way to me as he expounded his only two reasons for saying that his previous view had changed.

I agree with my hon. and learned Friend that the presumption should be against immunity. I shall not repeat the two questions that I put to him, although I did not receive a satisfactory answer. I therefore conclude that the Government have been very unwise in general and political terms in granting this blanket immunity to a self-regulatory authority. They allowed Lloyd's blanket immunity through the Lloyd's Act. Plenty of hon. Members say in the Lobbies that they wished that the Government had not granted that blanket immunity because it has not been used as a means of making Lloyd's a straighter or more efficient organisation. It is seen by many to be more of a shield than a sword.

It must be remembered that a special privilege was granted to the stock exchange in 1983. I was opposed to the Parkinson-Goodison deal because I thought it wrong to take pending litigation out of the ambit of the courts. The restrictive practices of the stock exchange should have been considered by the Restrictive Practices Court. Plenty of people share that view. Perhaps I am wrong, but it appears politically unwise to grant to the stock exchange another great privilege—[Interruption.]. I have failed to satisfy my right hon. and hon. Friends that it is unwise to grant one's friends these great privileges.

I wish to direct a few words towards the stock exchange. In our society there are two main ways to ventilate a grievance. If one has a disagreement with a state-run concern, there is a political method to ventilate that grievance. For the sake of argument, I might say that I do not like the way in which the Bank of England is controlled by the Government, I will never support Mr. Nigel Lawson or vote Tory again, and that Mr. Lawson should resign. That is perfectly reasonable and everyone understands the way in which political grievance can be ventilated. Equally, everyone understands that a private individual has a right to ventilate his grievance through the courts. However, a self-regulatory body that is not state-controlled and cannot be sued in the courts is, in the last resort, irresponsible.

Mr. Butterfill: Is my hon. Friend aware that on 3 June the stock exchange announced its intention to appoint an ombudsman to represent the interests of investors as against the stock exchange council?

Mr. Budgen: Ombudsmen make grave recommendations, but they are not in any way binding. An ombudsman is not a satisfactory alternative to the right to sue through the courts.

Sir Nicholas Goodison, who is no doubt congratulating himself on his great triumph, has in fact acquired for himself and his organisation a most short-sighted triumph. There will be many changes in the securities industry in the next few years. Many wise people who know a great deal about the industry—I am not wise, nor do I know a great deal about the industry—say that over-capacity is building up, and they may be right.

I do not know about the way in which prices of stocks and shares go up and down, but there are those who say that eventually there will be a bear market. There are also those who say that the system of Chinese walls will not always work. A combination of over-capacity and a bear market, with opportunities for malpractice, means that a few corners may be cut in future. When Granny Smith finds that she has no opportunity either to take the political course or to sue to ventilate her grievance—it may well be that there is not a Conservative Government at that time—she may say that there is a need for further legislation. She will say, "That wicked old Tory Government in 1986 passed legislation which was plainly to the advantage of their friends and was not fair to me."

The danger is that the splendid settlement will be unpicked. When it is unpicked, not only that part of it but the remainder will be unpicked. That will be to the disadvantage of the stock exchange. Certain people may drink their second magnum tonight and congratulate themselves on such a great triumph, but I hope that it does not look too bad for them in five, six or 10 years, when Granny Smith goes to a Member's surgery and complains that she has no means of ventilating her grievance.

Mr. Bruce Millan (Glasgow, Govan): I agree with the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen) that if we are to give special legal privileges of immunity to anybody, there must be good grounds of public policy for doing so. It cannot be given simply as a protection for the body concerned. As I understood the argument in Committee—I was not a member of the Committee—there were good grounds of public policy for giving at least a degree of immunity to self-regulating organisations, because otherwise they might be inhibited, as the Minister said earlier, from carrying out the functions of investor protection placed on them by the legislation. The argument provides a strong case for legal immunity. I believe that the extent of the immunity is a separate matter, as my hon. Friend the Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) has argued. My amendment (c) applies the same arguments to recognised professional bodies as have been applied in the Minister's new clause regarding self-regulating organisations.

As a chartered accountant and a member of the Institute of Chartered Accountants of Scotland to which I am parliamentary adviser, I have an interest in the matter. Listening to the Minister's arguments for his new clause, I found it difficult to accept the arguments that he put up a little later about why recognised professional bodies should not have the same degree of immunity—whatever it is that Parliament eventually decides the degree of immunity should be. After all, under the Bill, those bodies are to be subject to a regime that is intended to give protection to investors equivalent to that which they would obtain through anything done by an authorised person in a self-regulating organisation. The rules and monitoring arrangements to provide that are to be as stringent, detailed and as subject to supervision as those that apply in respect of self-regulating organisations. Therefore, recognised professional bodies will be placed in almost exactly the same position as self-regulating organisations. It is difficult, on the face of it, to understand why immunity is to be granted to one kind of organisation but similar immunity is not to be granted to another kind of organisation—a recognised professional body.

The Minister used two arguments against that proposition. He said that in the case of professional recognised bodies—I take the chartered accountants' institutes as an example—regulation would be only a small part of their activities, and it could be anomalous if immunity were granted for a small part of their activities when the main part of their activities was not similarly protected by immunity.

The recognised professional bodies are having particular and new obligations placed on them by the legislation, assuming that they will apply for recognition. It is a matter of choice. They may not apply for recognition if they do not feel that they can take on the obligation. If they apply for recognition, they will take on an entirely different range of responsibilities. For example, the institutes of chartered accountants do not actively monitor their members' activities or have a legal obligation to do so. Of course, they are responsible for discipline, and so on. Under this legislation, they will take on the additional responsibility of monitoring their members' activities with respect to investment.

Although this aspect may be only a small part of the activities of these professional bodies, it is a new and special responsibility. It is a legal obligation, not a voluntary role. By applying for recognition, a body automatically takes on those responsibilities. The argument that these bodies are not given immunity for the major part of their activities and that, therefore, it would be anomalous to give them immunity for the minor part of their activities does not bear examination.

It has been argued also that a member of a recognised professional body who has been authorised will be recognised only because certain activities are incidental to his main activity as an ordinary professional person. That is true. The Bill does not lay down a definition of what is incidental. There have been considerable discussions on this point, and I am not arguing that there should be a specific definition in the Bill. A practitioner may be involved in activities that are incidental to his main activities, but that does not necessarily mean that those incidental activities do not involve considerable sums. He may be vulnerable to legal action even though his activities are incidental. Of course, if the activities were not incidental, they would have to be regulated in a way other than through the recognised professional body. That is not a good argument for distinguishing between a self-regulating organisation and a recognised professional body.

Mr. Bermingham: I put this point to the Under-Secretary of State but he did not seem to understand it. Does my right hon. Friend, with his vast professional experience, accept that often the chartered accountant who is the liquidator or receiver in a company liquidation can be involved in what may appear, on the face of it, to be a small transaction but be liable for vast sums?

Mr. Millan: My hon. Friend has made that point in a rather different context. Because a person is involved in an activity that is only a small part of his general professional responsibility it does not mean that he is not vulnerable to being liable for large sums. That point has been made. I think that the Under-Secretary of State understands that the professional bodies are agitated about this matter, and I ask him to consider it again.

I do not want to go at great length into how far immunity should extend. There is a distinction between immunity from action by a recognised professional body's members or someone authorised by it and immunity from action by a member of the public—for example, an aggrieved investor. From the point of view of the recognised professional bodies or the self-regulating organisations, liability for large sums in damages may arise from the suit of an aggrieved investor rather than an aggrieved authorised member or a member who has been refused authorisation. Vulnerability to liability for large sums of damages may well be caused by bodies outside rather than within an SRO. Amendment (b) restricts immunity to a person,

"whether authorised or not, whom the organisation is authorised by this Act to investigate or supervise".

[Mr. Millan]

In some circumstances, that may be a fairly limited immunity. An aggrieved investor may get beyond the authorised person, with whom his grievance basically rests, to the authorising body which is responsible for monitoring the activities of that person. There is a real dilemma but I do not necessarily want to take a firm view on that matter. All that I am saying is that, whatever the ultimate form or shape of the Bill or the new clause, I think that there are strong grounds, in terms of public policy, for treating self-regulating organisations and recognised professional bodies in exactly the same way.

9.15 pm

Mr. Butterfill: My hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen) referred to Granny Smith and her predicament and her inability to sue. My constituency probably contains more hypothetical Granny Smiths than most others. The difficulty that the Granny Smiths in my constituency encounter is that the law does not seem to do for them what my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West thinks that it might. They come to my advice centre and say that there is one law for the rich because they can afford it, there is another law for the poor because they can get legal aid, but there is no law for the small people in between who cannot get legal aid because they have a little bit of money. They are precisely the people who will be the investors in the stock exchange and who will not be able to afford the litigation.

I am touched by the faith my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West has for the legal process and the courts. It is not a faith that I have heard him express quite so vividly on previous occasions. Nevertheless, it is a touching thought. However, I do not think that it is something which Granny Smith will want to rely on. I think that she would much rather rely upon an ombudsman appointed by the stock exchange especially if, unlike the ombudsman we seem to have created in this place, he actually has some teeth and may get redress for the complainant investor.

The hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) referred to the views I expressed in Committee. I am sure that if he refers to column 176—I have just refreshed my memory on that, he will see that — my view arose from the experience that I and other Members of the Committee had as members of professional bodies. I suggested that since those of us who were members of professional bodies had not seen the need for them to have this type of immunity I did not really see, extrapolating from that, why the immunity should be extended to the stock exchange or any of the other self-regulating organisations we are setting up under the Bill.

I must tell the hon. Member for Dagenham that I have taken further advice on this matter. However, I have not undergone a conversion in a blinding flash along the road to Damascus. I have trodden the road to Damascus but it was not there that the inspiration came to me. I have considered the representations, as my hon. and learned Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary will have done, that have been made to me by those concerned in these matters and those who have much more experience than I have. In an earlier intervention I referred to the position of ISRO, which is dealing with an international money market of billions of dollars. It would be completely impossible for regulators of that type to operate if, in giving a ruling, they were likely to be liable to be sued for damages for billions of dollars. A bankrupt regulator will not be any good to any of us and, therefore, it is essential that we provide the immunity that is suggested in the new clause.

Mr. Ashdown: I thought that the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) put it rather well when he said that the House was engaged in a rather interesting minuet. We are required to do so in considering the new clause. The hon. Gentleman and I and other Opposition Members called for immunity for SROs and the Minister's change of heart is welcome, but that welcome must be tempered by the fact that he has gone further than the consensus that we reached, such as it was, in Committee, and has done so for some fairly curious reasons. As the hon. Member for Dagenham said, and as the hon. Member and for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen) said in an interesting, amusing and telling speech, that makes this issue one of considerable principle.

It is right that we should remind ourselves of the terms in which the Minister, with a good deal of enthusiasm and no small despatch, advanced arguments that went against the position that he has now adopted. He told us in Committee, in the face of the arguments that he has presented this evening, that he was against the immunity that is now proposed. He told us that it would be wrong to allow a City institution to operate above the normal workings of the law. He did not use precisely those words but that was the purport of his contention. He declared elegantly and with some force that the immunity for which we asked would go against the trend of English law over the past 50 years. He explained that there had been a move in the opposite direction and added that doctors, lawyers and tour operators had all been made liable for damages for incorrect decisions. We are entitled to investigate why it is that the Minister has committed such an extraordinary volte face. It would seem that the hon. and learned Gentleman is stretching our credibility a little too far by asking us seriously to believe that the arguments which were so powerfully advanced in Committee caused him to change his mind.

If the Minister's change of mind was caused by the arguments that were presented in Committee and, to a certain extent, by some "practical facts", as the Financial Times put it, presented to him outside the House, I might be better disposed towards him, but I suggest that there is no evidence that that is what happened. The Minister is fast enough on his feet and has a brain that works quickly enough to accommodate and show some serious consideration of the arguments advanced in Committee, but instead he dismissed them with considerable despatch.

Mr. Ron Davies (Caerphilly): And with contempt.

Mr. Ashdown: I would not go that far. It was a good-natured Committee and I did not see too much contempt displayed. I merely say that the Minister dismissed with enthusiasm the arguments in favour of immunity.

What has happened? We know that a letter was sent to the Minister on 16 April 1986 from the six nascent SROs —AFBD, IMRO, ISRO, LAUTRO, NASDIM and the stock exchange—which contained a thinly veiled threat. They wrote:

"Failing to grant immunity from these liabilities in the Bill will discourage the formation"—

a euphemistic approach—

"of SROs in the first instance, as well as compromise their operation if they do decide to seek recognition."

That was an approach that was articulated more clearly in an article that appeared in the Financial Times. The commentary in the Financial Times that appeared shortly afterwards was rather more blunt but it was accurate enough. The article stated:

"The six nascent SROs issued a joint statement saying that unless they were granted the same immunity from negligent actions as their immediate overseer, the Securities and Investments Board, they would not invite members to join or to serve as directors and officers."

There it is. There is the armlock or the half-Nelson. That is why the Minister has changed his mind. In future, as the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West said, when Granny Smith wants to know why it is that she has no recourse and no possibility, neither political nor through the courts, of getting back at wrong decisions, it will be said with some force that the Government changed their mind because some of their friends and some of their paymasters in the City required them so to do. I say that as someone who has not advanced that argument with the strength with which others have deployed it previously. That, however, will be the judgment that history and hindsight will place on the Minister's decision.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I find the comments of the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) quite remarkable. It is not my place to defend the Minister, but I have a letter from Allen and Overy, solicitors. The organisations took legal advice, and all the matters contained in the letter from the stock exchange are taken directly from the correspondence. If the hon. Member for Yeovil had simply telephoned the solicitors, he would have found the case clearly set out in favour of immunity. The solicitors were commenting only on the relevance of a legal judgment as it affected their position. They were perfectly entitled to obtain the legal judgment and put it to the Minister.

Mr. Ashdown: It is strange for the hon. Gentleman to place such remarkable weight on the view of lawyers as being the final word in this matter. I am aware that the Committee was overburdened with lawyers and that was difficult for us to cope with. However, we must make a judgment on this. It is possible for anyone to seek an opinion from a lawyer which will meet the desired requirement. I am not against the concept of immunity and I argued for it within certain limited constraints that I will refer shortly, and relate strongly, to the amendment tabled by the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould).

It is perfectly clear that the half-Nelson which the Minister was put in by his friends in the stock exchange and elsewhere caused this remarkable change of mind. It is even more remarkable, because elsewhere in the Bill and throughout the Committee the Minister time and time again placed what many of us regarded as a touching faith in the operation of the courts when it came to decide on such matters as, for example, the meaning of the word "significant" when assessing the proportion of a firms general business which involves investment. The Minister is granting an immunity not just to the members and those who are regulators on the matter——

Mr. Budgen: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Ashdown: I will give way to the hon. Gentleman in a moment if he will just be patient. The Minister is granting an immunity not just to the members and those who are regulators, but is going further than what was agreed in Committee on this matter.

Mr. Budgen: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the way that the stock exchange suggests that it is accepting self-regulation, as it were to do the Government a favour, is rather odd? The exchange wants self-regulation because it believes that the more skilled and informal way of regulating the market will be a selling point to foreign investors. However, having desperately wanted this self-regulation, sadly it is not prepared to accept its consequences.

Mr. Ashdown: The hon. Gentleman has made a powerful point. I am in favour of a degree of immunity for reasons advanced in Committee. There are important reasons why there should be freedom of operation in respect of regulated numbers. However, by extending that even to immunity from damage claims by investors, he is seen to have moved much further than he agreed might be appropriate in Committee and in a direction which fundamentally extends the powers of self-regulation to levels that most hon. Members would disagree with.

There is anxiety about self-regulation as a basic principle, although I agree with that principle. That principle is worrying enough but to give the self-regulators total immunity from anyone in relation to damages levied against them, not only to those who are members of the regulators and to investors, goes far beyond what is acceptable.

Mr. Butterfill: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that when the big bang occurs the investors and members may be the same people? Is that not the problem?

Mr. Ashdown: If the investors and the members are the same people, granting immunity to the members should be sufficient. I would happily go along with such a proposal.

The Minister has moved for the wrong reasons. He has moved not because of democracy and argument in Committee but because he has been put in a half-Nelson. The second reason for the Minister's shift is even more worrying. The City has caused a fundamental change in his mind by simply saying that it will not operate a set of regulations which is enshrined in an Act of Parliament. That bodes very ill for the future of self-regulation as one of the determining factors of the success of self-regulation is the City's attitude. That is a matter of not inconsiderable weight.

9.30 pm

As for what the Minister should have done, I cannot add significantly to what the hon. Member for Dagenham said. To offer immunity to those who are regulated is appropriate, but to offer it to those who are investors as well is dangerous. If the Minister is saying that the power of investors in terms of the money that they can generate is so great as to cause him considerable worry in this matter, it might be right for him to recognise that there should be a state organisation. That is not my view, but if the Minister believes that the power of investors will be so great as to undermine his Bill, giving a private body such immunity is going too far by a long way.

This is an issue of fundamental principle. I am in favour of immunity for the regulated, but we should not grant immunity from damages levied against the SROs in respect of those who invest. To do that would be significantly to undermine the Bill and to extend the power and influence of SROs to an unacceptable extent. We would also diminish the safeguards for investors.

Mr. Tim Smith: This has been a bizarre little debate. It has something in common with "Through the Looking Glass". My hon. and learned Friend the Minister has changed his mind and, ever since announcing it, he has been attacked by the very people who wanted him to change his mind. I refer not to my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen) but to those who made the mistake of speaking in the earlier debate on this subject.

Mr. Gould: The hon. Gentleman cannot be allowed to get away with that statement. We approve of the Minister changing his mind 100 per cent. — it is the 200 per cent. which makes things difficult for us.

Mr. Smith: It is partly that and partly the suggestion that he has not changed his mind on the merits of the argument but has somehow been got at. It has been suggested that the stock exchange got at him.

We should be clear who is calling the shots. No fewer than 49 out of the 50 leading members of the stock exchange are owned by members of ISRO. The stock exchange will soon be a subsidiary of ISRO, so if anybody is calling the shots it is ISRO and the international securities dealers. It is important to listen to what they have to say. Everybody who wanted a change agreed that there should be immunity for members.

It is easy to exaggerate the difficulties of view and their consequences, but we are considering whether there should be immunity for investors. The hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) completely misunderstood the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) about investors and members being the same people. They will not be the same people on the same occasion. When we speak about large investors, we speak about the people who are members of ISRO and other bodies with substantial clout. My hon. and learned Friend might perhaps consider whether we can draw a distinction between the very large operators, who are probably quite capable of looking after themselves, and the Granny Smiths to whom my ho. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West referred. Such a distinction exists because the Government have tabled an amendment to schedule 6 which makes it.

When I saw the Government's proposal, I was a little surprised in view of what my hon. and learned Friend said previously. I see the force of his arguments, however, and that the professional investor does not need such protection. The origin of the Bill is concern for small investors. Perhaps we should see whether we cannot deal with the matter in that way.

My amendment (a) is very similar to amendment (c) tabled by the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan). I subscribe to all the arguments put forward by the right hon. Gentleman in favour of extending the clause to include recognised professional bodies.

Mr. Bermingham: I do not propose to detain the House for long. But it is incredible that the Minister, who comes from a learned profession, should seek to negate the actions of the courts in this matter. I do not know whether it was the blinding light on the road to Damascus again, pressure from the City again, or pressure again on other hon. Members from the little chaps across the coffee table, which has led to the claim that there is a difference between the stock exchange and other professional bodies. On occasion, the Law Society has been the subject of actions. The Glanville Davies case is a classic example. In that instance, the Law Society found that it was in the wrong. Other professional bodies, such as the accountancy profession, have been the subject of actions. But those actions are always undertaken by small people.

Apparently, however, we are to exempt the new SROs and the Securities and Investments Board from liability for their actions. From the Minister's argument — I hope that he will pay me the courtesy of listening to this point — it seems that these bodies will be gagged by the actions of large American and other institutional investors. Apparently they will issue a series of gagging writs, as a result of which no actions will be taken. If the House acknowledges that there are powerful enough bodies, in the City or elsewhere, to gag other bodies set up by the House simply by issuing writs, it is a very weak and namby-pamby place. After all, that has never been the position.

If someone said today that all professional bodies were to cease functioning simply because rich, powerful and influential bodies could issue writs to threaten them and subdue them into submission, I trust that the House would have the courage to act. On Second Reading I was very much against — as I always have been — the SIB or independent concept of self-regulation. In the light of the Minister's remarks, I am confirmed in my belief that we cannot trust the City to regulate itself. That is what worries me.

I was always in favour of the American solution, with the Securities and Exchange Commission or a Government body. I was in favour of a state body regulating the whole investment industry. I accept, as I believe the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) mentioned, that there are SROs in New York, but they are in turn subject to other controlling bodies.

I am prepared to concede limited immunity between those companies or businesses which are to be regulated and the regulator. I understand the argument that if bodies do not like how they are being regulated they, as a collective group, can change the rules on how they are run; but I strongly object to the negation of an individual's rights. That individual could be a bank or the Granny Smith referred to by the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen). Indeed, for once I entirely agree with his remarks. He hit the nail on the head.

I strongly object to the man in the street being told that he has no right of redress. In its own way that is a negation of democracy. One cannot have a body that is answerable to nobody. I concede immediately that such bodies would be by way of declaratory judgments, and so on, answerable, say, through the divisional court. But that does not provide the necessary remedy to the ordinary person.

Perhaps the Minister would like to travel again on the road from Jerusalem to Damascus. I am sure that the House will understand the time that it takes. Perhaps once again he could hope that the light would hit him and this time lead him to understand that he has no need to be frightened of the large multinationals. Britain and our courts are big enough to protect us against the gagging and conspiratorial tactics which he so fears from them.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: They are not.

Mr. Bermingham: My hon. Friend says that the courts are not strong enough. He knows not what he says. Indeed, the courts are strong enough and they will not accept that sort of behaviour, because it is in itself a conspiracy to pervert.

I say to the Minister: think again. The House has the power to set up regulations in a way that meets the needs of all. To deny the individual the right of redress and to say that if we do not have this blanket immunity the City, which is being given the right to regulate itself, will not play really is the conduct of a spoiled brat. Let him have the courage to say to the City, "Look, we believe that the individual has rights. If you want self-regulation, have the courage to do it, but in a form which makes you answerable to the people you seek to regulate."

Mr. Nelson: Some immaculate points of principle have been put forward this evening by hon. Members. Indeed, some of them have almost waxed biblical in their defence of people's right to bring suits. However, we must decide whether we want the legislation to work, whether we want the legislation well thought out, given a Second Reading and enjoying a large measure of support on both sides of the House. If we do, we must ensure that the bodies which are charged with this responsibility have the incentive, the means and the ability to carry it through.

Those of us — I am one of them — who advance the case for extending immunity to SROs do not do so because in some idle way we think that it would be a useful immunity that would help the running of the City. We do not do so because we have paymasters or vested interests. We do so because, as we have clearly said, we are interested in investor protection. It is because we want to protect investors that we want SROs to do their job and it is because we want SROs to do their job that we want to ensure that they have the membership, the effectiveness and the immunity so to do.

I find it odd that in the debate so far there has been no mention of or objection to the immunity which the SIB enjoys. The SIB is given complete immunity from suit by SROs, by members of SROs and by the investing public.

Mr. Budgen: The SIB is far less of a self-regulatory authority and far more of a state organised authority.

Mr. Nelson: That goes to the heart of a debate that we shall no doubt have later on Report, on which the Standing Committee spent no little time.

The fact of the matter is, as is proposed, that the SIB or the designated agency will remain a private sector body. It is given, and I welcome it, substantial powers of regulation and power over SROs, but enjoys — a fact that nobody has complained about — total immunity.

Some hon. Members have complained — again, it is a compelling and almost immaculate argument — that not to be in favour of extending immunity to self-regulating organisations because they are private sector as opposed to governmental is either a case for not extending that immunity or a case for making the system statutory. That was the point made by the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown).

However, making the system statutory, even if it were practically possible, making not only the SIB but every SRO, including the stock exchange, a statutory body, would not of itself mean that those SROs could not be challenged in court or in law. They would only not be challenged if, in the legislation giving them statutory identity, an immunity was extended to them as well. Exactly the same point exists whether or not the SROs and the SIB are statutory or private. Therefore, those arguments are wholly defective.

We must consider whether we want the legislation to work and whether the proper presumption against the extension of immunity to any body or organisation should be waived or limited to this extent because we think a greater good will be served. I share the view to some extent that regulators should be liable and responsible for their actions, and that there should be a presumption against an extension of immunity as a generality. I am fearful — I have expressed this to self-regulating organisations and in Committee — that SROs may sometimes act in a capricious or negligent way, possibly in the interests of the firms for which individual members of SROs work, rather than in the interests of the public or the market as a whole.

9.45 pm

I am well persuaded, as I believe my hon. and learned Friend the Minister was, that the practical reality is that SROs will be blockaded or rendered impotent by the threat of suits or damages of an order substantially greater than the hon. Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham) imagines. [Interruption.] I am making a point and I am open to challenge.

The resources available to the legal departments of some investment banks, which will be both members of ISRO and investors on the international securities market, not only are prodigious but will be deployed, as the investment banks have said, because when acting on behalf of various substantial investment interests one may be culpable if one does not fling bricks in every direction and overstate the damages that can be claimed. If the hon. Gentleman honestly believes that that will not happen, he should consider what has happened in the United States, where the volume and size of writs has been enormous.

Mr. Bermingham: Does the hon. Gentleman not agree that to say that companies will use inflated writ procedure by in-house lawyers brings upon them the disgraceful allegation that they would do so and upon the judicial system the equally disgraceful allegation that it would tolerate such conduct in the English courts?

Mr. Nelson: Of course companies would, and the courts would have to tolerate it. It happens in the United States. The sums involved are enormous compared with the cost of taking a case to court, which may be substantial in absolute terms but which is nothing when one considers the turnover of some individual investment houses which is now over $1 trillion.

Mr. Budgen: My hon. Friend should also mention contingency fees, which make a difference between here and New York.

Mr. Nelson: I recognise that, and I concede the point to the extent that there are different practices and attitudes in this market. But let us not underestimate the extent to which these suits will be brought.

I was well persuaded by the chairmen of the SROs, members of SRO steering committees and individual member firms that they will not get lay or professional members on those SROs. Ian Steer of ISRO, to whom I have spoken, Charles McVeigh, a member of the standing committee, and Salomon Brothers International, all of whom are involved in establishing and running this organisation and are investors and self-regulators in the market, say that there is no way that they will put themselves forward and have the opportunity cost of highly paid executives' time to make themselves vulnerable to the sort of law suits which they believe will undoubtedly be brought, if this sort of immunity is not extended.

For those reasons, my hon. and learned Friend was absolutely right. Although, with the benefit of hindsight, the announcement could have been made more sensitively, the judgment is correct and deserves support.

Regarding professional bodies, it is important that we draw a differentiation between incidental business and mainstream business. The arguments would be different if recognised professional bodies were to preside over member firms whose investment activities extended well beyond the sort of incidental business for which they will be authorised. Where they engage in such business, it will have to be authorised, and where they are authorised, they will be a member of an SRO in the usual course of events. For all these reasons, my hon. and learned Friend deserves far greater support than many have so far given him.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: In Committee I took a great interest in the subject of immunity, and the Minister has been wise to pursue the course that he has adopted. However, he would do well to note the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould). At the beginning of the debate I said that I had an open mind on this matter.

Mr. Ashdown: Oh, yes?

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I am being objective in the way that the Liberals tell the public they are always objective. It is a pity that they cannot apply their objectivity in the Chamber, where people such as I do so. I have been thoroughly objective. In Committee it was remarkable that at every stage of our 22 sittings we sought a balanced judgment. We have so many amendments because we went about our business in an objective way.

Mr. Ashdown: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I want to watch a football match at 11 o'clock, and I intend to do so, so I shall proceed with the important business.

My hon. Friend the Member for Dagenham was right in his comments on the need for a special look at the position of investors and that one has to weigh up these matters carefully and have a balanced judgment about them. As I understand it, he was saying that if, through concern about the power of multinational corporations and large investors, we end up by applying a system that does not fully protect the small investors, we question the whole principle of the self-regulatory organisation. If we do that, we do great damage to the principle of self-regulation.

As far as I can see, the only way around this is to pursue the proposition put forward by the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith), who also was most reasonable. He suggested that there would be a case to answer and asked whether we could find some way of drawing a distinction between the large and the small investors. Over the next few weeks the Minister might examine these matters and, before the Bill is dealt with in the other place, produce a solution. I do not know what it might be, but it could be some form of ceiling on immunity. We must find a way round this problem. It would be wrong to be so near to perfection, but yet slightly undermine a system that would work.

Mr. Cash: I am extremely disappointed with these provisions. In Committee I spoke about fit and proper persons and asked whether the Bill, which is leading up to the big bang, would lead either to a galaxy or a black hole. That has much to do with the manner in which the SROs operate. The new clause will go through. I am sure that if there is a Division it will go in the direction that the Government want, but that does not detract from my main point. The immunity that is to be extended to the SROs in these circumstances will lead to a serious situation, as the Granny Smiths of this world will learn to their cost in due course.

Having said that, there is a broader issue that must be addressed whether the self-regulatory organisations would be prepared to operate. It is clear on the balance of the argument that they are not prepared to operate unless this provision is put through. It is more important that the Bill should succeed. I have expressed the warning, and I stand by it. I hope that the Government will use the powers in new clause 6 to rectify the matter in due course if things go wrong.

Mr. Howard: I agree so much with the eloquent remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Chichester (Mr. Nelson) that I can be brief in replying to the debate.

Perhaps the most remarkable feature of the debate has been the eagerness of Opposition Members, led by the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould), who was joined somewhat eccentrically by the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown), to take credit for the change of mind that I had in response to the arguments that they put forward in Committee. I have fully explained that change of mind.

Mr. Gould: I am delighted to take credit, not only for the conversion of the Minister, but for the conversion of every Conservative Member on the Standing Committee who voted on the issue when we pressed on the Minister the matter of immunity for self-regulating organisations. We marvel, not only at the scope of that conversion in terms of the numbers of Government Members, but at the area which the conversion covers. The Minister is so enthusiastic in support of the arguments that we advanced that he is now taking the matter beyond the bounds of what is reasonable.

Mr. Howard: The hon. Member for Dagenham should not be surprised at the fact that when the Government undertake to rethink matters we do so in a thorough way. Having done that, we follow our thoughts through to their logical conclusion.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen) had the courtesy to tell me today that he was not in favour of the proposals contained in the new clause. I knew that he would put forward the views that I expressed in Committee with a great deal more pungency than I could ever hope to aspire to. I have admired the intellectual honesty of my hon. Friend for over a quarter of a century, and I hope that he will continue to reflect upon these matters in the same way as I have reflected upon them, and that in due course he will see the force of the arguments that I have presented to the House. I am sure that when that moment arrives he will put forward those views with the same pungency as he expressed his views in this debate.

Some hon. Members have spoken about the relatively small investor. It is perhaps characteristic of the changed positions that we have adopted in the course of the debate that Aunt Agatha, who was such a faithful companion in the Standing Committee, has been transformed into Granny Smith for the purposes of this discussion.

The small investor will be protected. The investor will still be able to pursue investment businesses and will have the advantage of the compensation arrangements that will be made available if those investment businesses, for some reason, are not able to meet claims for compensation.

As I say, the small investor will be protected, and that is important. Such protection is at the heart of these matters, and I attach great importance to it. That has a lot to do with the reason why, after giving a great deal of thought to the possibility of a distinction, which was put forward by my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith), between professional investors and small scale investors, I came to the conclusion that it would be extraordinarily difficult to arrive at such a distinction, because of the difficulties of defining a professional investor in that context. It is also unnecessary to do so, because of the protection which in any case exists for the benefit of the small investor.

I have already advanced my argument about the professional investor. The right hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan) was right to stress the importance of the definition of incidental investors. That definition will, of course, be a matter for the professional bodies themselves. It will be in their power to limit the kind of investment which their members will be allowed to undertake and which they think they will be able to regulate effectively without the benefit of immunity.

The hon. Member for Dagenham was right when he said that the path we have chosen is difficult. There are no easy decisions in this area. However, he was wrong to suggest that we were in any way sacrificing investor protection. It is because we wish to ensure that that protection is effective that I commend the new clause to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time.

Amendment proposed to the new clause: (b), in subsection (1), after 'damages', insert

'at the suit of any member of the self-regulating organisation or of any person, whether authorised or not, whom the organisation is authorised by this Act to investigate or supervise'.—[Mr. Gould.]

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Financial Services Bill

As amended, in the Standing Committee, further considered.

New Clause 6

ALTERATION OF RULES FOR PROTECTION OF INVESTORS

'(1) If at any time it appears to the Secretary of State that the rules of a recognised organisation do not satisfy the requirements of paragraph 3(1) of Schedule 2 to this Act he may, instead of revoking the recognition order or making an application under section 12 above, direct the organisation to alter, or himself alter, its rules in such manner as he considers necessary for securing that the rules satisfy those requirements.

(2) If at any time it appears to the Secretary of State that the rules and practices of a recognised organisation which is concerned with two or more kinds of investment business do not satisfy any requirement of Schedule 2 to this Act in respect of investment business of any of those kinds he may, instead of revoking the recognition order or making an application under section 12 above, direct the organisation to alter, or himself alter, its rules so that they preclude a member from carrying on investment business of that kind unless he is an authorised person otherwise than by virtue of membership of the organisation.

(3) Any direction given under this section shall, on the application of the Secretary of State, be enforceable by mandamus or, in Scotland, by an order for specific performance under section 91 of the Court of Session Act 1868.

(4) Before giving a direction or making any alteration under subsection (1) above the Secretary of State shall consult the organisation concerned.

(5) A recognised organisation whose rules have been altered by or pursuant to a direction given by the Secretary of State under subsection (1) above may apply to the court and if the court is satisfied

(a) that the rules without the alteration satisfied the requirements mentioned in that subsection; or

(b) that other alterations proposed by the organisation would result in the rules satisfying those requirements, the court may set aside the alteration made by or pursuant to the direction given by the Secretary of State and, in a case within paragraph (b) above, order the organisation to make the alterations proposed by it; but the setting aside of an alteration under this subsection shall not affect its previous operation.

(6) The jurisdiction conferred by subsection (5) above shall be exercisable by the High Court and the Court of Session.

(7) Section 11(2) to (7) and (9) above shall, with the necessary modifications, have effect in relation to any direction given or alteration made by the Secretary of State under subsection (2) above as they have effect in relation to an order revoking a recognition order.

(8) The fact that the rules of a recognised organisation have been altered by or pursuant to a direction given by the Secretary of State or pursuant to an order made by the court, under this section, shall not preclude their subsequent alteration or revocation by that organisation.' — [Mr. Howard.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Howard: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Speaker: With this we shall discuss Government amendments Nos. 34 to 38, 43 and 57 to 60.

Mr. Howard: When we discussed in Committee the provisions of the Bill relating to RSROs, it was clear that there was widespread support for the proposal that the Secretary of State or designated agency should have the power in certain circumstances to alter the rules of an RSRO without having to apply to the courts under the procedure provided for in clause 12. I undertook at that stage to consult interested parties and bring forward an amendment on Report. The new clause reflects the results of those consultations.

As hon. Members will recognise, the new clause incorporates the provisions of the existing clause 13. The new power is provided in subsections (1), (4), (5) and (6). The clause will allow the Secretary of State or designated agency to act quickly when the interests of investors so demand, but will also allow an RSRO an opportunity to have its original rules, or an alteration proposed by the organisation, restored. I believe that this proposal strikes the right balance between effective enforcement by the Secretary of State or designated agency and the autonomy which RSROs will need if they are to command confidence and authority. The proposal is, I believe, acceptable to the Securities and Investments Board and to the potential RSROs. I commend it to the House.

The amendments to clause 12 extend the compliance order provisions to cases where a self-regulating organisation, a registered investment exchange or a recognised clearing house has failed to comply with an obligation to which it is subject by virtue of the Bill. Under the Bill as originally drafted, such a failure was a ground for revocation of a recognition order but not for seeking a compliance order. The Government will be bringing forward amendments in another place to apply the compliance order provisions to recognised professional bodies.

The remaining amendments are largely technical. They make clear that a failure to comply with an obligation imposed under, for instance, clause 91 — which is concerned with the provision of information — constitutes grounds for the revocation of a recognition order.

10.15 pm

Mr. Gould: The new clause represents the fulfilment of yet another undertaking. I think it is fair to say, extracted from the Minister by an all-party consensus in the Standing Committee. Indeed, it could be claimed to have been our first major victory. Therefore, I am delighted to see it. Since I was criticised on an earlier occasion for failing to take credit for a change which the Minister proposed, I shall take the credit for that amendment. I also pay tribute to the Minister's hon. Friends on the Committee who agreed with the position we took. I believe that, in the end, we agreed to support the amendment of the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith).

The amendment that the Minister has finally produced is, to all intents and purposes, a complete fulfilment of his undertaking. One regrets, perhaps, that the Securities and Investments Board's preference for practices as well as rules to be subject to the rule-changing power has not been given effect. I think that the Minister has gone as far as one could reasonably expect him to to meet the virtually unanimous view of the Standing Committee. Even the self-regulating organisations which, for understandable reasons, were not keen on the change have reluctantly accepted it, or at least have not resisted it too strenuously.

I should like the Minister to elaborate on two small points. The fact that a rule book change is forced on a self-regulating organisation by the new power under subsection (8) does not mean that the rule book is set in concrete. Nevertheless, it opens up, at least, the rather unattractive prospect that there may be an unedifying game of ping-pong between the SIB and an SRO. Can the Minister say how he will avoid such an unfortunate circumstance?

The Minister proposes that a self-regulating organisation which has been subjected to the power under subsection (5) should be able to go to the court to have the decision reversed. I would agree with him if he said that the power of judicial review should be available. It is difficult to see how it could be excluded. I regret that the Minister has found it necessary to provide a right of appeal, in effect, on the merits. That can only introduce an unwelcome element of uncertainty.

It is appropriate to refer to the fact that although the new clause does not deal with the matter, the Minister does not propose to introduce a similar measure in respect of recognised professional bodies, although that was something which the Committee had asked for and expressed an opinion on. As I understand from the Minister, the matter is to be dealt with in another place. One must recognise and establish that the Minister, perhaps for understandable reasons, has failed to fulfil an undertaking that he gave to the Committee. We must register our disappointment that he has not moved on that element, although we accept that he has substantially fulfilled the undertaking he gave on self-regulating organisations.

Mr. Nelson: The hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) is difficult to please. When his arguments fail to move my hon. and learned Friend the Under-Secretary of State, he complains. When his arguments move my hon. and learned Friend, he complains. When my hon. and learned Friend changes his view because of outside influences, the hon. Gentleman commplains. My hon. and learned Friend should not feel too disappointed or surprised at the reaction to the new clause.

I very much welcome the new clause. I welcome the responsive way in which my hon. and learned Friend replied to the debate in Committee. In the judgment of many of us, it is important that the self-regulating organisations should to some extent, have their powers fettered by the supervisory intervention — at least on a contingent basis — of the designated agency, the Securities and Investments Board. I think as do many others, that it is an essential and important part of the new regulatory structure that the designated body will be able to act in certain instances quickly and positively where investor protection is imperilled.

I should like to take up specifically the point concerning the recognised professional bodies. Recently, my hon. and learned Friend answered a question that I had tabled on this matter. He made it clear that he intended to deal with their position in a rather different way. I had great misgivings about extending to any of the professions an exemption from the rule-changing power of the SIB. It seemed to me that many people in the professions were to an increasing extent, offering the same sort of investment service as many individuals or authorised persons. It would be wrong, when those people were departing from the mainstream activity of their chartered body and moving into these more lucrative areas, to extend to them a preferential status or immunity from their charter rules being changed thereby placing authorised persons operating under other SROs in a preferential position.

Having said that, I found the arguments put forward by my hon. and learned Friend very compelling. He argued that the recognised professional bodies would enable only their individual members or member firms to give incidental or limited investment advice. Because the type of business that individuals or firms within professions will be able to offer will be much more limited than the type of investment advice that other organisations will be able to offer, there is perhaps less need for the sort of rule-changing power that will be imposed on other SROs.

In accepting that, I should like to enter one important caveat. Much depends on the policing by the SIB of the professions. If it transpires that many of the recognised professional bodies are engaging, not in incidental general investment advice, but in particular wide-ranging investment advice and are operating outside the sphere of the professional body in such a way that they should get separate authorisation, this matter should be reviewed, even if it touches the sensibilities of some of the royal charter organisations. For the time being at least, it is reasonable to deal with the matter in this separate way. Perhaps my hon. and learned Friend will direct his attention to the more particular proposals that he intends to make in another place.

Mr. Ashdown: I join in welcoming the new clause and in paying tribute to the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith), whose amendment in Committee is put into effect by this new clause. I am sure he recognises that other hon. Members argued for that amendment as well. It has been a vehicle for a useful debate.

I must express a degree of disappointment. The Under-Secretary of State has allowed for alteration of the rules but not followed the sensible recommendations put forward by Sir Kenneth Berrill in his letter to the Minister in which he cogently argued in favour of a similar level of intervention and power in the case of practices.

The particular practice in which one is interested is the enforcement of the rules. It is one thing to have a set of rules; it is another thing to ensure that the self-regulating organisation concerned enforces them adequately. I believe that the Minister must answer that point more fully, and I hope he will say why he agrees that there should be intervention in the case of rules without having to seek recourse to what was referred to in Committee as the "nuclear deterrent," the ultimate revocation of recognition, but he has not applied that in the case of practices.

We all recognise that we are talking about a reserve power. It is a power that is most unlikely to be used. Indeed, the fact that the power is on the statute book means, in many cases, that it will never be used. Were it not there, obviously the leverage that could be exercised by the SIB in respect of an SRO would be considerably less than it currently is. We all know, and Sir Kenneth Berrill has made it clear, that he would wish the broadest level of consultation to occur before such a reserve power was used. Therefore, it would be the ultimate "nuclear deterrent" of revocation.

If that is a reserve power, one which the Minister agrees is unlikely to be used, and would be used only under exceptional circumstances, why has he not been prepared to extend it just one small step further to ensure that the SIB can intervene in respect of practices, especially in respect of enforcement? That seems to lose nothing and to gain a great deal in the powers of the SIB.

In his reply to the letter from Sir Kenneth Berrill of 10 April the Minister said, although I did not find it convincing:

> "But I do not think there is the same need to be able to act immediately about practices. Problems about the adequacy of enforcement or other practices are likely to develop only over a period."

Would that it were always so. Unhappily, that is not the case. Reference has been made to the Westland affair. It would be wrong at this point to state categorically that the rules of the Stock Exchange were overturned in that affair. However, there is some question over the matter. What happened was that the people involved simply went ahead and acted and presented the stock exchange with what was essentially a fait accompli. There is similar concern over the activities of people involved in, for example, dawn raids and whether that infringes the rules.

The question of having an ultimate reserve power to be able to dictate or intervene in the enforcement of the rules laid down by an SRO is important, not only as a reserve power, but to enable the SIB to move quickly and effectively and with the maximum amount of influence. I believe that this is an important point, and I hope that in answering the debate the Minister will at least give rather more flesh to what I thought was scanty reasoning in his reply to Sir Kenneth Berrill, so that the House will understand why he has chosen to limit this ultimate reserve power to just short of that which I believe to be necessary.

Mr. Cash: Following the rather unsatisfactory position in which we now find ourselves as a result of passing new clause 5, I should like to welcome new clause 6 because it provides an opportunity for rectifying some of the difficulties which may arise under new clause 5. I hope that new clause 6 can be used to the fullest possible extent for that objective.

On the matter of the recognised professional bodies, I should like to draw the Minister's attention to the fact that there appears to be a slight omission from clause 18. I drew that to the Minister's attention in Committee, but it does not seem to have been taken up. On some reasonable construction of clause 18, the Law Society would not qualify as a recognised professional body. That is somewhat extraordinary and I should be glad to hear from the Minister on that point.

I should simply like to say that, at the end of the day, schedule 2 will determine the manner in which the Bill operates and, unless we use the powers of new clause 6 effectively I fear that it will not work as we had intended and as we had understood it would in Committee.

New clause 6 applies to circumstances which arise after an event has occurred, whereas new clause 5 would have created a situation in which a body—to all intents and purposes a statutory body, in respect of which the law on negligence is well established—would have been able to operate in the same way as the CEGB, for example, if it faced a statutory liability involving sums similar to those in other examples of such liability.

10.30 pm

Mr. Tim Smith: As I moved the amendment in Committee which would have had the same effect as the new clause, I should like to welcome the fact that my hon. and learned Friend the Minister has introduced the clause. I think that it meets the concerns of all those who spoke in Committee on this issue.

I shall refer to the position of recognised professional bodies because my hon. and learned Friend said in Committee that he would deal with the matter subject to the practical difficulties. We are all conscious that the position of the RPBs is different from that of the SROs as they already exist. Indeed, some of them are subject to a royal charter. There were probably two considerations that my hon. and learned Friend had in mind when he told my hon. Friend the Member for Chichester (Mr. Nelson) in an answer on Monday that he proposed to deal with RPBs by introducing provisions along the lines of clause 12.

We are talking only about incidental investment advice. My hon. and learned Friend talked about the possibility of a new sort of mainstream work for professionals, and if it is mainstream work they will not be able to follow this route. They will have to have authorisation from an SRO, or directly from the SIB. Secondly, the way in which my hon. and learned Friend proposes to deal with the matter will ensure, as the courts will be involved, that any difficulties arising from royal charters or any other constitutional problems will be dealt with by the courts.

Mr. Howard: I am grateful for the general welcome that the new clause has received. We said at the outset that judgment on this issue was finely balanced and that we would listen to the views that were expressed. It was on that basis that I felt able to accede readily to the view that was expressed almost unanimously in Committee that a direct rule-changing power should be introduced.

I confess that I was mildly surprised, but pleasantly so, that the amendment that we devised was able to obtain the approval of the SIB and the SROs. I regard that as a considerable achievement. It was a balance, and if we disturbed it in the way which has been suggested by some Opposition Members, I do not think it certain that we would preserve the accord.

The hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) referred to clause 8, and his argument was covered by his remarks about clause 5. As the court is the arbiter of these matters, there would be no point in the ping-pong that he envisaged. It would be idle for an SRO to change immediately a rule change which had been ordered by the court, as it would find itself back in court with the same consequences. It was essential that some provision such as that in clause 8 be introduced, otherwise once a rule had been changed by the court it would be set in concrete and could not be changed. That would obviously be undesirable.

That fact that the court can consider the merits of the argument under subsection (5) is part of the balance to which I have referred, and which I believe it is important to keep. That is the answer to the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown). The fact that intervention in the practices of the SRO is not to be provided by the clause is part of the same balance. I adhere to the argument that I set out in my letter to Sir Kenneth Berrill that the reason advanced for the provision for a direct rule-changing power which the clause provides is the need for speedy and effective action to be taken over the change in rules.

As it is not envisaged as part of the regulatory structure that the designated agency should interfere with specific cases for discipline or enforcement but only with the general pattern which it is its duty to assess, there cannot be the same need for a speedy and immediate response in relation to practices as is necessary with changes in the rules. That is the reason that I explained in my answer to Sir Kenneth Berrill and I do not in any way move from that. I remind the House that in order to achieve a proper balance, we must take all the elements of a solution into account.

Mr. Gould: Does the Minister agree that the development of an objectionable practice may nevertheless be evidence of a lacuna in the rules? In that sense we ought to be considering practices as well as rules, to ensure that abuses are not allowed to develop unchecked.

Mr. Howard: Of course objectionable practices should not be allowed to develop. However, the way in which the hon. Gentleman put his question confirms that that is not something that happens at a moment in time, requiring a snapshot response in the same way that a change in the rules or a failure to change the rules on the part of a self-regulatory organisation may require. The evolution of an objectionable pattern in terms of practices needs to be assessed over a period, can be assessed over a period and can be dealt with by the designated agency in many ways without the need for this immediate rule or practice-changing power which the clause provides.

Mr. Ashdown: I will not press the Minister too far on this point, because we could get into a ridiculous position. However, I would like to postulate a possible situation. There may be a set of rules in an SRO — for example, the stock exchange — which govern the business of the operation of dawn raids. A pattern may develop in the stock exchange where a number of these are causing damage to the probity of the stock exchange and of the City and operating in a way that is damaging to the investors. There are rules, but the stock exchange has chosen, for all sorts of complicated reasons no doubt, through the enormous pressure from its members, simply not to enforce those rules or not to enforce them adequately. In this matter of enforcement, it would be important for the SIB to be able to act quickly and to have a reserve power whereby the SIB can say that the rule must be enforced more effectively to provide precisely the swift action which I believe is necessary.

Mr. Howard: The hon. Gentleman's example proves my point. It would be undesirable for the designated agency to intervene in any specific case of abuse of that nature. If the hon. Gentleman is worried about a pattern, which by definition is not instant but which develops over a period, the designated agency would be able to make use of the other remedies that are available to ensure that proper enforcement is undertaken by self-regulating organisations. I do not think that the case for instant response of the kind which the direct rule-changing power confers has been made out in connection with practices. I believe that the balance is about right in the clause as it stands and I commend it to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 7

RECIPROCAL FACILITIES FOR FINANCIAL BUSINESS

'(1) If it appears to the Secretary of State or the Treasury that by reason of,

(a) the law of any country outside the United Kingdom; or

(b) any action taken by or the practices of the government of any other authority or body in that country, persons connected with the United Kingdom are unable to carry on investment, insurance or banking business in, or in relation to, that country on terms as favourable as those on which persons connected with that country are able to carry on any such business in, or in relation to, the United Kingdom, the Secretary of State or, as the case may be, the Treasury may serve a notice under this subsection on any person connected with that country who is carrying on or appears to them to intend to carry on any such business in, or in relation to, the United Kingdom.

(2) No notice shall be served under subsection (1) above unless the Secretary of State or, as the case may be, the Treasury consider it in the national interest to serve it, and before doing so the Secretary of State or, as the case may be, the Treasury shall so far as they consider expedient consult such body or bodies as appear to them to represent the interests of persons likely to be affected.

(3) A notice under subsection (1) above shall state the grounds on which it is given (identifying the country in relation to which those grounds are considered to exist), and any such notice shall come into force on such date as may be specified in it.

(4) For the purposes of this section a person is connected with a country if it appears to the Secretary of State or, as the case may be, the Treasury

(a) in the case of an individual, that he is a national of or resident in that country or carries on investment, insurance or banking business from a principal place of business there;

(b) in the case of a body corporate, that it is incorporated or has a principal place of business in that country or is controlled by a person or persons connected with that country;

(c) in the case of a partnership, that it has a principal place of business in that country or that any partner is connected with that country;

(d) in the case of an incorporated association which is not a partnership, that it is formed under the law of that country, has a principal place of business there or is controlled by a person or persons connected with that country.

(5) In this section "country" includes any territory or part of a country or territory; and where it appears to the Secretary of State or, as the case may be, the Treasury that there are such grounds as are mentioned in subsection (1) above in the case of any part of a country or territory their powers under that subsection shall also be exercisable in respect of any person who is connected with that country or territory or any other part of it.'—[Mr. Howard.]

Brought up, and read the First time

Mr. Howard: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Paul Dean): With this it will be convenient to consider Government new clauses 8, 9 and 10 and Government amendments 251, 254 and 257.

Mr. Howard: New clauses 7, 8, 9 and 10 replace clause 151. The changes are designed to make the reciprocity provision more flexible. It was decided to include a reciprocity provision in the Bill to provide the United Kingdom with leverage in seeking access for our financial services firms to foreign markets. At present there are no powers to prevent foreign firms from becoming established as banks or securities dealers, provided they meet the legal requirements. The reciprocity provision empowers the Secretary of State—the power is not to be transferable to the designated agency—to disqualify or restrict a foreign connected firm from carrying out investment or insurance business if British firms do not enjoy access to that foreign market equivalent to that which foreign firms enjoy here. The Treasury has a similar power to disqualify in respect of banking business. The power is applicable to those seeking authorisation as well as to those already authorised to do business.

The power as originally drafted would have meant disqualifying or restricting a firm in respect of all of its investment, insurance or banking business. On reflection, we consider that this total business approach lacks flexibility and risks unnecessary hardship for investors.

We now propose, therefore, to introduce a further category of restriction—a partial restriction notice. It will enable the Secretary of State, or the Treasury, to focus any such restriction on any type of business which a firm is authorised to carry out, or on the way in which such business may be conducted. A firm might be prohibited from dealing in options on securities but not from dealing in the underlying securities themselves. Similarly, a firm might be prohibited from dealing with certain categories or, by contrast, confined to dealing only with certain categories. It will give us much greater flexibility in deciding how to use the reciprocity power, the allow us more easily to take into account the interests of British investors, policyholders or depositors.

The Secretary of State and the Treasury will be subject to the same requirements and will be required to follow the same procedures for partial restriction notices as for other forms of notice served under this provision. The restriction must be considered to be in the national interest, the notice must state the grounds and it must give a date when it will come into effect.

We were persuaded by discussion in Committee that notices should not automatically come into effect on the date of service to give the firms affected an opportunity to unwind their existing busines with the minimum adverse impact on investors, policyholders, or depositors. We were also persuaded that disqualification notices should not restrict authorisation in respect of contracts entered into before the notice comes into force. This, too, will minimise the adverse effect on investors, policyholders, or depositors.

This is an important provision. Knowledge that it is to be included in the Bill has already helped us in seeking improved access to foreign markets for our financial firms. Nor are we alone. Many other countries already have a variety of reciprocity provisions in respect of financial services, and many of those provisions require strict reciprocity, failing which access is forbidden. Our provision is discretionary. We have the choice whether or when to use it and the ability to be selective about how we use it. Of course, we hope not to have to use it, but we will not hesitate to do so if we have to.

As a consequence of these changes, it is necessary to leave out clause 151. Further consequential changes are needed to clause 158 to ensure that prosecutions in respect of offences under new clause 9 are instituted in the same way as prosecutions for breaches of the Banking Act 1979.

Mr. Gould: As the Minister knows, we welcome the reciprocity provisions.

The Minister used the euphemism of increased flexibility. Will he concede that one of the principal changes effected by these four new clauses is to strike out the retrospective nature of the disqualification order, which was understandably objected to by some Conservative members of the Committee?

Will the Minister assure us that the increased flexibility does not imply a derogation of the admirably robust sentiments that were expressed in Committee, which found a welcoming echo from the Opposition, and that the reciprocity provisions will be enforced with all due vigour?

Mr. Nelson: I oppose this group of new clauses and amendments. It is somewhat futile for me to say so, and I promise not to be an impediment to their passage. I expressed my objections on Second Reading and in Committee, and had suffered the ignominy of being the only person to vote against the provision. I want to restate my objections because I know that, if they are not shared by any other hon. Members, they are shared by some people outside the House.

I object to these reciprocity provisions for several reasons. One is that they lie uneasily in the Bill. They have nothing whatever to do with investor protection and should not be here. They are wrong because they seek to infringe the practice and obligations of companies that have legitimately engaged in business, been attracted here, provided employment and prosperity and enhanced the productivity and foreign earnings of the City of London. They are also in restraint of the competition principles to which I think that my party and Government should subscribe. I accept that they have helped my hon. and learned Friend the Minister, most recently in Japan, but I regret that more countries must engage in such sword-of-Damocles legislation. It lies uneasily with other principles that we expound, and I like to think that I have been no party to it. But I shall not waste the time of the House other than to restate my objections, for I fear that, in the course of time, the matter will be raised again.

10.45 pm

Mr. Ashdown: I rise briefly to correct the hon. Member for Chichester (Mr. Nelson), who forgot that I voted with him in Committee on that occasion. However, he is alone now. The Minister has moved, and I am grateful for the flexibility that he has introduced in operation and discretion. Although I share many of the hon. Gentleman's sentiments, for exactly the same reasons, it is important to have such a power available to be used as flexibly as possible. Contrary to the comments of the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould), whose first instinct in such matters seems to be the Little Englander idea of trading practices and reciprocal operations, I hope that the Minister will use the provision sparingly, recognising that there is increasing protectionism in the world, which must damage Britain's trading capacity, especially since it is primarily a trading nation.

Mr. Howard: I share the regret expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Chichester (Mr. Nelson) at the need for such swords of Damocles. However, I am no more in favour of unilateral disarmament in this area than I am in others.

I can briefly answer the two questions asked by the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould). I see no inconsistency between the flexibility called for by the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) and the rigour called for by the hon. Member for Dagenham. I hope that the clause will be applied flexibly and rigorously, and I am happy to answer both his questions in the affirmative.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 8

INVESTMENT AND INSURANCE BUSINESS

"(1) A notice under section [Reciprocal facilities for financial business] above relating to the carrying on of investment business or insurance business shall be served by the Secretary of State and such a notice may be a disqualification notice, a restriction notice or a partial restriction notice and may relate to the carrying on of business of both kinds.

(2) A disqualification notice as respects investment business or insurance business shall have the effect of

(a) cancelling any authorisation of the person concerned to carry on that business after the expiry of such period after the service of the notice as may be specified in it;

(b) disqualifying him from becoming authorised to carry on that business after the expiry of that period; and

(c) restricting any authorisation of the person concerned in respect of that business during that period to the performance of contracts entered into before the notice comes into force; and the period specified in such a notice shall be such period as appears to the Secretary of State to be reasonable to enable the person on whom it is served to complete the performance of those contracts and to terminate such of them as are of a continuing nature.

(3) A restriction notice as respects investment business or insurance business shall have the effect of restricting any authorisation of the person concerned in respect of that business to the performance of contracts entered into before the notice comes into force.

(4) A partial restriction notice as respects investment business may prohibit the person concerned from

(a) entering into transactions of any specified kind or entering into them except in specified circumstances or to a specified extent;

(b) soliciting business from persons of a specified kind or otherwise than from such persons;

(c) carrying on business in a specified manner or otherwise than in a specified manner.

(5) A partial restriction notice as respects insurance business may direct that the person concerned shall cease to be authorised under section 3 or 4 of the Insurance Companies Act 1982 to effect contracts of insurance of any description specified in the notice.

(6) If it appears to the Secretary of State that a person on whom he serves a notice under section [Reciprocal facilities for financial business] above as respects investment business is an authorised person by virtue of an authorisation granted by a designated agency or by virtue of membership of a recognised self-regulating organisation or recognised professional body he shall serve a copy of the notice on that agency, organisation or body.

(7) If it appears to the Secretary of State—

(a) that any person on whom a partial restriction notice has been served by him has contravened any provision of that notice or, in the case of a notice under subsection (5) above, effected a contract of insurance of a description specified in the notice; and

(b) that any such grounds as are mentioned in subsection (1) of section [Reciprocal facilities for financial business] above still exist in the case of the country concerned, he may serve a disqualification notice or a restriction notice on him under that section.

(8) Sections 27, 32, 55, 56 and 57 above shall have effect in relation to a contravention of such a notice as is mentioned in subsection (4) above as they have effect in relation to any such contravention as is mentioned in those sections.'—[Mr. Howard.]

Brought up, read the First and Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 9

BANKING BUSINESS

'(1) A notice under section [Reciprocal facilities for financial business] above relating to the carrying on of a deposit-taking business as a recognised bank or licensed institution within the meaning of the Banking Act 1979 shall be served by the Treasury and may be either a disqualification notice or a partial restriction notice.

(2) A disqualification notice relating to such business shall have the effect of—

(a) cancelling any recognition or licence granted to the person concerned under the Banking Act 1979; and

(b) disqualifying him from becoming a recognised bank or licensed institution within the meaning of that Act.

(3) A partial restriction notice relating to such business may—

(a) prohibit the person concerned from dealing with or disposing of his assets in any manner specified in the direction;

(b) impose limitations on the acceptance by him of deposits;

(c) prohibit him from soliciting deposits either generally or from persons who are not already depositors;

(d) prohibit him from entering into any other transaction or class of transactions;

(e) require him to take certain steps, to pursue or refrain from pursuing a particular course of activities or to restrict the scope of his business in a particular way.

(4) The Treasury shall serve on the Bank of England a copy of any notice served by them under section [Reciprocal facilities for financial business] above.

(5) Any person who contravenes any provision of a partial restriction notice served on him by the Treasury under this section shall be guilty of an offence and liable—

(a) on conviction on indictment, to a fine;

(b) on summary conviction, to a fine not exceeding the statutory maximum.

(6) Any such contravention shall be actionable at the suit of any person who suffers loss as a result of the contravention or is otherwise adversely affected by it, but no such contravention shall invalidate any transaction.

(7) At the end of subsection (1) of section 8 of the Banking Act 1979 (power to give directions in connection with termination of deposit-taking authority) there shall be inserted—

"(d) at any time after a disqualification notice has been served on the institution by the Treasury under section [Reciprocal facilities for financial business] of the Financial Services Act 1986.".'.—[Mr. Howard.]

Brought up, read the First and Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 10

VARIATION AND REVOCATION OF NOTICES

'(1) The Secretary of State or the Treasury may vary a partial restriction notice served under section [Reciprocal facilities for financial business] above by a notice in writing served on the person concerned; and any such notice shall come into force on such date as is specified in the notice.

(2) A notice under section [Reciprocal facilities for financial business] above may be revoked at any time by the Secretary of State or, as the case may be, the Treasury by serving a revocation notice on the person concerned; and the Secretary of State or, as the case may be, the Treasury shall revoke a notice if it appears to them that there are no longer any such grounds as are mentioned in subsection (1) of that section in the case of the country concerned.

(3) The revocation of a disqualification notice as respects investment business or insurance business shall not have the effect of reviving the authorisation which was cancelled by the notice except where the notice relates to investment business and the person concerned would (apart from the disqualification notice) at the time of the revocation be an authorised person as respects the investment business in question by virtue of his membership of a recognised self-regulating organisation or recognised professional body.

(4) The revocation of a disqualification notice as respects banking business shall not have the effect of reviving the recognition or licence which was cancelled by the notice.

(5) Nothing in subsection (3) or (4) above shall be construed as preventing any person who has been subject to a disqualification notice as respects any business from again becoming authorised or, as the case may be, becoming a recognised bank or licensed institution within the meaning of the Banking Act 1979 after the revocation of the notice.

(6) If it appears to the Secretary of State that a person on whom he serves a notice under this section as respects investment business was an authorised person by virtue of an authorisation granted by a designated agency or by virtue of membership of recognised self-regulating organisation or recognised professional body at the time that the notice which is being varied or revoked was served, he shall serve a copy of the notice on that agency, organisation or body.

(7) The Treasury shall serve on the Bank of England a copy of any notice served by them under this section.'.—[Mr. Howard.]

Brought up, read the First and Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 11

INDUSTRIAL ASSURANCE

'(1) In section 5 of the Industrial Assurance Act 1923 (prohibition on issue of illegal policies) the references to policies which are illegal or not within the legal powers of a society or company shall not be construed as applying to any policy issued—

(a) in the course of carrying on investment business in contravention of section 3 above; or

(b) in the course of carrying on insurance business in contravention of section 2 of the Insurance Companies Act 1982.

(2) In section 20(4) of the said Act of 1923 the reference to a person employed by a collecting society or industrial assurance company and in section 34 of that Act the references to a person in the regular employment of such a society or company shall include references to an appointed representative of such a society or company but as respects secton 34 only if the contract in question is an investment agreement.

(3) No dispute to which rules made by virtue of section 45(2) (j) above (or corresponding rules made by a recognised self-regulating organisation) apply shall be referred to the Industrial Assurance Commissioner under section 32 of the said Act of 1923 but where those rules relate only to part of the matters in dispute—

(a) this subsection shall not preclude the reference to the Commissioner of the matters to which the rules do not relate; and

(b) the Commissioner may, if he thinks fit, delegate his functions in respect of those matters so as to enable all the matters in dispute to be determined in accordance with the rules.

(4) The foregoing provisions of this section shall apply to Northern Ireland with the substitution for the references to sections 5, 20(4), 32 and 34 of the said Act of 1923 of references to Articles 20, 27(2), 36 and 38 of the Industrial Assurance (Northern Ireland) Order 1979 and for the references to the Industrail Assurance Commissioner of references to the Industrial Assurance Commissioner for Northern Ireland.'.—[Mr. Butcher.]

Latent Damage Bill [Lords]

Order for Second Reading read

10.43 pm

The Solicitor-General (Sir Patrick Mayhew): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The Law Reform Committee has been in existence for 34 years. Its work is patient and constructive, and its valuable reports upon the matters referred to it by the Lord Chancellor recommend practical measures of law reform. It is a good thing. Accordingly, the world being what it is, not many people know about it.

The Bill seeks to enact the recommendations of the committee's 24th report, published in November 1984, on the subject of latent damage. It was asked to consider the law relating to the accrual of the cause of action and limitation in negligence cases involving latent defects, other than latent disease or injury to the person. Those cases can cause great distress. The law governing them must be practical, even-handed and just.

The character of the Bill is revealed by the words in which the committee expressed the first of its conclusions in its report:

"The present law is unjust to plaintiffs and defendants. In our view, it requires reform which will take care of the interests of both. Reform is, therefore, bound to be, in effect, a compromise between conflicting interests."

That is exactly what the Bill comprises — a compromise between conflicting interests.

The Bill has three main objectives. The first is to amend the law relating to limitation of actions in negligence cases by providing potential plaintiffs with an extended period within which to commence proceedings of this nature. The second is to provide potential defendants with an overriding time limit, or a long stop, that will bar proceedings once 15 years have elapsed from the date of the defendant's original breach of duty. Thirdly, it gives a right of action to a person who acquired already damaged property when the fact of such damage was not already known and could not be known to him at the time when he acquired his interest.

In negligence cases it is the law that the cause of action accrues when damage occurs. The ordinary limitation period for negligence actions — apart from cases of personal injury with which the Bill is not concerned — is six years. Proceedings must be commenced within that time. Thereafter they will be time-barred.

In most cases of negligence the plaintiff is perfectly well able to discover within the normal six-year period of limitation that he has suffered damage. But in some cases, a defendant's negligence, or its effects, may lie hidden for years. For example, if a builder puts into a building defective foundations, the owner of the building may be quite unaware of the error. The property may pass through several hands before the damage becomes apparent. That can be many years after the initial lack of care.

In such cases, and they are multifarious in their circumstances, serious damage can result and real hardship may be caused. But the present law of limitation of actions often obstructs justice and is less than practical.

Under the present law, whose judicial development has been distinguished by some remarkable oscillations, for the victim of a negligent act or omission the starting date for reckoning the period of limitation is the date when the damage actually occurs, and time will start to run against him even if the damage is not discoverable. The result is that potential plaintiffs may find themselves barred from action before they knew, or could even be in a position to know, that they had suffered damage.

Potential defendants, too, are handicapped because they have no way of telling in advance for how long they may be at risk of legal proceedings. Where damage does not occur until long after the events giving rise to it, they are likely to be faced with the grave practical difficulties of contesting a very stale claim. Although the date of accrual is no longer — since the Pirelli case in the House of Lords — governed by discoverability, it still starts from the date of damage and it cannot be predicted when damage will occur.

The Law Reform Committee, in formulating its recommendations for reform, identified three principles which it described as being "of critical importance". They were, first, that plaintiffs must have a fair and sufficient opportunity of pursuing their remedy; secondly, that defendants are entitled to be protected against stale claims, although the sad truth is that no reform of the law can eliminate the factual uncertainties which are likely to arise in cases of latent damage; and, thirdly, that uncertainty in the law is to be avoided wherever possible.

The committee said that it would not find any proposal for reform of the law acceptable which failed in any significant respect to satisfy those criteria. Therefore, it recommended that the ordinary period of limitation of six years should be subject to a special extension which would allow the plaintiff three years from the date on which he discovered, or could reasonably have discovered, that he had suffered significant damage.

Secondly, the committee recommended that there should be a long stop which should operate to bar all negligence claims involving latent defects brought more than 15 years from the date of the defendant's breach of duty. The committee's remaining recommendations, although they are quite important, are essentially consequential upon its two principal recommendations.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): Will my hon. and learned Friend tell the House at some stage in his remarks whether he is satisfied that the interests of potential defendants in such cases will be sufficiently safeguarded by the proposals? I have in mind professional people, such as architects, one of whom has approached me about the matter. They are worried that their possibility of obtaining liability insurance will be minimised or even reduced to almost zero precisely because of the potentially open-ended nature of their liability under these proposals, as the 15-year limitation runs only from the date of discovery. Therefore, an architect may find that a fault is found many years after he has designed a building, and 15 years after that he will still be liable. Can my hon. and learned Friend satisfy my constituent and me that my constituent has any hope of obtaining effective professional liability insurance under these proposals?

The Solicitor-General: I acknowledge that there are genuine anxieties about obtaining insurance for liability for latent defect, and they were expressed to the Committee which gave them serious consideration. There is a problem. If I am asked whether the interests of architects are sufficiently well protected, my reply is yes, in the context of the necessity to balance the interests of architects and others engaged in the construction industry on the one hand, and the interests of consumers on the other. As I said at the beginning the committee said that this was an exercise in balancing conflicting interests, and I believe that that exercise has been satisfactorily achieved.

The 15-year override represents a new element in the law. As my hon. Friend knows, delay can extend, perhaps for 20 years before damage occurs, but under existing law, the architect or defendant is liable. At least that uncertainty is terminated by the 15-year override.

Mr. James Couchman (Gillingham): Is my hon. and learned Friend aware of the concern that has been expressed by a number of professional people that the 15 years can follow someone well into retirement and that even a widow may be saddled with the responsibility of her late professional husband within the 15 years?

The Solicitor-General: Indeed, I am aware of that and the committee expressly took that circumstance into account in its report. I should correct my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Forth), who said that the 15-year time bar derived from the date when the damage was discovered. That is not the case; it derives from the date of the defendant's breach of duty.

While insurance was not within the remit of the Law Reform Committee, it considered that the question of insurance should be considered by an appropriately qualified body. The Building Economic Development Committee is at present investigating the desirability and feasibility of latent defects protection insurance for non-residential buildings. Its work is taking fully into account the interests of building owners and producers, and we are awaiting its conclusions with the greatest of interest. Its work is being based on a report entitled: "Latent defects in buildings: An analysis of insurance possibilities" prepared by Atkins Planning. It is a substantial document.

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson (Newbury): There seems to be a certain inequity, since under the long-stop situation somebody who retires at 65 could still require professional indemnity insurance up to the age of 80, whereas a person who faces the same sort of problem but who still has several years of active working life ahead will be able to meet the indemnity more easily. Is the Solicitor-General satisfied that we should treat everybody the same, regardless of age? Perhaps in the case of those who are retired, we should limit the period to one more brief than 15 years.

The Solicitor-General: I can see an advantage in that from the practitioner's point of view. However, I can see no advantage at all for the customer or the client. I have no doubt that these matters will be taken into account in the course of the examination that I have mentioned. They are important and far from simple matters.

As I said, the committee's remaining recommendations are essentially consequential on its two principal recommendations. The committee concluded that its recommendations should be of general application and not confined to any specific area of activity, such as building, or class of litigant, such as house purchasers. I have explained in general terms the scope and scheme of this measure. It is confined to the tort of negligence. It does not attempt to deal with limitation under other heads of tortious liability, such as a breach of statutory duty or nuisance, nor is it concerned with matters, substantive or procedural, arising out of contract. It is confined to what the Law Reform Committee referred to in paragraph 4.4 of its report as the "relatively narrow band of 'negligence cases involving latent defects'".

The scheme is as follows. Clause 1 inserts two new sections into the principal Act, the Limitation Act 1980. New section 14A is what might be called the plaintiff's provision. It provides a special time limit for negligence actions where facts relevant to the cause of action are not known at the date of the accrual. It provides for a period of six years from the actual occurrence of the damage, which is the normal rule, or three years from the date on which the plaintiff knew or ought to have known of facts about the damage if that period expires later, within which he can institute proceedings.

New section 14B is the main defendant's provision. It provides the long stop. It prevents the institution of proceedings after 15 years from the date of the defendant's original breach of duty. The effect of the long-stop is to bar the plaintiff's remedy. It does not extinguish his right of action. It vests a defendant with the right to rely on the defence of limitation even where the plaintiff still does not know that he has suffered damage. This is because there does come a time beyond which the Government and the Law Reform Committee consider it becomes unjustifiably onerous to require potential defendants to preserve their records and to remain exposed to the uncertainties and difficulties of responding to stale claims in respect of long-past incidents.

Mr. Forth: I crave the indulgence of my hon. and learned Friend. I am a layman in these matters, as some of my hon. Friends have been kind enough gently to point out to me. If an architect makes a fault in the design of a building and that fault is discovered 16 years later, does that absolve him from responsibility? Architecture is but one of the many professions involved in these cases. If the fault is discovered many years after the original design, does the 15 years run from that point or does the period start at the point where the faulty design work is carried out? I and my constituent would like to be reassured on that point.

The Solicitor-General: The period is taken from the date of the original breach of duty. The starting point for reckoning the 15 years, the overriding time limit, is from the date of the breach of duty and not from the date on which the damage is discovered. I hope that reassures my hon. Friend.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): I should like to raise a different point about the starting date. There is still general anxiety that the accrual date for a cause of action might be difficult to define in certain circumstances. For example, one might not know whether the defect related to foundations laid in year one or year two of the building project. This might ultimately manifest itself in a defect in a building. Is it possible to consider at a later stage, or has such consideration already been rejected, a definition that relates, perhaps, to the certified completion date of the building so that one can have a more precise layman's understanding of the date from which the cause of action starts to accrue?

The Solicitor-General: It would be possible to use the completion date. That was considered by the Committee and rejected for reasons to which I shall come in about 45 seconds, if I do not give way again.

The length and date of the long-stop period follows precisely the recommendations of the Law Reform Committee. On the length of the long stop, the committee considered a number of periods of different duration. At paragraph 4.13 of its Report, it observed that the long-stop should not be so long that it had no useful effect, nor so short that it would cause injustice. It said:

"We have come to the conclusion that a period of 12 years, although it would probably work satisfactorily in most cases, might also bar some worthy claims. At the other extreme we think that a 20 year period might permit some very stale claims and expose many defendants to the risk of litigation for an unreasonable length of time. We have concluded that a 15-year period strikes the right balance between justice for plaintiffs and certainly for defendants".

The Government believe that the committee, looking at the matter from an entirely independent point of view, struck the right balance. The Lord Chancellor's Department consulted on the committee's report, and received conflicting responses, notably from those concerned within the construction industry and the appropriate professional bodies. Some commentators thought that the period was too short to be fair to plaintiffs. They suggested that nothing less than a 20-year period would be sufficient. Others have argued that the court should be empowered to exercise a discretion to permit claims after the 15-year period has expired, basing their argument on the discretion available to the courts to set aside the statutory time limit in personal injury cases. Others, with the interest of potential defendants in mind, argued that the proposed 15-years is too long. Some have suggested 12 years, others 10 or even six years. One group even suggested three months, which would at least have been a gesture.

As the Law Reform Committee recognised, the interests of potential plaintiffs and defendants conflict. Its conclusion was that the law required reform that would take care of the interests of both, which is bound to result in a compromise. We consider that the 15 years provides potential plaintiffs with a sufficient opportunity to pursue their remedy, but also provides the potential defendants with proper protection against really stale claims. It provides both with certainty, which the present law demonstrably lacks. It is not restricted to any one area or industry and covers the full range of possible instances of latent damage.

The starting date for reckoning the long-stop period has also been the subject of much discussion. The Law Reform Committee concluded that it should start to run from the date of the defendant's breach of duty. That is the effect of subsection (1) of new section 14B. Some have criticised this approach for its alleged uncertainty. An alternative suggestion that has been put forward on behalf of th construction industry is the date of completion of the building. The Law Reform Committee considered several alternative dates of commencement. Of the "date of completion" approach it said:

"We are doubtful, though, whether this is really a satisfactory alternative and in particular we can see formidable difficulties in adapting the concept of completion to all the types of circumstances (other than personal injury) where latent damage might arise. There is also the possibility of injustice to defendants where completion, on a very large project for instance, takes place many years after the relevant breach of duty."

It came down in favour of breach of duty. I need not develop further the basis for that.

Mr. Simon Hughes rose

The Solicitor-General: I wish to get on, and I have given way several times.

Clause 2, which is consequential on clause 1, adds a new section 28A to the 1980 Act. Subsection (1) gives additional protection to those who are under a disability at the time of discoverability. Subsection (2) disapplies the special time limits in new section 14A, and the long-stop in new section 14B, in negligence cases where the defendant has deliberately concealed facts from the plaintiff.

Clause 3 creates a fresh cause of action for the successor in title — he may, for instance, be a purchaser — who does not know and could not be expected to have known that the relevant property was already damaged when he acquired his interest. Time will run in future as if no transfer had occurred, but it will be treated as having started on the date when the original cause of action accrued. The balance is thus maintained.

The remaining provisions of the Bill are purely supplementary and do not require any elaboration at this stage.

This short but highly technical Bill will make for fewer hard cases, although it will not eliminate them, and for better law. I commend it to the House.

11.10 pm

Mr. John Morris (Aberavon): I am sure that the thanks of the whole House go to the Solicitor-General for his careful exposition of the Bill. Our thanks also go — as did those of the Solicitor-General — to Lord Scarman and the distinguished members of the Law Reform Committee, upon whose 24th report the Bill is based.

Let me say immediately that I support the principles of the Bill, in the same spirit as Lord Silkin of Dulwich did in another place. The current mischief related by the Solicitor-General is dealt with by the Bill. Some may say that the Bill has gone too far, while others may say that it does not go far enough. However, the introduction of such proposals as are before us is not an exact science. To satisfy everyone would be simply wonderful, but, as the Solicitor-General said, this is a compromise Bill; with all the strengths and weaknesses of a compromise. That does not mean that necessarily I am satisfied with every proposal, and I shall return to some of them.

Although the Bill does not deal exclusively with causes of action in negligence arising from latent defects in buildings, it is in this area that the mischief primarily lay, and I prophesy that it is in this area that most advantage will be taken of it.

Defendants and their organisations are usually well organised, and there have been interventions in that vein. They are frequently insured and well able to take care of themselves. On the other hand, plaintiffs are one-off sufferers and frequently one-off litigants. I would have thought that Conservative Members would intervene on behalf of those who believe in a home-owning democracy. There has been none so far, but perhaps we shall hear interventions on behalf of greater and better protection for plaintiffs. I look forward to that.

The resources of plaintiffs are generally much more limited, and I shall not weep unduly if the balance is tilted more in favour of plaintiffs. On the other hand, as the Solicitor-General rightly said, the Bill brings certainty to defendants as well.

Nevertheless, I want to raise a real problem which I hope the Solicitor-General and the Lord Chancellor's Department will consider. It is a growing problem that will be considered more and more in due course, and it relates to the growth of claims for professional negligence. One is told that in some areas the practice of medicine is becoming increasingly more hazardous in the United States becaue of the substantial growth of negligence claims. Here in the last five years there has been a dramatic growth in personal claims for professional negligence, resulting in an increased cost of insurance premiums.

Where a claim is justified, every facility must be provided so that just claims brought in reasonable time are not denied justice, but we should be aware of the consequences, and the parallel that I shall pose has general application to the area with which we are now dealing.

If medicine ever became too expensive to practise because of the high cost of insurance, the bottom line of benefit to the public would be a minus figure. This is an extreme example. In the area with which we are now dealing — architecture in particular — claims running to millions of pounds can arise even after the death of the architect. Indeed, I understand that in one instance in Liverpool the widow of a notable architect was sued many years after his death. That is a matter that we must examine. The responsibility on accountants is becoming more onerous daily as one reads of the claims contemplated for huge amounts in litigation.

The repeal of the model Act in 1825, the passing of the Joint Stock Companies Act in 1844 and the eventual Limited Liability Act in 1855, were major milestones in the creation of modern society. I suspect that the concept of limited liability was not achieved without considerable growing pains. It certainly was the engine for the development of this country as an industrial nation and a world financial capital. If the principle of personal liability had been maintained — I am sure that there were good reasons — progress would have been stultified.

I raise this point now, against the background of the Bill. I believe that those who give professional advice should be responsible for that advice and should, in the case of negligence, be made to answer for it if damage is caused. Fortunately, well-ordered professions are insured. My profession certainly is and the costs can be recouped from a broad spread of clients. However, when a claim exceeds the insured amount, the result can break an individual's professional practice. Many professions, including mine, will not allow partnerships, let alone limited liability. Has not the time come to examine seriously limited liability for those who give professional advice?

As I said earlier, it is of no value to the public if professions become too hazardous to practise, or if because of one major claim dispensers of counsel are put out of business. It is of no benefit to the individual plaintiff if insufficient funds are available to meet his claim. It is of no benefit to him if the cost of insurance is so enormous that he has to pay through the nose for services. I believe strongly in taking responsibility for damage, wherever it occurs, but we must consider where we are going as regards quantum.

I endorse the principles behind the Bill. As the Solicitor-General said, plaintiffs must have a fair and sufficient opportunity to pursue their remedies. Secondly, defendants are entitled to protection against stale claims. Thirdly, uncertainty in the law is to be avoided where possible.

The countermanding of the wisdom in the cases of Sporham-Souter in 1976, Anns v. London Borough of Merton and similar cases by the Pirelli case, which was mentioned by the Solicitor-General, was not only a matter of great regret, but was little short of a catastrophe. The House of Lords in its judicial capacity, was right to say that it was time that this matter was looked into.

It needed this Bill to deal with that last decision, when it was held that the date of limitation arose when the cracks in the chimney first appeared, although no one had seen them, no one had been up the chimney and no one knew that they were there. This measure brings relief by adding to the provision that action may be brought, in addition to the present liability period, three years from the date on which the plaintiff knew, or should have known, about the damage — whichever is the later.

Of course, the Bill does not pretend to cover every case. Some will fall outside even this extension, but hopefully very few. A limitation in the 15-year long-stop period is now proposed. The case for that is the need for certainty. There must be some end — although it can be argued as to what should be the end — to the possibility of litigation. There is a dichotomy between the principle of certainty and the principle of fair and sufficient opportunity to bring an action.

I believe that the Committee has made a fair stab at the problem. However, I should have preferred it to examine, as has been done in other limitation areas, the possibility of some flexibility. This is a matter to which we may return in Standing Committee, to determine whether the proposed period is right, whether it is too comprehensive and whether some discretion should be exercised in the way in which it operates.

There were many important discussions — and we value them — in another place. Many amendments were tabled, especially by the noble Lord Hacking, who prosecuted many of them with great zeal. However, none of the total of 15 amendments moved in Committee or of the six on Report were accepted. It might be that we will not pursue all these matters in Committee, but we may wish to raise some of them especially the long-stop period.

At this hour of the night I do not propose to weary the House by going into any further details, save to repeat that while it is a compromise Bill, it is a fair attempt to put the law — certainly in one respect — where it was before and to bring certainty, which should be valued by defendants.

The noble Lord Denning said that this was a reforming Bill in a situation that was crying out for reform. I certainly support the spirit of the Bill.

Mr. Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet): It may be helpful if I declare a possible interest. I am a non-practising architect, but I have been a member of the Royal Institute of British Architects for 26 years.

To judge from the remarks that have been made, it is obvious that architects in particular and the construction industry in general are deeply affected by the provisions of the Bill. I welcome the principle of the Bill, which tries to strike a balance of fairness between — to use legal jargon — potential plaintiffs, who, generally speaking, and in terms of the Bill, would be owners of buildings, and potential defendants, who could be not only architects, builders, subcontractors, specialists and civil engineers, but local authorities. They have responsibilities in the process of building, not least in inspecting the building works to ensure they are in accordance with the building regulations.

There is no doubt in my mind that there is a need for a change in the law on latent damage, because it is complex, obscure and uncertain, and has been for the past 10 years, principally as a result of a judicial decision known as Anns v. London Borough of Merton. Unfortunately, many people in the construction industry have concluded that the compromise solution — I accept that there must be a compromise — instigated by the Lord Chancellor's Law Reform Committee, whose proposals are clearly the basis for the Bill, leaves the law just as uncertain, complex and obscure, if not more so.

I shall say why I believe that to be the case. There are three themes to the measure. The first is that it is designed to retain the existing limitation of six years from the accrual of the cause of action, and it still leaves the courts to determine whether the cause of action accrues at common law. Secondly, the Bill decrees — this is my word — that there is a long-stop of 15 years from the date of the breach of duty. Thirdly, the plaintiff must bring his action within three years of what has been called "discoverability" — the word is not specifically mentioned in the Bill — of the latent damage. The Bill contains a lengthy and complicated definition of discoverability, which is taken from the law on damages for personal injury. I suggest that it is not helpful or relevant in respect of construction works.

Mr. Greg Knight (Derby, North): I am listening with interest to what my hon. Friend is saying. What does he find uncertain about the long stop provisions? Surely an architect knows that after 15 years any action is statute barred.

Mr. Chapman: I shall try to explain exactly what I mean. There seems to be no statutory definition in the Bill of breach of duty. I suggest that it is not as certain as lawyers seem to think. My hon. Friend will want evidence of that—not merely an assertion. Surely it is borne out by the series of judicial decisions handed down from and since the Anns v. London Borough of Merton case in 1977, which have instigated the need for the Bill. I do not believe that the Bill cures the problems contained in that series of judicial decisions.

I shall give an example. I ask my hon. and learned Friend to comment on it when he replies to the debate. I suggest that if there is deliberate concealment, another law seems to operate. The Bill excludes the provisions of sections 14*(a)* and 14*(b)* of the Limitation Act 1980 where there has been deliberate concealment of any fact relative to the plaintiff's right of action. On the face of it that seems to be reasonable, but it is not reasonable when one realises that the phrase "deliberate concealment" is defined in section 32(2) of the 1980 Act thus: "deliberate concealment—"

"of a breach of duty in circumstances in which it is unlikely to be discovered for some time amounts to deliberate concealment of the facts involved in that breach of duty."

With the greatest respect, in the context of construction works, with which the Bill is principally concerned, the majority of defect cases will fall into that category. That means that the criterion by which such cases will be decided will be that of discoverability, with all the uncertainty that that involves.

I want to persuade the House that I am not trying to make a special plea on behalf of my erstwhile profession, because I believe that it is just as much in the interests of prospective plaintiffs — the owners of buildings — that the law should be stated unequivocally, even if it involves rough justice on both sides. The one thing that an aggrieved plaintiff wants is a quick remedy at law, with compensation. I suggest that delay or legal arguments — which will be as great under the Bill's provisions as under present law — will not help plaintiffs in getting defects remedied quickly.

I should like to say also, because it is germane to the problem, that if the defendant — say, a builder — is not in business at the time the case comes up and the architect or civil engineer cannot afford the professional indemnity premium, the plaintiff does not receive damages. I stand to be corrected if I am wrong on that point. I understand that in recent years architects' premiums have soared. In many firms — I do not think that this is an exaggeration — those premiums exceed more than 10 per cent. of the gross fee income of the practice. That is the case, even for a firm which does not have a bad record or has had no claims laid against it. Hon. Members on both sides of the House will realise that, unlike in the motor insurance business, there is no such thing as a no-claims bonus being operable.

The Solicitor-General: I wonder whether it would help my hon. Friend if I dealt immediately with his point about concealment. He quoted section 32 of the 1980 Act, which is the relevant legislation, and argued that in the majority of cases the criterion will be discoverability. He said—I paraphrase his comments — that most of the matters complained of were unlikely to be discovered for a considerable time. The answer is that the key word in section 32(2) of the 1980 Act is "deliberate". The section states:

"For the purposes of subsection (1) above, deliberate commission of a breach of duty in circumstances in which it is unlikely to be discovered for some time amounts to deliberate concealment".

Most of these cases amount to a breach of duty which is not deliberate. Where there is a deliberate commission of a breach of duty, it is justifiable that that should be categorised as deliberate concealment. I think my hon. Friend will find that that is not quite his point.

Mr. Chapman: I am immensely grateful to my hon. and learned Friend. I hope that he has reassured many people working in this field, at least on that matter. I have read the Lord Chancellor's Law Reform Committee report deeply and carefully. I realise that in paragraph 4.20 a number of points are advanced in relation to this matter. Equally, I know that my hon. and learned Friend will understand that I have been advised that the law would stand in the way that I have described. Perhaps that matter will be considered in more detail in Committee.

I apologise for keeping the House, but I should like to make a few more comments. A number of hon. Members have mentioned that an architect—or a civil engineer or any other design consultant—will face the prospect of paying high premiums after retirement. Unlike other forms of insurance, one does not in this case insure the product for all time. The design consultant — whether he is the architect or the civil engineer or anyone else — can insure himself or his company only for a particular year. If a company has to pay more than 10 per cent. of its gross fee income, the penalty and financial obligation imposed on a person who has retired will be severe.

As I understand the operation of the law and judicial decisions, if a builder who is liable to have a claim made against him ceases business, that liability can and may be passed on to the architect. Therefore, the architect or perhaps the other design consultant seems to be liable, in the event of a builder going out of business, for the total liability and not just his possible part of it. I have to say, at the risk of meeting the opprobrium of the legal Members of this august Chamber, that statistics show that compensation finally paid to injured parties is substantially less than the income derived by the legal profesison in dealing with a claim under these forms of latent damage.

The law must be a fair compromise in such cases. I accept that absolutely, and it is in the interest of owners that it should be fair and reasonable to defendants. The British Property Federation, which of course cannot claim to speak on behalf of all owners of buildings, but can claim to speak on a substantial sector of ownership in the building industry, recognises that and states unequivocally that, above all, the law must be certain. Before 1977 and Anns v. London Borough of Merton, the accepted convention was a six-year liability from the completion of the job in contract or tort; unless the contract was under seal, when the liability under contract was for 12 years. Apart from the discrepancy between the 12 years and 15 years, which would leave matters undecided in at least certain contracts, I appreciate the endeavours of the Lord Chancellor's Law Reform Committee and the logic and propriety of the Government in presenting the Bill. However, I respectfully suggest to my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General that the Bill should be amended in Committee.

I should like my hon. and learned Friend to confirm that, although he was right to point out the nuances and differences of the disparate parts of the construction industry — they could not initially agree on exactly how the law should be changed — there is now a consensus not only in the construction industry but it is shared by the British Property Federation. That view is that the most practical and fair solution to this difficult problem should be a long-stop, which is 15 years from the breach of duty, as provided in the Bill, or 12 years from the completion of the work. My hon. and learned Friend might say that the sting is in the tail because they recommend that it should either be the long-stop of 15 years or 12 years from the completion of the work, whichever expires first.

Many of us could argue that the long-stop should be reduced to 10 years, which, incidentally, is the proposal in the EEC document on product liability, or, for example — obviously I choose examples that are beneficial to the point I am trying to assert to the House — that the position should be 10 years as it is in France. The liability period, incidentally, is five years in Denmark. I believe that the consensus of the contruction industry and the British Property Federation should be the one that the Government earnestly and sympathetically consider. I believe that it will cause fewer anomalies if that holds true, rather than the Government's proposals, and it is for that reason that I commend that proposal to the House.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): I am grateful for the opportunity to substitute for my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile), who would normally be in his place to speak on behalf of my party on measures of this sort. I am pleased to act as his junior. We share the view of the Solicitor-General and the right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris), who spoke from the Opposition Front Bench, that the Bill is one to be welcomed. We welcome the principle and, in substantial measure, the details of the Bill.

I shall start where the hon. Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman) finished. The hon. Gentleman suggested that in seeking to achieve the fair compromise, which should be the right test, we should look to the British Property Federation. That suggests immediately a degree of unfairness in definition. As the Solicitor-General rightly said, we are seeking to find a compromise between two groups, the consumer, who will normally be the plaintiff, and the industry, which will normally be the defendant. I understand many of the arguments that the hon. Member for Chipping Barnet advanced, but it is inevitable that the British Property Federation, as any group representing a part of the whole of the industry, would be likely to see matters primarily through its own eyes.

Mr. Chapman: I was saying that the British Property Federation is the consumer in this instance. It cannot claim to represent all consumers, that is all the owners, but some of its members are developers and owners who commission builders to erect buildings.

Mr. Hughes: That I understand. The greatest inequity, inevitably, as the Solicitor-General said, lies as between the person who is in most instances a one-off plaintiff — someone who finds only once in his life that there is a defect in the building, whether he is a house owner, a property owner or a possessor of another property — and those who work in property for a living. In most instances the construction industry will be involved. Only a minority will involve professional negligence. In cases of commercial activity, occupation, profession and income, there are normally more available remedies in the form of insurance, to which the Solicitor-General has referred, than for the person who, only once in a lifetime, finds himself needing to challenge something with which the Bill concerns itself.

The attempt to find a balance is something that is prima facie best done by a body such as the Law Reform Committee. I join those who have already paid tribute to the committee. It is always good to see proposals made by such committees coming before the House. By their very nature they are impartial assessments that have been made on the basis of practicality by those with experience of dealing with practicalities. Those who comprise the Law Reform Committee and seek to propose reforms act through the eyes of those who have seen how the law works and not on behalf of the consumer alone or of the industry alone.

It is clear that the law was not working. There were occasions when people were impeded in taking rightful action because they discovered that something had been done negligently at too late a stage, through no fault of their own. The Bill properly addresses all the issues that are relevant within the areas of tort and negligence. That was the diet on which I was brought up in my earlier existence as a lawyer outside the House before I became a Member of this place. Cases such as Anns v. London Borough of Merton were important tests in which it was established, or thought to be established, that someone could take a party to court – in the case to which I have referred, a local authority – and succeed where that party, or someone down the line from him, had been negligent in his professional duty. The same test applies whether one is talking about the building industry, which was one of the areas in which I used to work as a member of the Bar, or in terms of professional negligence. The same test applies because one is seeking to find a method of protecting people who may not be able to discover that what they were given by way of advice, or what they secured by way of agreement, was negligent until much later. Clause 1 allows for certainty, which is something that I have heard called for by Conservative Members. It states – the deadline is not too long – that actions will not be allowed more than six years after the date "on which the cause of action accrued".

It will be six years in some instances and three years in others. Those are certain and not very long periods. They will arise only when the facts relevant to the action were not known when the action accrued.

I must make the point to the Solicitor-General about the date and the definition of the course of action. He will appreciate that there is still some anxiety about that definition. Lawyers may be able to understand that definition easily, but it does not give certainty because, as the Solicitor-General will probably understand better than any other hon. Member, one of the purposes of the Bill is to achieve certainty throughout these matters. Although there may be long periods during a construction project when the period is sufficiently long to make another definition difficult, if we accept the suggestion that I made about the date set for completion there may be a possibility of dealing with that definition because there are often staged completion certificates in the larger building contracts. I hope that that question can be dealt with in Committee, to achieve certainty of definition as well as certainty of period, which I believe that the Bill has achieved.

The new section 14B causes some concern, as the hon. Member for Chipping Barnet made clear in his speech. It suggests a 15-year period overriding period. We properly have a duty to allay the fear of the lay community, which was expressed in the intervention of the hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Forth). We are required to say that that is an absolute long-stop. It is important for people to know that if the period of 15 years passes, that is the limit and people may then sleep safely and soundly in their beds in the knowledge that they cannot be defendants after that period.

It is important that there should be a long-stop. If we are to consider guidance as to whether that long-stop should be 12, 15 or 20 years, we could probably best consider the advice of the committee that produced the proposals for the Bill. It is difficult and we are plucking a figure out of the air. There is no perfect figure. We are trying to deal with the realities of experience. The Solicitor-General will know, and I recall from practical experience not just at the Bar, that there are often long delays before problems come to light.

Soon after I was elected, substantial defects were found on the Bonamy estate in my constituency. It was then too late for action to be taken through the courts against the architects, builders and developers by the local authority. That defect in procedure has cost the local authority a substantial sum of money. I pass no judgment as to whether the local authority should have discovered the problems before, but a period substantially less than the 15 years suggested in the Bill would not have been sufficient for the authority to act. Often if there are defects, especially in the foundations, it takes a long time for the evidence to come to light and for any one to be properly advised to take action. I urge the House to resist the suggestion to alter the period for a long-stop below 15 years before we have considered that and taken the independent, non-client-based advice of the Law Reform Committee.

When we consider the dates, we must also consider the practices in other countries. We should also consider the interlocking practicalities for the profession. One of these practicalities involves insurance and we have a duty to examine ways in which insurance can be provided properly. We should follow the Solicitor-General's suggestion that we should consult on the report that he mentioned and reach a conclusion.

It might also be useful to compare the growing practice of guarantees being given with buildings. I believe that I am correct to say the National House Building Council now has a 10-year guarantee period. If that is right, and the Bill goes through with a 15 year long-stop, the two ought to be married.

If someone deliberately conceals something, but not with the intention that it should be concealed for ever, that is sufficient mischief to come within the definition of deliberate concealment. We all know how things may be done when builders try to get around planning legislation. The mischief will come to light eventually. We must try to prevent that.

It is worrying that someone who retires at, for example, 60, should have to carry a liability into retirement, or have his estate or family carry one. The appropriate way around that is insurance. No doubt the right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon took out insurance in his chambers. That is now the norm for people who might be the recipients of a writ or legal action. There are mechanisms in trades and professions for picking up people who do not take out insurance. We should look to insurance to protect people who are not at fault, such as spouses. It should not be a sufficient argument against the principle that some people will not be in practice and therefore not earning enough to pay.

I hope that the Committee will examine the Bill carefully. I also hope that its principle, which comes from the independent proposal of the Law Reform Committee, will be accepted. That being so, we shall have achieved a fair compromise. I hope that the Government will give the proposal a trial period before giving in to any side's demands to compromise on a well-researched and sound proposal.

Mr. David Crouch (Canterbury): This will be rather more of a question for my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General than a speech.

I have studied closely all the reports of the proceedings of the other place in the Bill. I was enormously impressed by the wisdom and depth of the investigation made by so many Members of another place and by the extremely helpful and thoughtful investigation carried out by the Law Reform Committee under the chairmanship of Lord Scarman.

My question concerns what comes outside the Bill. Paragraph 1.6 of the Law Reform Committee's report refers to,

"matters outside our terms of reference".

In studying the reports of debates in another place, I noticed that their Lordships concentrated on the problems arising in the construction industry, and especially in domestic houses. I am anxious about the problems of latent damage in the construction of industrial plants, and I am talking of buildings costing £10 million, £20 million, £50 million, £100 million or even more.

The British Chemical Engineering Contractors Association, which gave evidence to Lord Scarman's committee, is a group of about nine vast contractors, which build chemical plants in Britain and elsewhere. Those plants are extremely expensive. The contracts already contain many provisos concerning responsibility. How far does the Bill go in defining the liabilities of the constructors and operators of such plants?

The Solicitor-General: Just as much.

Mr. Crouch: That worries me, because it is an enormous responsibility. It is rather worrying for the industry that that should be so.

Their Lordships said much about the large-scale construction of dwelling houses, but nothing about the construction of steel or chemical plants. The contracts drawn up in those cases contain a clear division of responsibilities between contractors and operators of plants. A plant can go wrong because of maladministration by its management. That has been shown in famous cases, for example, in the nuclear industry. I do not mean Chernobyl, for we do not know what went wrong there; but we know what went wrong at Three Mile Island. Not only the construction but the management of the plant was faulty. Where did the responsibility lie? How will this important Bill affect liability in this contentious area?

I do not wish to delay the House further, but this is an important point, and I hope that my hon. and learned Friend can give a clear assurance, if not now, in Committee, so that anxieties in the construction and operating sectors of the chemical industry can be allayed.

Mr. Neil Thorne (Ilford, South): I declare an interest in this matter as a chartered surveyor and as a member of Lloyd's.

The right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris) asked Conservative Members to declare their interests in the plaintiff, and I wish to identify with the plaintiff in such matters. However, I am against greedy lawyers. We should not create another field day for them in this area. My hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman) was right to say that lawyers have done well out of such claims. I was glad to hear that the right hon. and learned Gentleman's branch of the legal profession has joined the rest of us by becoming liable for negligence in their sphere of activity.

The public must be properly protected. Nobody would disagree with the Government's aims in doing that. But it is also important that, in achieving that objective, they should not make it more difficult for the public to obtain professional advice at a resonable price. If, as the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) mentioned, professional people are priced out of the market, they may try to recover their additional insurance premiums from their clients, which will add considerably to the cost, and also lead to fewer people being available to give advice.

I understand that in the United States, in some fields of medicine, doctors are having to withdraw their services completely because of the claims that are being made against them through the courts. That is a worrying situation and I hope that we shall not reach that stage in Britain.

Mr. Keith Best (Ynys Môn): I am most grateful to my hon. and gallant Friend for giving way. Although the old maxim used to be justitia magnum emolumentum est, I would make one plea on behalf of the lawyers. When my hon. Friend compares the position in the United States and here, I am sure that he is aware of the contingency fee basis in the United States and the fact that damages are determined by juries. As a member of Lloyd's — I declare my own interest — he will know only too well that that is the principal cause for alarm about damages awarded in the United States, not the system that we have here.

Mr. Thorne: I fully accept what my hon. Friend says. I would hate British law to get into that position. Nevertheless, my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet mentioned that already half the damages seem to go to lawyers in Britain, so goodness knows what must go to those in the United States. We certainly want to avoid that.

If a building is constructed by a contractor who acts negligently and 25 years later a defect is found, as I understand it there would then be three years in which the occupier or owner could make a claim. If the contractor had by that time gone out of business, presumably the person against whom action would be taken would be the designer or the architect or some other engineer. That would mean that there would be a claim perhaps 28 years after a building had been constructed. If that is the case, that could be well after the designer's death. Would his widow then be expected to sell her possessions, including her house, in order to satisfy some claim which had originated through some defective work by a contractor 28 years before? I should be grateful if my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General could reassure me on that when he replies. If that is what we are suggesting, we should think long and hard before we put that into effect.

I should also be grateful if my hon. and learned Friend could advise the House whether in view of the liability which I believe has recently come to rest on the shoulders of some local authorities — they have been found to be involved in negligence claims if it was thought that their building inspectors were not carrying out their work properly — they would also be similarly involved and have some commitment.

[Mr. Thorne]

The point that has been made about the enormous cost to a retired person is important. Certainly, if 10 per cent. of the gross fees have to be laid out in insurance payments, and if that is to be continued for at least 15 years after retirement, I would also like an assurance that the architect or designer could get tax relief, if nothing else, upon that payment. I had heard that that was a source of great concern to professional people: that they could not offset their insurance payments for that reason.

In Committee I hope that it will be possible to consider the question whether or not, after 15 years, it would not seem more reasonable to place the matter on the shoulders of the insuring company of the builders. After such a period, it would be right and proper to expect insurance to be covered by building insurance, particularly in view of the complexity which is likely to arise and the hardship which could be caused, especially to individuals not practising under limited liability.

The right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon said that the professions should be moving towards limited liability. That has started in one or two professions and I am sure that the move will be extended in the coming years. It could smack of a desire to exonerate oneself from the liability that has traditionally rested on the shoulders of professional people. I would not wish the Government's action in this measure to force professional people in that direction. That would be a great mistake. I await my hon. and learned Friend's reply with interest.

12.6 am

Mr. Greg Knight (Derby, North): The right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris) was a little unkind when he implied that Conservative Members were concerned only about the interests of potential defendants. We are interested in ensuring that as far as possible justice is done.

During the debate it has become clear that the present law causes injustice both to potential defendants and to plaintiffs and that action is need to rectify the problem. Such action involves a balancing act between three points. First, the plaintiffs must have a fair opportunity to pursue their remedy. Secondly, the defendants are entitled to be protected against stale claims. Thirdly, as far as possible uncertainty in the law is to be avoided. By and large the Bill achieves that balance, so I support it.

However, I wish to express my disappointment that the Bill does nothing about the matter raised by Lord Hacking in another place in respect of the accrual point for the periods of limitation. One difficulty that exists for lawyers and potential litigants alike is that different actions have a different starting point for the limitation period. In other words, the clock starts to run at different points for different actions, even on the same set of facts.

I shall not enlarge upon all the differences because I sense that the House wishes to make progress. However, I refer my hon. and learned Friend to the comments of the Law Reform Committee. Paragraph 44 on page 16 states:

"In cases involving negligence, a plaintiff's cause of action might accrue at different dates depending upon whether the negligence was in the performance of a contractual duty, or a statutory duty or a duty of care at common law and this can lead to complications. Indeed a single set of facts could in theory give rise to claims for breach of duty under all three heads, with three limitation periods. This situation was criticised by a number of those who wrote to us. Our terms of reference on the other hand are limited to the relatively narrow band of 'negligence cases involving latent defects' and we consider that it would be quite inappropriate for us to make general recommendations, applicable for instance in the contract field, in the context of the present review."

That is a slight disappointment to me and I hope that, perhaps in Committee, some consideration can be given to rectifying this problem. Having said that, I welcome the measure and especially clause 3 which rectifies a long-standing problem and will enable successors in title of the original victim to inherit the cause of action. This rightly continues to be actionable only within the original limitation period and is still subject to the longstop provisions. Having expressed the minor disappointment that the Bill does not go further, I welcome the measure.

Mr. Roger Moate (Faversham): I do not know if there can be such a thing as a lawyer's paradise, because that may be a contradiction in terms, but a lawyer's paradise is an apt description of the Bill. As the House might know, there was an earlier Parliament from which lawyers were banned. The legal profession rather rudely called it the unlearned Parliament and, I think, the fool's Parliament. The layman is a fool if he trespasses on such legalistic ground as this Bill. I prefer the term drunken Parliament. That referred to a Parliament which met for only about eight days and passed hardly any legislation. It met in Glasgow and perhaps that explains the title.

Despite the fact that laymen might look at the Bill with some trepidation, there is no doubt that it could have a widespread effect on consumers and producers alike and, indeed, upon the whole community. The effects of the legislation may be quite different from those envisaged by my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General and the other Law Officers. This type of legislation has a widespread effect and will have some unexpected results over many years in commerce and in the construction industry and upon the way consumers will act. For that reason, I regret that we are debating the Bill at a rather extraordinary hour, a point with which my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General might well sympathise. The speeches by hon. Members show the interest in this legislation.

I recognise the need to remove by statute uncertainties in the existing law. As many of us know, over the years some court cases have taken the law in one direction while others have taken it in the opposite direction. It must be difficult for practitioners in businesses associated with matters of this kind to know with any certainty what the law will be in the future and it must be right in principle to have clarification of the law and to improve it.

The present law can be grossly unfair to a claimant who might well find himself beyond the limitation period before he is even aware that he has an actionable claim. In that respect the law ought to be amended. The right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris) was a little unfair to Government Members when he said that we were simply supporting the case of the producer. That is certainly not correct. There is a recognition that the law needs to be remedied.

Mr. John Morris: I was not being unfair. I was merely passing judgment, perhaps with a measure of partisanship, on the interventions that had occurred up to that time.

Mr. Moate: The right hon. and learned Gentleman should have refrained from passing judgment until he had heard the wise speeches from other hon. Members. The interests of the consumer and the producer are not as far apart as perhaps he suggests. Under these proposals, many years after fulfilling a contract or supplying a product a defendant might be the subject of a claim of which he has little or no knowledge, and about which he may have inadequate records. It is also probable that he will not have any insurance protection. Although I welcome certain principles in the Bill, I have to express serious doubts about whether the Government have got it right.

In essence, I can see the case for allowing the plaintiff the extension of the ordinary period of limitation of six years, with that additional three years from the date when he discovers, or could reasonably have discovered, that he has sustained a loss. I have not read or heard any disagreement with that proposition.

That extension in itself is dramatic. It imposes an immense burden on the producers of goods such as builders, manufacturers and any providers of any service, or upon the insurers. That is where I declare my interest. Even if it were just six years as at present, an additional three years, would be a major extension. For that reason, I argue strongly that the 15-year longstop is far too long. I dispute the contention of my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General that, somehow, 15 years represents a proper balance between the producers and the consumers.

By extending the limitation period by the three years I accept that that is an over-simplification we are already substantially tilting the balance against the producer. By then putting in a longstop, we are going too far. That is not a balance, but simply a little less unbalanced. For my hon. and learned Friend to say that some suggested 10 years and some 20 years, and that the Government stuck at 15 is simply plucking figures out of the air. This is a matter of judgment, but to go from what was in the past understood to be a limitation of six years to 15 years will strain at the bounds of commercial reality.

I also question whether we are doing the consumer a favour. Obviously we shall be doing some individuals a favour, because some will be able to make claims that would otherwise be time-barred. However, are we doing the consumer in general a favour? Are we benefiting the community? I doubt it. I can illustrate this point through the insurance profession, with which I have some connection. The problems of insurance are not just of some minor inconvenience or expense, or even of considerable expense to consumers. They have a profound affect on consumers, prices and employment. It is possible, by over-protecting the consumers, that we shall damage not only the community but those consumers.

Hon. Members have already referred to the malpractice suits in the United States, which are literally putting some doctors and dentists out of practice. More relevant to this country is that many British manufacturers cannot export their products to the United States because of the difficulty of getting liability insurance. It we encourage that trend here in the United Kingdom, which I suspect we are doing by opening the doors that bit wider, we are making it harder for manufacturers to manufacture, and builders to build.

Mr. Peter Thurnham (Bolton, North-East): As I understand it, it would be relatively simple for the purchaser of a 10-year-old house to take out an insurance policy against there being some defect in it, whereas the burden to the contracting industry of provisions to cover a 15-year period could add more to the cost of the house than taking out a simple insurance policy. Can my hon. Friend advise me on the initiative taken by the National Economic Development Office concerning such insurance? I have heard of this initiative, but not of any results.

Mr. Moate: I welcome the point made by my hon. Friend. If one is seeking to protect the home owner I accept the genuineness of the points made by Labour Members one does not necessarily do it in what I would call a rather naive way by simply extending the period of limitation to allow individuals, in theory, to be able to pursue a house builder, estate agent or solicitor who might, decades after the building of the house, no longer be around. Alternatively, if he is, it might be extremely difficult for the home owner to take action successfully.

Frankly, it sounds good but it is naive. If one is really trying to protect the home owner, one should not do it by widening the law in this way. Instead, one should look for specific remedies of the sort that have been referred to. I suspect that there is much better protection for the home owner through schemes such as the NHBRC and specific insurance than by this fairly unsatisfactory opening of the floodgates of the law.

Mr. Best: Is not the inevitable conclusion of my hon. Friend's remarks that there should be compulsory insurance? If so, in fairness he should state it. That must follow from his remarks unless there is to be some protection for a potential plaintiff. My hon. Friend should look more carefully, not at the 15-year longstop but at the fact that there is a three-year stop for a plaintiff once he knew, or ought reasonably to have known, of the defect.

Mr. Moate: I am certainly not arguing the case for compulsory insurance. I am saying that it is unrealistic to pretend that one is protecting home owners simply by extending the period of limitation. That is not a real argument in favour of the Bill. I am not sure whether I follow my hon. Friend's point. In effect there will be an opportunity for an individual to claim after six years, as at present, but if he does not discover the loss he has sustained until the fifth or sixth year, he then has three years from that date up to a maximum of 15 years. I am simply saying that a shorter period than 15 years is realistic.

Let me emphasise further just how much insurance difficulties can impinge upon the value and quality of the goods and services enjoyed by the consumer. Today, many substantial practices seriously question their ability to survive in business, faced as they are with the enormously high insurance premiums that are now being quoted. None of us can really foresee the future, but if awards become substantially greater—that seems to be the trend in the Western world—premiums get higher, and the insurance market contracts, many substantial companies or partnerships will not be able to get insurance. We can already see the effect of that on commercial activities in the United States, even on British companies acting in the United States, and we do not want to see it happen here.

That relates only to the large practitioners, and hon. Members—particularly the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes)—have glibly dealt with the question of insurance. A large number of people are single practitioners, and there is virtually no way in which they will carry on insurance for 15 years after they have retired, be they estate agents, architects, solicitors or surveyors. In reality they will not do it nor, I suspect, will most barristers maintain a 15-year run-off insurance after they have ceased practice.

Mr. Simon Hughes: There is a very practical answer to that. During the time of professional work one should insure against claims in the period of 15 years after one ceases to work, and the payment can be made during one's professional life.

Mr. Moate: The hon. Gentleman misunderstands the nature of the business at the present time. Because of the examples that exist around the world, most insurers are trying to retreat from that long-tail type of business and to curtail their exposure during that period of time. Increasingly, great difficulties will arise.

I am not saying that there should not be a long period during which claimants can claim. We have already accepted that. But I am saying that 15 years is too long, and we have a better example that we should be considering. I do not often quote with favour examples from the European Economic Community but when I do it obviously proves a good point. The EEC directive on product liability sets out a ten-year limitation. I ask my hon. Friend seriously to consider that ten years is six, plus three, plus a little more. That is as good as any period, and better than most suggested. It is a considerable extension of the present law and gives a certainty that will be helpful to all involved. I urge the House not to gloss over the difficulties which the longer period would entail for many in industry. I do not think that the longer period would confer on the user the benefits in which my hon. Friend believes.

In principle I welcome the Bill. I hope that the House will treat it seriously and consider the many representations that it is likely to receive.

Mr. Andrew Hunter (Basingstoke): The debate generated by this five-and-a-half page Bill is relatively confined. The salient points have already been made many times. Had I caught your eye earlier, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I should have tried to make many of the points covered so eloquently by my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman). I endorse, applaud and support all his arguments.

The debate has concentrated on two simple factors. The right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris) said that we should remove uncertainty from the law. Of course we must. The question is whether the Bill will do that. When considering the time factor I support my hon. Friend the Member for Faversham (Mr. Moate). We should examine carefully the 10-year precedent established by the Common Market.

We have concentrated upon clauses 1 and 2. I want to discuss clause 3. Clause 3, according to the explanatory memorandum,

"enables a person acquiring real or personal property to bring an action for negligence where the property concerned is in fact (but unknown to him) already damaged when he acquires it."

This might seem technical, but I wonder whether the clause will prove to be something of a minefield, intentionally or unintentionally. It enables those owners of houses in the categories listed in the Housing Defects Act built privately, and therefore not covered, to seek redress. The negligence referred to in clause 3 may not extend to defective housing as defined by the Housing Defects Act. That might be significant.

The Committee on the Bill will have a lot of work to do. It is a worthwhile Bill, but fundamental questions will have to be explored.

12.29 am

Mr. Peter Thurnham (Bolton, North-East): I hesitate to speak about such a legal matter, but I must declare an interest in that I am not a member of Lloyd's, I am not a lawyer, but in my limited spare time I am an engineer and I pay lawyers' fees. My hon. and learned Friends describe the Bill as a compromise and the right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris) said that he wanted to tip the balance towards the plaintiffs. I wonder whether it is in the interests of either potential defendants or plaintiffs if the balance is tipped towards lawyers.

As someone who has to run a business and decide what has to be done, I am anxious about the number of records that might have to be kept and stowed away for an excessive time from a starting point which is not at all clear.

I should declare a fuller interest in that I am a Fellow of the Institute of Mechanical Engineers, a member of the Electrical Contractors Association for many years and a recent adviser. My own business, which I founded in 1972, now employs 500 people in specialist engineering contracting. My company has had a long involvement with the committee dealing with specialist engineering contract law.

I was intrigued last week to find that my daughter, whom I am supporting while she studies law at King's college, had my company's case come up in her first-year examinations because an injustice that I had suffered had been put right by a change in the law. I was pleased to hear that. It cost £7,000 in legal fees to pursue a £1,500 contract without success in the Court of Appeal. I was told that I should go to a higher court, but I decided that I had had enough of the law.

We all agree that the present law is unjust — it is unfair to plaintiffs and defendants. The principles of the new law are much to be welcomed, and three years from discovery is obviously to the benefit of plaintiffs. I raise the practical question whether 15 years is not too excessive a period, because the breach of duty is a rather difficult period to determine for a practising contractor. Exactly what date should he put on his documents? I feel that 15 years is excessive, especially as the EEC is talking about 10 years.

I wonder whether the Solicitor-General can enlighten me as to who the members of the Law Reform Committee are. I suspect that they are all lawyers, but perhaps I am wrong. As lawyers, they say that 12 years might bar some worthy claims but would probably work satisfactorily in most cases. They say that a 15-year period probably strikes the right balance. They are seeking to strike a balance of legal niceties and are losing account of the practical realities of people who have to run businesses and decide how to deal with claims that go back such a long time.

I agree with many of the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Faversham (Mr. Moate), who might be interested to know that I rang the British Insurers Association today to discuss its view on this matter. It said that it welcomes the introduction of a long-stop, but thought that 10 years would be more practicable. If the insurers who will have to help contractors say that 10 years would be practicable, I question why the Government feel that they should go so far beyond 10 years in seeking to strike some nebulous balance in favour of the plaintiffs, who, one hon. Member said, were not organised and needed to be borne in mind. If we burden consumers with excessive costs to strike some nicety of legal balance, we will not do the people of this country a favour.

At a time when the Government say that they are cutting red tape, I earnestly ask them to reconsider whether a period as long as 15 years is in the interests of business, especially as we are seeking to find jobs for 3 million unemployed. Will it get more people back into the job market to impose a 15-year period when a lesser period has been advocated by so many who have spoken this evening, and when consumers can gain protection by taking out an insurance policy at, I suspect, a much lower cost?

Mr. Greg Knight: I know that the House wishes to make progress, and I hesitate to rise. Is my hon. Friend really suggesting that the House should encourage jerry-builders?

Mr. Thurnham: I think that my hon. Friend would agree that if a building has stayed up for 10 years it would not be too difficult for the owner or purchaser of that building to take out an insurance policy to indemnify himself against any defects that might arise. If no defects have occurred in the first 10 years, I cannot believe that it would be difficult for him to take out insurance to cover himself. To suggest that someone is not a jerry-builder if there is nothing wrong in 15 years, but is a jerry-builder if something goes wrong in 10 years is a rather silly distinction, if I may say so, without being disrespectful.

On the one hand, we are arguing about political judgments as to whether the period should be 10 or 15 years and, on the other, we are asking architects and others to keep massive records and access to those records for 50 per cent. longer. For what purpose should we burden the industry with those costs? It is for no purpose other than to satisfy a few lawyers that they were doing the right thing from a legal point of view, and perhaps some political judgments which were arrived at too quickly and without proper attention to the costs that would be incurred.

The Solicitor-General: I express my gratitude for the welcome that has been given by the right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris) to the Bill. I thank hon. Members for their kind remarks regarding the work of the Committee.

I think that the House has moved some distance from an understanding of the concept of negligence. We are talking about provisions to deal with the limitation of actions arising from negligence — negligence by those responsible for turning out a product containing a latent defect. Negligence means failure to take reasonable care in all the circumstances. For the consumer, who is the victim of negligence in those circumstances, that means not getting what he has paid for, not being able to recognise that at the time, and having to carry the can unless he can have a remedy in the courts.

Most hon. Members' constituents would wish to have a remedy in the courts in those circumstances. The law, as it stands, gives them a remedy, and it is a remedy without time, to the extent that they may bring an action provided they are within the statutory period of limitation starting from the date when the damage occurred. If a builder uses concrete which turns into Stilton cheese after 20 years, it is only from 20 years that the statutory limitation period starts to run. The law at present makes a builder liable — this is the answer to the question by my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, South (Mr. Thorne) — and vulnerable to an action for damages provided it is brought within six years from that date — 20 years after he built the house which turns into Stilton cheese.

What the Bill does in the interests of the defendants — the builders — in those circumstances is to say, "In no circumstances may an action be brought 15 years after the date of your breach of duty, your negligence, your failure to take reasonable care." Those who have inveighed against the hardship occurring to defendants — if the Bill is enacted — have not fully understood that point, I feel. Perhaps we shall have an opportunity in Committee to demonstrate a little more clearly how that is actually a benefit to defendants in such circumstances.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman raised the issue of limited liability. I think that I should limit my own liability by informing him that I have noted his suggestions carefully and will bring them to the attention of my right hon. Friends, without any commitment whatsoever.

For many months and indeed years my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman) has displayed great interest and knowledge in these issues. I am grateful for his welcome of the principle of the Bill. I was sorry that he found so much to criticise in it. When he said that it contained no statutory definition of breach of duty, he was seeing a tiger where no real difficulty exists. The concept of negligence is well understood. The definition of discoverability has occasioned no real difficulty. I dealt with my hon. Friend's anxieties at the time in connection with the concealment provision.

My hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet apparently believes that the architect becomes liable if the builder who is a subcontractor goes out of business. I am able to reassure my hon. Friend and others who have raised that issue. It is not true to say that an architect will be responsible for the negligence of the builder where the latter becomes bankrupt. As a matter of general principle, a person who arranges for work to be done for him by an independent contractor is not liable for the negligence of the contractor in the course of carrying out the work, provided, of course, that he has taken reasonable care to choose someone who is suitable. But an architect who is held only partly to blame for a defective building cannot be held fully liable simply because another defendant has gone bust. Nor can an architect who would not otherwise be held liable be liable because someone has gone bust. That is also the answer to part of the question raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, South.

Mr. Chapman: Surely the point is that the role of an architect is not only to design the building but to a certain degree, to supervise and overlook its construction. If the plaintiff cannot sue—if that is the right legal word—the contractor, inevitably he sues the architect, as he is advised to do, to try to make out a case that the architect did not supervise the job properly, even though there was a liability on the builder to construct the building properly.

The Solicitor-General: If the architect were liable at all, he would be liable whether or not the builder was also liable.

I say yes to the suggestion of the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) that there is no special magic about 15 years. However, it represents, in the views of the Government and the Law Reform Committee, a reasonable compromise between those who want 20 years, such as the Consumers Association and many others, and those who would like 12 years or fewer. I agree; let us see how it works.

My hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury (Mr. Crouch) asked whether the Bill's provisions will apply to chemical works. The answer is yes. But we are dealing with latent defects, not with questions of management and with someone who sets the wrong temperature at Chernobyl, or whatever. We are talking about latent defects in the construction of premises. The Bill is not limited to the construction of housing.

In the rather elaborate illustration posed by my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, South, a person discovers 28 years after work has been completed that there is something wrong. There would be a complete bar to his bringing any action, because such an action cannot be brought any later than 15 years after the breach of duty. I shall certainly not at this stage embark on questions of tax relief for insurance premiums. I expect that my hon. Friend knows more about it than I do.

I appreciate the welcome given to the Bill by my hon. Friend the Member for Derby, North (Mr. Knight). One will have a reasonable chance of successful law reform if one limits one's objectives. It is not the point of the Bill to interfere with the law relating to accrual of a cause of action. My hon. Friend the Member for Faversham (Mr. Moate) thinks that that will have unsuspected results, although he recognises that the law is unfair to plaintiffs. I am grateful to him for his fair speech in that regard. I must say, with respect, that my hon. Friend confused questions of limitation with questions of liability. At present, the date of accrual is the date when the damage first occurred—15 years from the date of breach of duty is a restriction on the liability to which a building constructor may be subject.

Mr. Thurnham: Will my hon. and learned Friend give way?

The Solicitor-General: I should like to finish. Of course I shall give way if my hon. Friend insists, but we all want to proceed.

Those who say that this is bad for the consumer because insurance premiums will increase seem to be saying that it is easy for the consumer to take out an insurance policy to cover the risk. If it is easy for the consumer to do that, I do not see why it becomes impossible, in terms of price, for the contractor or architect to do so. All of these matters can be gone into in more detail in Committee. It will obviously be an interesting Committee.

This has been a Second Reading debate and I choose to get from this debate a general welcome for the effect of the Bill, which is to reduce the injustice of the present law and strike a fairer balance between the conflicting interests of the construction industry and those who buy its product. I commend the Bill to the House and I hope that it will get a Second Reading.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill read a Second time and committted to a Standing Committee pursuant to Standing Order No. 42 (Committal of Bills).

Crown Agents (Amendment) Bill

Not amended (in the Standing Committee) considered. Bill reported, without amendment.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the Bill be now read the Third time.—[Mr. Raison.]

12.45 am

Mr. Stuart Holland (Vauxhall): The waiving of interest in international development is not something that we wish to oppose, provided the case is right, that it is merited in development terms and that it is subject to the scrutiny and approval of the House. The question is whether the House will have such scrutiny and powers of approval, since clause 1*(b)* deems that section 17(10) of the Crown Agencies Act 1979 shall cease to have effect. Perhaps the Minister could elaborate on the case for that. On what grounds is it unduly burdensome on the House that it should not have the power of section 17(10) of the original Act? After all, in the Second Reading Committee on 18 December the Minister said that he could not

"predict to what extent the power will need to be used."—[Official Report, Second Reading Committee, 18 December 1985; c. 4.]

On those grounds, why can the right hon. Gentleman be so sure that no order should be laid before the House and approved by resolution of the House?

We all know the background to the financial difficulties of the Crown Agents—the property speculation of the early 1970s, followed by a cleaning of the stables, only to be followed by the loss of the Brunei contract and the knock-on effect on development financing of other projects which that has entailed. Why is there to be no reference to the House in the future? It is not as if we still have a Select Committee on Development which could supplement the Floor of the House by giving such scrutiny as will be denied by the deletion of section 17(10).

In the Second Reading Committee the Minister failed in his winding-up speech to answer one of the three main points that I put to him on the question of finance. It is relevant to the question of waiving interest. My question was whether there would be any obligation on the Crown Agents to become a licensed deposit taker. We would be glad to know the Government's views on that matter.

I also raised with the Minister the question whether the 50:50 joint ventures with Lloyd's were a liability to the agents. At that time, 18 December, he said that they were not. Is he so satisfied today?

I congratulate the Minister on his decision to retain the pensions division of the Crown Agents within the Overseas Development Administration. We were pleased that he could see delegations on that matter before the decision, and glad that the decision was made. May we have an assurance from him tonight that the provision in the Bill for waiving interest is designed to serve the continuing work of the agents as a public body, rather than a backdoor to privatisation, through reducing costs and raising returns to the agents over and above what they would otherwise be? That is something on which we should have an answer now.

12.50 am

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): I welcome the decision affecting the staff at the pensions division at East Kilbride, to which the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Mr. Holland) referred. This is an issue that has attracted much attention during the long period during which the Bill has been before the House. It has been before us since December 1985, and one would imagine that it has been the subject of the most intensive and lengthy Committee consideration. Those who have followed it closely will know, however, that its consideration has been brief and widely spaced.

As I understand the Government's intentions, the Bill is a holding operation. Its function is to enable the work of the Crown Agents to continue and some of their difficulties to be met in a period during which the Government intend to proceed to make the Crown Agents a privatised concern. This was hinted at by the hon. Member for Vauxhall, when he said that the Government might have changed their mind. As I understand it, it is still the Government's intention to proceed to privatisation. The Bill will simply hold the fort until then. The stage will be reached when its provisions are no longer relevant and the Crown Agents will become a privatised concern, thereby losing a status that is necessary for their relationship with Commonwealth Governments, many of whom are accustomed to working through Government agencies for much development work and who expect an organisation such as the Crown Agents to have Government status.

Confidence in the Crown Agents has inevitably been shaken by the experiences of recent years. I am not satisfied that turning the body into a private corporation will assist the rebuilding of confidence and help to enable it to play as full a part as it can undertake in development work in which the Government are engaged and in the activities of other Commonwealth Governments.

On behalf of the alliance, I welcome the Bill as far as it goes. I welcome the opportunity that it gives the Secretary of State to continue to assist the Crown Agents to enable them to provide the useful function which was impaired for a number of years but which they can still undertake in the work of Commonwealth countries.

12.52 am

The Minister for Overseas Development (Mr. Timothy Raison): The Bill was given a Second Reading and considered in Committee without opposition, although there was a certain amount of discussion. I am happy that Third Reading has been reached. I have been asked one or two questions, to which I shall respond, but I do not think that the House wishes to be detained for very long at this hour.

It is our intention that the Crown Agents should continue to move towards privatisation. We hope to see the organisation strengthened and we believe that it is becoming a stronger body under the excellent leadership that it has received from the chairman and those who are responsible for its management. As I have said, I hope that this will lead to privatisation.

I am grateful for the support that has been given to the Government's decision on the pensions division, which has been widely accepted. I believe that the House was in sympathy with what was done.

I have been asked one or two specific questions. First, the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Mr. Holland) asked about licensed deposit taking. Sections 5 and 8 of the Crown Agents Act 1979 give the Crown Agents authority to accept deposits in respect of their agency activities. While they continue to operate under the Act, the authority will remain valid. When they are privatised and cease to be a statutory body, financial arrangements will have to be made for the privatised company to conform with the requirements of the relevant Acts on the acceptance of deposits or pre-payments. The present situation does not require any further action.

Mr. Stuart Holland: The financial effect of the Bill will make it possible for interest of about £10 million due to the Exchequer to be waived. We know that the Crown Agents have been paying interest at rates that are less than the full market rate. If the Minister is really saying that the Government are proceeding to privatisation, will he give the House an assurance that any such £10 million, which amounts, in effect, to a public subsidy, will be paid back by those to whom the sale in privatisation is undertaken? It will be a public subsidy of the private sector otherwise.

Mr. Raison: I do not think that the House will expect me at this stage to anticipate the legislation that will bring about privatisation in due course. When that step is taken, a Bill will come before the House in the proper way and it will receive full discussion in the House.

Questions were asked about clause 1*(b)*. This provision deletes section 17(10) of the 1979 Act, which, as a consequence of the amendment to section 17(9), becomes superfluous. Section 17(10) requires that any order extending the original initial period from five years to seven years should be laid and approved by resolution of the House. As I have said, that now becomes superfluous.

I believe that the Bill is an important advance and that the Crown Agents are doing a good job. The Bill gives them a further chance to do that, and I commend it to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

Dogs (Control)

Motion made, and question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Donald Thompson.]

12.55 am

Miss Janet Fookes (Plymouth, Drake): The House will be aware of my long-standing interest in matters affecting animal welfare, and I rise now to inquire about Government policy on the control of dogs.

The debate has been sparked off by two recent occurrences. The first was the widespread reports that the Government intended to abolish the licence fee for dogs, although I understand that no such decision has yet been made. It was also sparked off by the investigations of the television programme "That's Life" into the scandal of puppy farms.

I would first like to give a brief sketch of the problems relating to dogs and then to give a short summary of the measures that animal welfare groups have taken in the past and also to offer a package of proposals for the Government's urgent consideration.

The scale of the problem of dogs is staggering. It is estimated that there are some 6 million dogs at any one time in Britain and half of those are unlicensed. That is a highly unsatisfactory state of affairs, although it is not surprising in view of the very low licence fee of 37p. I am not surprised that the Public Accounts Committee has commented on the absurdity of that, as it is costing far more—about £3 million more—to collect the licence fee than the revenue obtained.

The problem of stray dogs is especially distressing. I am closely linked with the RSPCA and the National Canine Defence League. I also know a fair amount about the work of Battersea dogs home and the work of local cats and dogs homes in Plymouth. According to the latest annual report, the RSPCA dealt with 103,000 abandoned or stray dogs. However, the RSPCA estimates that that is a measly 20 per cent. of the full number of such unfortunate animals. Half the cruelty cases dealt with by the RSPCA inspectors relate to dogs.

The stories that we hear about abandoned dogs are heart-rending and it is unfair to expect the animal welfare societies to put so much time, effort and money into a problem which the Government ought to tackle. However, apart from the dogs themselves there is the problem caused by dogs that are out of control and which cause a nuisance in society. That problem is especially worrying when it affects livestock. The National Farmers Union has recently suggested that there are about 10,000 cases a year of livestock which are killed or seriously injured by the depredations of dogs out of control—for example, in sheep worrying. There is also the problem of the fouling of pavements, beaches and parks, which understandably causes public outrage.

I am glad that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has embarked on a campaign against litter. I suggest that dog fouling is a particularly offensive form of litter and my right hon. Friend would undoubtedly welcome any enforcement of the law on fouling.

There is also over-production of puppies, often in horrendous conditions. That was the subject of the "That's Life" programme. Miss Rantzen has been kind enough to send me a dossier, which I will pass on to my hon. Friend the Minister, outlining some of the cases which were seen on the programme. I am told that, following the programme on puppy farms, hundreds of letters and telephone calls were received from viewers—some 500 by the time that I received the dossier, but I gather that more were coming in each day.

Today newspaper has also made its own investigations, which would repay further study by the Minister. Many people have bought puppies from puppy farms, only to find that the poor little creatures are very sick and have a miserable and short life. They frequently die, perhaps after the owners have spent a great deal of money on veterinary bills. Many of the problems arise from the non-enforcement of the Breeding of Dogs Act 1973. It ought to be tightened up. On re-reading it, I noticed that local authorities, which are responsible for licensing breeding establishments, may inspect them. I suggest that they should have a duty to inspect them before a licence is granted and that there should be far more follow-up visits than there appear to be.

No longer do we want dogs to be subjected to so much disease and infection and the likelihood of being separated from their mothers far too soon. Anyone who, like me, saw the Esther Rantzen programme will have been horrified by the details that were revealed. They were familiar to me as I work in animal welfare, but I think that, for many members of the public, it was a terrifying insight into the difficult conditions in which some animals are born into the world.

The problem is not new. In 1973, so difficult were the problems relating to dogs that an organisation which rejoices in the name of JACOPIS—the Joint Advisory Committee on Pets in Society—was set up. It produced a comprehensive report in 1975, which was followed by a report by the Department of the Environment in 1976 which bore a remarkable resemblance to the proposals made by JACOPIS. There was an attempt at a private Member's Bill in 1982, and conditions in Northern Ireland were so serious that the Government introduced an order at the end of 1983 which contained many of the principles which were advocated by JACOPIS.

The efforts that have gone into producing a different set of proposals for dealing with dogs have quite a long history. I hope that the Government will not suggest that they need much more time to consult, investigate and the rest—the standard excuse for doing nothing. Forgive me, Mr. Deputy Speaker, if I sound a little cynical, but one gets used to Governments saying that they need more time when they are trying not to make any decision at all.

I should like now to consider the package of proposals which I should like the Government to adopt. The control of stray dogs and the law relating to dogs generally should be placed entirely in the hands of local authorities, and not with the police, who have other and more important tasks than dealing with stray dogs. There should be a mandatory dog warden system in each district. The duties of dog wardens would not be simply the obvious ones such as dealing with strays. They would include advising the public of their duties, being generally helpful and ensuring that the law is enforced, including that concerning the fouling of footways.

To make that possible, there should be a substantial increase in the present ridiculous licence fee. Although the Public Accounts Committee wishes to end the fee entirely, I believe that it should be increased to £5 or £10. The licence would have to be bought on the acquisition of the dog or when the dog reached the age of four months, whichever is the sooner. It is important to stop impulse buying, and if the acquisition of the licence must come at that point, and it costs substantially more than it does now, it might deter people from buying animals without sufficient thought. As one welfare society says, one has a dog not simply for Christmas, but for life.

Furthermore, it would be desirable to reduce the licence fee for any animal that was spayed or neutered to discourage the overproduction of animals and thus reduce the stray dog population. The Government might wish to consider exemptions for working dogs or for needy retirement pensioners. That would be possible under the scheme that I suggest. As a means of enforcement, I suggest that every dog should wear a disc, which would be not only a form of identification but a sign that the licence fee had been paid. It could even be colour-coded so that one could see at a glance whether the licence was current or out of date.

If sufficient funds were available through an increased licence fee, one could ask local authorities to undertake much more inspection of breeding establishments, pet shops, puppy supermarkets and the like, and enforce the conditions which exist theoretically, on paper, but which are too often flouted, as we saw from the "That's Life" programme.

I do not expect my hon. Friend the Minister to give me definitive answers on all those points tonight, much though I would wish it. But I must tell him that the patience of the animal welfare organisations with which I am connected is running out, and my patience is nearly at an end, because we have made constructive proposals for many years but still the Government are stalling. For this purpose, it does not matter whether they are Labour or Conservative Governments. Both have been united in shilly-shallying and failing to take positive decisions.

I hope that the Government will give serious and urgent thought to the points that I have made in this brief debate, remembering the long history of decisions made by the animal welfare organisations about what might be practical and prudent. My request is in no way unreasonable. It is clear that we have a serious problem of too many dogs coming into the world, many of them leading a miserable existence, and the welfare societies almost having to clear up the mess that should be dealt with by the Government.

Britain is still free from the dread threat of rabies, but it must be an ever-present worry to all those concerned with the disease. It would be far easier to cope with rabies if we had fewer animals wandering round unwanted and if there were far greater controls through licensing and enforcement and a proper dog warden service. I hope that, if nothing else, it will make the Government think carefully about the proposals that I have made, which I warmly commend to my hon. Friend and to the House.

1.9 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Sir George Young): I begin by paying tribute to the work that my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Drake (Miss Fookes) has done, both in the House and outside, for animal welfare. She has been a prominent member of the parliamentary animal welfare group and also a past chairman of the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. As she referred to tonight, she is also vice-president of the Joint Advisory Committee on Pets in Society, which brings together many important and influential organisations with an interest in the control and welfare of dogs. Dog owners, dog interests and indeed dogs are fortunate to have such a formidable champion available to them. My hon. Friend has put forward this evening an eminently sensible manifesto, which is no less than I would have expected from her.

I apologise to my hon. Friend for the absence of my hon. Friend the Member for Mitcham and Mordern (Mrs. Rumbold), who takes a particular interest in canine matters within the Department. She has slipped her leash and is in Luxembourg for a European Community Council of Ministers meeting. Indeed, all Ministers in my Department who have any interest in dogs seem to have fled the country. My hon. Friend the Member for Surbiton (Mr. Tracey), the Minister with responsibility for sport, who I assume looks after greyhounds, is in Mexico, where his presence has had the desired stimulus on the English football team, and the Minister for Environment, Countryside and Local Government, my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, West (Mr. Waldegrave), is also in Europe.

I make it clear at the outset that the Government have taken no final decision on the future of dog licensing. My hon. Friend the Member for Drake referred to speculation in the press a few weeks ago that the Government intended to abolish the licence. That is one possible course open to us, but I stress that a final decision has yet to be made and before we do so we shall consider carefully what my hon. Friend has said tonight.

I understand my hon. Friend's feeling of impatience, indeed cynicism, at the length of time that it has taken to reach a decision on the future arrangements for the licence. There is, as my hon. Friend said, a large measure of consensus between a number of the very influential bodies concerned with dogs, their welfare and control. However, as the failure of successive Governments to take any action perhaps shows, it is not that simple.

The path ahead is not free of hazards and the Government are anxious not to tread on them. The issues are indeed complex and span the responsibilities of a number of Departments. Some of the courses involve primary legislation, which might be time-intensive and we are anxious to find the right conclusion before we embark on that process.

The arguments are not about the end to be achieved but about the means to achieve a happier co-existence between dogs and society. It is easy for the arguments to be seen in terms of dog-lovers against dog-haters. In fact, few people, whether or not they are fond of dogs, would deny that owning a dog can bring benefits in terms of companionship, comfort and security, particularly to those living alone and to the elderly. It can add a new and enjoyable dimension to family life and teach children a sense of responsibility to dependants. Dogs have an important role to play in the police, sniffing out drugs and explosives, and they are of benefit to the blind and the deaf.

On the other side, there are those who are concerned about dog nuisance. They are in fact concerned about the irresponsible owner who allows his dog to stray, to bark for long periods, to foul public places or to run uncontrolled intimidating others, or who keeps a large dog in a city in a restricted space and with inadequate exercise.

It is the same irresponsible owner who causes suffering and distress to his dog. The strays that my hon. Friend talked about are frequently not well-cared-for animals. The real villain of the piece is the unthinking, uncaring owner. It has been said with some justification that there are no bad dogs, only bad owners.

What are the options? As my hon. Friend has said, the current licensing arrangements are absurd. The Government bear the Post Office's charge for issuing licences, which in England and Wales amounts to some £3·5 million and substantially exceeds the revenue that local authorities receive of about £0·9 million. On the grounds of financial prudence alone, some change is clearly called for.

We acknowledged that in our consultation paper. The criticism has been made, as my hon. Friend said, by the Public Accounts Committee and the Select Committee on the Environment and we said in our paper, that the present situation does not allow any Government who value good administration to do nothing.

We issued a consultation paper which set out three main options — a simple increase in the licence fee, giving local authorities discretion and the abolition of the licence. The response was not conclusive.

Many organisations and individuals have argued to us, as my hon. Friend has, that an increased licence fee would provide funds for local authorities to devote to dog welfare and control measures. Our postbag leaves us in little doubt of the strong feelings which many people have about the dirt, nuisance and fright which can be caused by dogs which are not properly controlled, and my hon. Friend highlighted concern about the welfare of strays.

On the other side of the argument, there are those who feel that it would be wrong for individual dog owners to bear the financial burden of dog control. They argue that the vast majority of dog owners are responsible, care for their pets properly, and prevent them from being a nuisance to others. It is a minority, who would not in any case purchase a licence at a higher cost than at present, who are irresponsible. Some suggest that the number of strays might even increase, were there a higher licence fee, since more dogs would be abandoned. The value of a dog as a companion or protector carries with it the suggestion that some groups might find the cost of a higher licence fee particularly difficult to find, and my hon. Friend suggested some exemptions.

The message to emerge is that there is real concern about the control and welfare of dogs. What is not so clear is how the Government might best tackle these problems and bring to an end the absurdity. My hon. Friend put forward one strategy tonight. We are aware of the views of the joint advisory committee which she has outlined. My hon. Friend the Member for Mitcham and Morden will shortly have the benefit of meeting a deputation from the advisory committee to hear the views of its constituent organisations at first hand. It would be completely wrong not to take seriously the experience and wisdom of those in the front line of caring for dogs, such as local authorities, vets and the RSPCA, which do such important work in dealing with strays and in many other fields.

However, the thought I wish to leave with my hon. Friend is that a higher licence fee is not the only way in which concern about control of dogs and dog nuisance can be met. The Government would need to reflect carefully before abolishing the licence without taking some positive steps to ensure that local authorities and other agencies can carry out the valuable work they already perform in relation to dogs. The importance attached to this by local authorities is shown by the number almost 200 which already provide a dog warden service for important educational as well as enforcement purposes. I understand that they would welcome the additional revenue that an increased licence fee would provide.

However, there are administrative costs with any licensing system and it can be argued that scarce resources should not be diverted from tackling the problems directly by educating owners in their responsibilities and dealing with the consequences of the irresponsible minority's thoughtlessness. I repeat that no decision on the future of licensing has yet been taken. However, we shall not ignore the concern about dog nuisance when we come to that decision.

My hon. Friend mentioned the fouling of parks, pavements and so on. As I represent an urban constituency, I am aware that this is a genuine issue. It has been estimated that a dog population of 6 million produces 1 million gallons of urine and 1,000 tonnes of faeces daily.

There are already substantial powers available to local authorities for controlling the nuisance and annoyance that dogs can cause. My right hon. Friend, the Home Secretary is the confirming authority for such byelaws. At present a district or borough council can make byelaws which make it an offence for a person to allow his dog to foul footways or designated grass verges. Many authorities have adopted those byelaws.

Byelaws may also be used to ban dogs from enclosed recreation grounds which are in need of special protection, such as children's play areas, sports pitches and ornamental gardens. There are also bans which apply to certain areas of the beach during the summer months. These byelaws are carefully examined before they are approved to ensure that dog owners are not unfairly discriminated against.

A further power which is at the moment under examination is the so-called "poop-scoop" byelaw, which requires owners to clear up after their dogs when they foul public places. A pilot scheme has been running since September last year in four areas including, appropriately, the London borough of Barking, to test the effectiveness of the byelaws. The results are encouraging. Final conclusions cannot be drawn until the end of the trial period in September and then the Home Office will examine the working of the scheme and publish a report. If, as seems likely, the byelaws prove successful, it should be possible to offer these powers to other local authorities.

My hon. Friend mentioned puppy farms and I was distressed to hear her account of the poor conditions in which dogs are apparently being kept and sold by certain establishments covered by the That's Life programme and this week in the newspaper Today. The regulation of breeding and pet-selling establishments is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, and I shall call to his attention the dossier my hon. Friend mentioned in her speech. I understand that so-called puppy farms will be subject to local authority licensing under either the Breeding of Dogs Act 1973 or the Pet Animals Act 1951.

The Breeding of Dogs Act requires that any person keeping more than two bitches for the purpose of breeding for sale should be licensed by the local authority which must satisfy itself that certain standards of health, welfare and accommodation are met. Any person running a business selling animals as pets must also be licensed by the local authority under the Pet Animals Act 1951. Appropriate conditions can be attached to a licence, which may include a condition about the age at which animals may be sold. That is a major concern in the cases to which my hon. Friend has referred.

There are extensive powers of entry and inspection in relation to premises covered by the Acts I have mentioned and I suggest that anyone who has reason to believe that dogs are being reared and kept in bad conditions should take up the matter with his local authority. As a further safeguard, the Protection of Animals Act 1911 makes it an offence to cause unnecessary suffering to any domestic or captive animal. I can well understand the widespread concern that these reports have caused, and will ensure that my hon. Friend's comments are relayed to my colleagues at the Home Office. Our view is that legislation provides suitably flexible controls over the breeding and sale of dogs, but we shall look at the suggestion by my hon. Friend that "may" might be replaced by "shall".

My hon. Friend spoke about strays. Responsibility for strays rests with the police and my hon. Friend suggested that the matter should be transferred to local authorities. The many and varied demands on police manpower and resources today mean that the police are not always able to give this as high a priority as they, and we, would wish. However, this is a matter for each chief officer of police who has operational responsibility in his force area. Voluntary organisations also play an important role in dealing with strays, as my hon. Friend knows. The requirement in the Control of Dogs Order 1930 for a dog on a highway or public place to wear a collar with the address of the owner inscribed on the collar or an attached plate can be a help in tracing owners.

If I am unable to deal with all the matters raised by my hon. Friend, such as livestock worrying and attacks on people, and rabies, I shall write to her. My hon. Friend mentioned Northern Ireland, where there is a £5 licence fee. We have, of course, kept in touch with experience of these arrangements, but it has long been recognised that the situation in the Province, especially in relation to strays and livestock worrying, is more serious than in Great Britain. I do not think it necessarily follows that what is appropriate for Northern Ireland is appropriate elsewhere.

I also appreciate my hon. Friend's interest in the possible role of a licensing system if an outbreak of rabies should occur. I am advised that dog licensing would have little or no relevance to the actions which would have to be applied in the event of a rabies incident here. We have drawn up contingency plans to deal with this. As I say, my understanding is that although it is under review, a licensing system is not of direct application.

My hon. Friend's concern about dog licensing may well have been heightened rather than allayed by what I have said. I can give her the assurance that the Government are fully apprised of the points she has made and of the widespread anxiety that undoubtedly exists about dog control. I hope that it will be possible to announce a decision about dog licensing in the very near future.

Oral Answers to Questions

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

S. and W. Berisford

1. Mr. Livsey asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the takeover bids for S. and W. Berisford and the likely effect on British sugar beet growers.

The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. John Selwyn Gummer): My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry announced on 20 May that he had decided to refer to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission proposed acquisitions of S. and W. Berisford by Hillsdown Holdings and Tate and Lyle in accordance with the recommendation of the Director General of Fair Trading. The commission's investigations will include consideration of the likely effect on British sugar beet growers.

Mr. Livsey: While welcoming the fact that the proposed acquisition has been referred to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission, may I ask whether the Minister agrees that the sugar industry is far too important to be the subject of such a takeover? Would it not be in the best interests of the industry if it rescued itself, and also for a management buy-out to be considered as the best possible solution for sugar beet growers and those who work in the industry?

Mr. Gummer: I do not think that the series of parts in the hon. Gentleman's supplementary hang together. It is necessary that we look at the effect of any purchase in the context of the interests of the country as a whole, and especially those concerned in the sugar industry. That is what we are doing.

Sir William Clark: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the finance margin for refining beet sugar is much higher than the margin for cane sugar, which is very low? Does he further agree that that could possibly activate against the interests of the ACP countries?

Mr. Gummer: I am sure that my hon. Friend is right. The narrowness of the refining margin causes considerable concern, because without a proper refining capacity in this country the ACOP countries would find it impossible to obtain a market for their cane, which would be a disaster. That is why we have been pressing the European Commission to hold a full investigation, and we are pleased that it will now do so.

Mr. Spearing: Is it not true that a Monopolies Commission investigation could reveal that, given proper safeguards for monopolies, this acquisition could provide an opportunity for all the interests of beet producers and refiners as well as cane producers in the Commonwealth and cane workers in this country to be combined to provide a stable, domestically-owned sugar industry that would provide employment and markets for all concerned?

Mr. Gummer: That is no doubt the case that Tate and Lyle will put before the commission. However, there are now two investigations — one by the Monopolies and Mergers Commission and the other by the European Commission, which is looking into the margin.

Mr. Andy Stewart: Will my right hon. Friend reassure my constituents and others who grow sugar beet that if Ferruzzi, the Italian company, makes a further bid he will support his colleagues by referring that to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission also?

Mr. Gummer: The Office of Fair Trading is currently considering whether Ferruzzi's holding in Berisford constitutes a material influence resulting in a merger that would qualify, at the moment, for a reference to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission under the Fair Trading Act 1973.

Mr. Torney: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that takeovers usually mean unemployment for workers in the company taken over? Will he therefore consider making representations to try to ensure that workers do not lose jobs, especially in view of the tremendous workless total in this country?

Mr. Gummer: In the first place, I do not think that is truthful. One must look for security of employment in an industry, and that security is sometimes advanced by takeovers and sometimes not. The hon. Gentleman must not let his political dogma get in the way of the facts. We must adopt the best possible solution across the board, and that is why we have established an impartial investigation. The hon. Gentleman wants to prejudge the impartial investigation, which is a typical Socialist attitude.

Set-aside Schemes

2. Mr. Baldry asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what consideration Her Majesty's Government are giving to agricultural set-aside schemes.

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Michael Jopling): In the cereals sector, the Government are actively considering ideas for a Communitywide voluntary set-aside scheme. The Government are also studying the Commission's proposals for set-aside in its socio-structural package.

Mr. Baldry: Does my right hon. Friend agree that at a time when we are seeking to tackle surpluses, the advantage of set-aside schemes is that they enable us much more accurately to determine which land shall be taken out of production, and thus ensure a fairly comprehensive countryside policy in any one area? When does my right hon. Friend expect that his Ministry will be coming to conclusions on both his and the Community's schemes, which are under discussion?

Mr. Jopling: I believe that my hon. Friend is right in his analysis. We are working on the criteria that the scheme should be voluntary, Communitywide and cost effective, and should provide an alternative for those producers who are least able to cope with a restrictive price policy. We are anxious to start discussions as soon as possible.

Mr. John: Would not a set-aside policy be more easily achieved if we had a parallel farm woodlands policy? Does the Minister agree, on the question of surplus cereal production, that it is estimated that about 14 to 15 per cent. of cereal land in Britain will have to be taken out of production?

Mr. Jopling: I would not accept those figures, because much depends on the degree to which the Community is successful in bringing the production of food closer to the level of consumption. We must consider, in respect of the scheme, the overall problem of land use, including the potential of a greater incidence of the growing of trees.

Mr. Hunter: Will my right hon. Friend take this opportunity again to clarify his position on the control of cereal surpluses? Does he still believe that price control is the best and only practical way to control production, or is he seriously considering alternative and additional methods?

Mr. Jopling: I know that my hon. Friend has heard me say on a number of occasions how I believe we should deal with the current surplus in cereals. I remind him of the Commission's estimate that if we do nothing we could find ourselves with 80 million tonnes of surplus grain in the Community by 1991. My view is that a package of measures is necessary. It would not be practical politics to deal with the matter with one device alone, such as price control. We must use the devices of price, set-aside and intervention standards. I have been saying this in the House for about six or nine months. I believe that price must be at the forefront of the package.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: Will my right hon. Friend bear in mind that while set-aside has its definite advantages, we do not want that to prolong the excessive use of fertilisers, which run off into rivers and into the public water supply from the land that is not set aside? In other words, we want to achieve a situation in which we do not get maximum production from the acreage that is not set aside.

Mr. Jopling: My hon. Friend did not use the word nitrates, but I suspect that he had it in mind. We are conscious of the dangers of the excessive use of nitrogen in encouraging plant growth. For that reason we are carrying out a careful study of the problem. I hope that we will be able to see the conclusions of that before very long. We should be careful about introducing steps to prevent the use of methods of producing high yields which hold back farmers within the Community, whereas their competitors in the rest of the world are free to use every device which leads to greater efficiency. That would be a dangerous step.

EC Budget (Price Agreement)

3. Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is his latest estimate of the likely effect of the European Community agriculture price agreement on the European Economic Community budget.

Mr. Jopling: The Commission has estimated that the agriculture price agreement for 1986-87 will reduce Community expenditure by 320 million ecu in 1986 and by 457 million ecu in 1987. At the same time, the Council agreed to cuts in the Community financing of intervention which will save an additional 300 million ecu a year.

Mr. Howells: I am grateful to the Minister for his reply. Does he agree that now is the opportune time to reform the way in which we market our surpluses within Europe, instead of selling beef to the Russians at a giveaway price? What plans has his Department put forward to the Commission to try to improve the situation?

Mr. Jopling: Over the years we have tried — this was probably true of the previous Government also — to argue in favour of policies which prevented these huge, unmarketable, unwanted and uneatable surpluses from being built up. That seems to be the right policy. As the hon. Gentleman knows, we have been extremely unhappy about the special sales, which are directed, for instance with butter and other products, at countries such as the Soviet Union.

Mr. Marlow: Is there not a simple way of solving the Community's financial problems? Is the Community not like any other organisation or person? Should it not say to itself at the beginning of each year that there is only a certain amount of money to spend on agriculture? If, perchance and sadly, it should go above that level of expenditure, could it not pass the hat round to those countries that spend the most money? If it needed surplus cash, could it not take it pro rata on the basis of where the money was spent? Would that not be a fair and sensible solution?

Mr. Jopling: If it came to what was a fair and sensible solution, my hon. Friend would probably scrap the whole Community. Of course, that is not the policy of the majority of hon. Members or of the Government. We have a financial guideline, as my hon. Friend knows perfectly well. In this year's price-fixing the financial guideline has been a major influence on the successful outcome of that price fixing process.

Mr. John: Does the Minister agree that the CAP budget for this year will be £800 million more than last year, despite what the Minister said is being saved? Even that is not a full statement of the problem. Ministers have sought to hide expenditure of between £300 million and £900 million this year and bury it in next year's accounts.

We are talking therefore about between £1,000 million and £1,700 million more expenditure. The Agriculture Ministers are doing that to try to hide the poverty of their approach to the real problems of the CAP.

Mr. Jopling: The hon. Gentleman will recall that price fixing this year did respect the financial guideline. As he was shown, exceptional circumstances, in the view of the Commission, have led to a supplementary budget to be produced above the guideline, on the ground of the fall in the level of the United States dollar and the consequent increase in the amount of money which the Community needs to complete the programme.

Horses and Ponies (Slaughtering Policy)

4. Mr. Greenway asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on his policy towards the slaughter of horses and ponies for the purpose of carcase exports.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mrs. Peggy Fenner): We consider that the welfare of horses and ponies should be protected at the point of slaughter in all circumstances.

Mr. Greenway: Does my hon. Friend agree that the existence of only five EEC-approved slaughterhouses for horses and ponies is not sufficient, and that the conditions at the lairages at them are, in many cases, disgraceful? In one case they amounted to only a muddy field where horses and ponies were kept for many days before being slaughtered. Will she look into the fact that horses and ponies are being forced to travel long distances, over many days, in unsatisfactory conditions, without food, water or exercise before slaughter? Will she look into the fact that RSPCA Inspector Rankin was forced out of the Southall horse market the other day when he said that horses being sold there were too thin for riding?

Mrs. Fenner: On my hon. Friend's latter point, another RSPCA inspector attended the market on 4 June. I would not wish my hon. Friend to think that there was not an RSPCA inspector there. I take his point about fewer abattoirs meaning, obviously, a longer journey for horses. Horses in transit are protected by transit legislation. I have often reiterated to my hon. Friend that local authorities are empowered to enforce controls. Evidence of offences should be reported to local authorities. The Farm Animal Welfare Council is reviewing the welfare of all livestock in transit, including horses and ponies. Following the FAWC's report on the welfare of redmeat animals, including horses, at the time of slaughter, the Government have proposed a number of changes to legislation to provide further protection for all animals for slaughter.

Mr. Bermingham: Does the hon. Lady agree that the problem is that there is an inadequate number of inspectors, that local authorities seem reluctant to prosecute and that legislation is not sufficiently penal? A decent method of slaughter of horses — many of us would object to their slaughter in any event — can be secured only through proper inspection, proper enforcement and proper punishment for offences when the law is so openly flouted.

Mrs. Fenner: Local authorities have not made the point that they are not able to enforce the law as it stands. As I pointed out, offences have to be drawn quickly to their attention. I understand that a local authority is promoting a Bill to give additional powers to deal with stray horses.

Mr. Dickens: Is my hon. Friend aware that the French actually eat our horses and ponies as steaks? Has she considered that if we stopped eating their frogs and snails, they might consider not eating our horses and ponies?

Mrs. Fenner: I note my hon. Friend's objection to horsemeat as a diet. I think that, by and large, that view is shared by a large number of people in this country, but I would not like to speak on behalf of those who eat grenouilles and escargots.

Mr. Randall: Is the hon. Lady satisfied that the problems found by the FAWC within slaughterhouses have been properly and satisfactorily dealt with? Is she satisfied that slaughtering methods and procedures used for horses are no less humane than those used for cattle, pigs and other animals?

Mrs. Fenner: We have received the FAWC's report and have proposed a number of changes to legislation, which are now up for consultation it will take a while because legislation is required to provide further protection for all animals. The FAWC considered in particular horses and ponies at slaughter as well as all other redmeat animals.

Food Surpluses

5. Mr. Proctor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he is satisfied with current measures to reduce European Economic Community food surpluses.

Mr. Gummer: In 1984 the Council agreed milk quotas; in 1985 important reforms of the wine regime were adopted; the price-fixing agreement this year included further steps in tackling the milk and cereals surpluses; and the Council is committeed to taking decisions on beef support later this year. We intend to keep up this steady programme of reform. There is a great deal more to be done.

Mr. Proctor: Has my right hon. Friend seen early-day motion 918 in the names of my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) and other hon. Members concerning a new EEC subsidy for feeding butter to cows? What is my right hon. Friend's attitude to that? Will he confirm that £75 million a week is spent by the Community on disposing of surpluses?

Mr. Gummer: I have watched carefully the considerable efforts that my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) puts into ensuring that we never miss some of the sillier things that happen in the European Community. Our purpose is to reduce the supply of goods so that they are more nearly in line with needs. We shall continue to press for that.

Mr. Deakins: As substantial price reductions are really the only effective alternative to quotas, which the Minister does not like, why are he and his Department so complacent about the impact of recent currency changes in the EEC which have meant that this year a number of farmers in countries in the Community will receive increases in their cereal prices?

Mr. Gummer: I do not think that the Department is in any way complacent. We have said that the effects of the package this time have meant a considerable cut in the price that will be received for cereals. It is not the method we would have used or for which we shall continue to press. However, we are honourable and honest enough to say that a great deal has been achieved.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: Does my right hon. Friend agree that any system we introduce to confront the problem of surpluses must be simple and practical, and that in order to achieve that it is best to consult those who are involved in agriculture? In that respect, will he consider producing a Green Paper on the various methods by which we could reduce surpluses?

Mr. Gummer: I am not sure that in those circumstances a Green Paper would be the right way to go about it. However, I agree with my hon. Friend that there is no way in which we can reduce the surpluses unless we do so with the support and help of the agriculture community. Sometimes I wonder whether the Opposition realise that people in the agriculture community need proper incomes as much as do those elsewhere.

Mr. Home Robertson: Will the Minister accept that his policies have caused the maximum disruption in the industry that he has just been talking about, while having the minimum effect on surpluses? As the Minister is the proud custodian of all these vast stocks of cereals, beef, dairy produce and so on, will he try, by looking after them properly, to ensure that someone gets the benefit of these stocks in due course? How about starting by ensuring that good quality cereals in intervention stores are kept separate from the uneatable stuff about which his right hon. Friend the Minister was talking?

Mr. Gummer: The answer to the hon. Gentleman's first question is no. The answer to his second question is that it is our purpose to keep the stocks in the form which makes them most saleable.

Mr. John Carlisle: Will my right hon. Friend accept that the delay and confusion over the announcement of the method of collecting the co-responsibility levy on cereals is causing great concern in agriculture? Will he also accept that the draft recommendations from Brussels are totally unworkable and very much favour the farm feed process, against the country compounder? The trade is anxious that the settlement should be made well before the harvest, so that it knows where it is.

Mr. Gummer: I am sure that my hon. Friend is right in saying that a delay in the decision is extremely difficult for the trade. As the rest of his question goes on to suggest, it is also important that we get the management arrangement correct. Our problem is that we are pushing for the most sensible and simple method which we can have in a co-responsibility levy, which is not the system we would have chosen. Therefore, I think my hon. Friend will agree that it is our job to ensure in that management committee decision that it is, ultimately, the best system for Britain.

Mr. Meadowcroft: The Minister will be aware of the concern about food contamination following the Chernobyl disaster. Can he tell us——

Mr. Speaker: Order. There is a later question on that.

Mr. Meadowcroft: I wanted to ask about the effects that Chernobyl is expected to have on EEC food surpluses.

Mr. Gummer: I think that the hon. Gentleman is getting his question in early in case we do not reach it. We are not currently in a position to assess the effect of the Chernobyl disaster on European surpluses.

Food and Wine Surpluses

7. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the total sum spent by the European Economic Community on the storage and disposal of food and wine surpluses in the most recent 12-month period for which figures are available, expressed in pounds sterling; and what was the comparable total five years previously.

Mr. Gummer: Expenditure by the European Community in 1985 on the storage and disposal of products in structural surplus, that is cereals, sugar, milk products, beef and wine, was about £7·3 billion. The comparable figure for 1980 was about £4·7 billion, or, if inflation is taken into account, £6·8 billion.

Mr. Taylor: Is it not a criminal waste of public funds that £150 million is now being spent by the Common Market every week on dumping, disposing of or destroying food surpluses? Is that expenditure not a shameful insult to every health authority and school authority, and to the old-age pensioners and unemployed of Britain, who could use the money much better?

Mr. Gummer: It is certainly not a sensible way to spend money. It is the Government's purpose to ensure that surpluses are pulled down while farm incomes are at least protected and that we are able to have what ought to be the triumph of agriculture, which is that we are able to feed our people, not turned into the sadness of agriculture because there is too much.

Mr. John: When the Minister's right hon. Friend says that Mr. Adriesson has estimated that in five years' time cereal surpluses will rise to 80 million tonnes, which is a fivefold increase on their present size, does he not think that this time the Agriculture Council should do other than mull over generalities and get down to solving the problem?

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman must accept that that is what would happen if we did nothing, and that the Agriculture Council has already done a great deal, but nothing like enough. I am, therefore, pleased to note his support for the measures that we are trying to take and trying to get the Council to take to ensure that we achieve solutions. The fact is that the CAP, like the previous system in this country, was based on the principle that the major problem was a shortage of food. Contrary to everything that the experts say, we now have a world in which we have too much food. Changing the system is not the easiest thing in the world.

Mr. Harris: May I press my right hon. Friend a little further on cereal surpluses? Does he agree that the only test of a successful policy is whether a small amount goes into intervention? Will he confirm that the prospects for the coming year are that a larger amount will go into intervention?

Mr. Gummer: I would not wish to make any prognostication about how much will go into intervention. The fact is that China, India and other countries which used to need our food surpluses are now exporting food.

In those circumstances, it is a scandal that we have more and more intervention stores and grain, and we must change that.

Common Agricultural Policy

8. Mr. Thurnham asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent representations he has received about reform of the common agricultural policy.

Mr. Jopling: My hon. Friend will not be surprised to know that I receive many representations from individuals and organisations about the common agricultural policy.

Mr. Thurnham: Is my right hon. Friend aware that what Bob Geldof raised last year

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Sir Robert Geldof

Mr. Thurnham: the EEC wastes each week in dumping and destroying food? Why cannot British pensioners have British butter at 15p a pound, instead of it being given to the Russians? Now that the Russians have poisoned their meat produce with radiation, should they not pay a proper price for our meat?

Mr. Jopling: The latest Commission proposal, which we have only just received, suggests, disappointingly on the Commission's figures, that the revised scheme for butter disposal would deal with only about 30,000 tonnes of butter in the Community as a whole. We have not yet had proper discussions of the proposal in Brussels, and we need to have a number of points clarified before we can take a final view on how to react.

Mr. Kirkwood: Will the Government take careful account of the importance of less-favoured area status within the CAP in terms of any future reform? Will they look carefully at the extensive extension granted recently in West Germany and consider similar proposals for extentions in other areas, such as Scotland?

Mr. Jopling: The hon. Gentleman will recall that only about a year ago we were able to achieve the great success of enlarging the less-favoured areas in the United Kingdom, which brought about 28,000 additional farms into less-favoured area status. That has been most warmly received by the industry. Regarding the recently agreed German extension, the hon. Gentleman will recall that it was carried out under the guidelines laid down by the Commission and the Council. We are considering the possibility of further adjustments to our areas with this status and we are at present working towards that possibility.

Sir John Farr: Does my right hon. Friend agree that in any reform of the CAP we should aim for a modest surplus to be produced at home by British farmers, and that the best way of controlling that surplus is by pressing on wih the set-aside programme, which will provide farmers with a working income at less than the present great cost of storing the surpluses produced?

Mr. Jopling: I am extremely grateful to my hon. Friend for his warm support of our ideas on the set-aside programme. They are gaining support. I am particularly interested to hear that the German Government are proposing a pilot scheme along these lines in Lower Saxony. My hon. Friend is absolutely right in saying that we should aim at a modest surplus, so that the chances of food shortages are reduced to a negligible level.

Mr. John: As the right hon. Gentleman is basking in the support of the hon. Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr) for the set-aside programme, may we have some details rather than general statements about how and in what form the set-aside programme will work? At column 245 of the report of our previous Agriculture Questions on 8 May the Minister appeared to say that the cause of surpluses was bad management and that no change in the principles of the CAP was necessary. Is that still his view? If so, is that how he will approach his presidency of the Council of Agriculture Ministers?

Mr. Jopling: Yes, most certainly. I have taken the view, as have Labour Ministers before me, that the principles of the common agricultural policy, in endeavouring to ensure that there are adequate supplies of food at reasonable prices for the housewife while providing a fair return for the farmer, are good principles to start with. The tragic mistake was the way in which the Council of Agriculture Ministers, over the years, but especially during the early 1980s, despite British protestations, has reached for the cheque book whenever there have been difficulties. It has allowed massive price increases, which could lead only to huge food surpluses and the ultimate bankruptcy of the Community. The inadequacies of management, which ignored British advice, have led us into the present mess.

Agricultural Land Use

9. Mr. Phillip Oppenheim asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether the Department is considering the publication of a White Paper on the future of agricultural land use.

Mr. Jopling: No, but my Department has commissioned, or is involved in, a number of studies into future agricultural land use. I expect that the results of these studies will be made widely available to enable informed discussions to take place on this important issue.

Mr. Oppenheim: Is my right hon. Friend aware that one of the greatest problems facing agriculture is the sense of uncertainty and the lack of direction? The publication of a Government White Paper would at least have the effect of pointing farmers in the right direction and at the same time might have the effect of scotching some of the more ridiculous alternative land use schemes, such as Government subsidies for growing trees, which are phenomally expensive?

Mr. Jopling: My hon. Friend will recall that for many years there have been Government subsidies to encourage people to grow trees. I am sorry to hear that he believes that is a mistake. I perfectly understand and agree with him about the vital future importance of land use. However, I remain to be convinced that the correct way to proceed is to produce a White Paper. Let me give him one example. In the last six months of this year we shall be discussing a new beef regime. Neither I nor anyone in the Community or the House has any idea of the outcome of the discussion. It would be very difficult to produce a White Paper with that imponderable taken into account.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Should not a White Paper be announced to disclose the Government's intention to carry out a study into the effects of acid rainfall on agricultural land use? As last year, 150,000 people died of cancer, and as we know that coal-fired power stations are emitting carcinogenic material by the tonne every day of the week, do not the Government have a duty to discover whether any of that carcinogenic material is making its way into the food chain? Should not the Government, especially the Minister's Department, address that issue?

Mr. Jopling: The hon. Gentleman knows that we regularly monitor food health and safety. Food is becoming safer as time goes by. That is certainly the case with regard to radioactive material. The hon. Gentleman has drawn our attention to this difficult area. He requests a White Paper on acid rain, another on cancer and another on emissions from power stations. There is no end to it.

Mr. Coombs: Despite the obvious attractions of a White Paper and the consultation process, will my right hon. Friend take an early opportunity to tell the British people that there is no question of large numbers of golf courses being sought as the solution to this problem? Will he assure the House that, if we are to have trees, they will be British trees such as the oak, the ash and the beach and not the anonymous conifers of Scandinavia and North America?

Mr. Jopling: My hon. Friend will recall that we recently announced a broad-leaved policy for woodlands, which was most warmly received. My hon. Friend should address his question about golf courses to my hon. Friend the Minister with responsibility for sport.

Mr. Home Robertson: How can there be the informed discussion to which the Minister referred against the background of cuts which the Government have made in the Soil Survey for England and Wales and the Macaulay Institute, which does the same work in Scotland? For how much longer will the Minister shirk his responsibility for giving the industry the guidance that it needs to readjust the pattern of production and supply? If he is thinking about some form of set-aside scheme, will he give the House some answers and stop trying to duck questions, as he did in answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Pontypridd (Mr. John)?

Mr. Jopling: There is no question of ducking questions. I have explained clearly our views on set-aside. I have explained them in the Community, and they are becoming more recognised. I do not understand what all this has to do with the Soil Survey.

Mr. Home Robertson: That says it all.

Set-aside Schemes

10. Mr. Latham asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent discussions he has held with the president of the National Farmers Union regarding a set-aside scheme for dealing with agricultural surpluses.

Mr. Jopling: I and my officials hold frequent discussions with representatives of the NFU on all aspects of the support system for cereals.

Mr. Latham: Rather than just going back 200 years to "Turnip" Townsend and fallow fields in a four-course rotation, will my right hon. Friend look carefully at the NFU's brand new document on tree production? Does it not contain a good deal of common sense?

Mr. Jopling: Yes. I believe that, for some time now, the NFU has recognised the importance of increasing woodland on farms. I very much look forward to studying its document more carefully. The fallowing of land is an ancient and honourable way of land management.

Surplus Food Stocks

11. Mr. Canavan asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the total amount and value of surplus food stocks (a) in the United Kingdom and (b) in the entire European Economic Community.

Mr. Gummer: A note setting out the volume of intervention stocks in the United Kingdom and the Community is deposited in the Library of the House and is updated monthly. The value of these intervention stocks, which include some non-food stocks, is estimated to be £1,371 million in the United Kingdom and £6,197 million in the Community as a whole.

Mr. Canavan: For how much longer will the Government tolerate the absolute obscenity of millions of tonnes of food rotting away in the Common Market while millions of people in the Third world face the risk of death by starvation? As the Government have given some belated recognition to Bob Geldof

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Sir Bob Geldof.

Mr. Canavan: is it not time that they gave more recognition to what the man had to say about releasing some of the surplus food to help hungry people in Africa?

Mr. Gummer: I wish that the hon. Gentleman, whose views on the need to help hungry people I share, would just read what Oxfam and other organisations say. They say that it is not surplus food but financial aid that is needed, otherwise indigenous agriculture will be driven out and there will be no possibility of building an agricultural future for those countries. The hon. Gentleman must not allow his opposition to the Common Market to do down the underdeveloped countries.

Food and Drink Industries (Treaty of Rome)

13. Mrs. McCurley asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what estimate his Department has made of the effect of the new article 100A of the Treaty of Rome on the interests of the food and drink industries.

Mrs. Fenner: This article, which will apply after ratification of the single European Act by all member states, contains new provisions for adoption of Community measures in the internal market. In particular, the Council will act by qualified majority rather than by unanimity. I cannot predict what effect this change will have on the nature or number of the measures adopted.

Mrs. McCurley: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that reply. Will she continue to ensure that there are no unnecessary restrictions on the export of foodstuffs to the EEC while we are considering our internal legislative policies?

Mrs. Fenner: I can assure my hon. Friend that we shall continue to play a full part in the negotiations for harmonisation of food standards and ensure that the interests of our food industry are taken into account in working towards a harmonised market.

Freezer Vessel Licences

15. Mr. Randall asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he intends to publish the outcome of his Department's study into freezer vessel licences for pelagic fishing.

Mr. Gummer: I hope that it will be possible to make an anouncement in the near future.

Mr. Randall: Is the Minister aware that the inordinate delay in publishing the findings of his review has seriously impeded investment in, and the restructuring of, the British fleet? Will he tell the House whether he agrees, in principle, that the use of freezers in pelagic fishing could result in considerable improvements in efficiency and cost-effectiveness? Does he agree that the early construction of new freezer vessels could provide much needed orders for our very hard-pressed shipbuilding industry?

Mr. Gummer: I think it is very important that the British fishing industry should make the most of the opportunities that it has under the common fisheries policy and which are much to its advantage. That is why I want to get the right answer, and that is why we are seeking an answer. I hope that I can give the hon. Gentleman a reply soon.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Pavitt asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 12 June.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Pavitt: Is the Prime Minister totally unaware of the deep anger among nurses over the fact that, for the second year running, she has overturned the review body award and short-changed them by giving them only nine months' instead of 12 months' pay? Is she also aware that the injustice of giving the managers back pay until February has infuriated doctors and nurses alike? Ward sisters have now got £800 less than the review body decided they should have. When the Prime Minister replies to the Royal College of Nursing's letter of 28 May, will she take into account the grave shortages in acute nursing facilities and the low morale? Will she take the decision back to the Cabinet and not give the House a lot of statistics about national numbers, past comparisons and the inflation rate?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman is aware that nurses have had a far better deal under this Government than ever they had under the Labour Government. A ward sister to whom the hon. Gentleman refers is now, on the top of her scale, receiving £2,000 a year more than she would have done had the 1979 rate, which appertained when his Government were in power, merely been increased by inflation. Our record on that is excellent.

With regard to the pay of National Health Service general managers, the new rates of pay which operated from 1 February related to the 1985-86 pay year for general managers. The hon. Gentleman is aware that many general managers had jobs with tenure and they have had to give up that tenure to take the management jobs.

Sir Paul Bryan: Reverting to my right hon. Friend's answer of last Tuesday on the question whether Rolls-Royce required Government support, is she aware that last week Cathay Pacific Airways ordered two Boeing 747 400s, with an option on seven more?

Cathay Pacific, when deciding upon the engines for that plane, having considered Pratt and Whitney, GEC and all the rest, finally came down in favour of the new Rolls-Royce RB211 524 D4D. Is it not a promising start for the engine to have a company of this standing as its launch company, and should it not bring orders for many years to come?

The Prime Minister: I am delighted to hear of the order won by Rolls-Royce, on the merits of this engine. It is very good news indeed and it highlights the company's export record. Rolls-Royce is used to exporting. Last year Rolls-Royce engine sales to the United States were worth £435 million.

Mr. Shore: The Prime Minister will know that this morning a state of emergency was declared in South Africa. In the light of these latest and grave events, and the sombre report of the Eminent Persons Group, is it not now plain to the Prime Minister that her stance at Nassau last October was totally misjudged? Political progress against apartheid cannot be made without effective and concerted economic pressure against South Africa. Detailed measures need urgent consideration with Commonwealth partners. The House and the Commonwealth are entitled to know from the Prime Minister now whether she accepts the principle of economic sanctions against South Africa.

The Prime Minister: We have just received the group's report and we are studying it carefully. Time is needed for all concerned, including the South African Government, to consider the report. I shall be meeting the two co-chairmen later today. We must not close the door on future negotiations. The group's report recognised that it was not its task to make specific proposals about measures. Therefore, we shall be in touch with our Commonwealth partners, our European partners and our economic summit partners to discuss this report.

Mr. Shore: That is an equivocal, and, for the right hon. Lady, a surprisingly unclear and indefinite response to what was a unanimous report by a group that spent six months, at her personal request, studying events in South Africa.

The Prime Minister: We have just received the report.

Mr. Shore: We have indeed just had the report, but it has been available to almost everybody for the past 48 hours. The Prime Minister has had plenty of time to consider, not so much the detail of what we need to do, but the principle of the matter. Will she now remove her veto on economic sanctions, on which she has previously insisted?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman is complaining because we are to consider the report carefully with our partners before we reach our conclusions. He knows full well that the report says:

"we are not determining the nature or extent of any measures which might be adopted, or their effectiveness".

The report has taken a long time to compile and we are grateful to the group that has undertaken the task. I shall be seeing its members later. I am not aware that the phrase "economic sanctions" appears in the conclusions.

Mr. Shore: I have one final point to put to the Prime Minister, because she is equivocating. The word "sanctions" has been used by the leading members of the Eminent Persons Group. I quote directly from paragraph 352 of its report, which says:

"We are convinced that the South African Government is concerned about the adoption of effective economic measures against it."

If that is not equivalent to sanctions, I do not know what is.

The Prime Minister: I have read out what the report says, which is:

"we are not determining the nature or extent of any measures which might be adopted, or their effectiveness".

The right hon. Gentleman is complaining because we shall take great care in considering the report and in consulting both the Commonwealth and our economic partners. I shall quote what a spokesman of the Labour Government, of which the right hon. Member was a member, said in December 1977, after Soweto was debated in the United Nations. He said:

"We voted against"— economic sanctions against South Africa—

"together with France, West Germany, the USA and some other Western countries, because we do not agree that the far-reaching economic measures which the resolution calls for would produce the changes in South Africa which we would all wish to see."—[Official Report, 16 January 1978; Vol. 942, c. 9.]

Mr. Hunter: My right hon. Friend has made much of the sentiment "the lady's not for turning". May we take it that she will not turn aside from her view that the further isolation of the South African Government and the imposition of sanctions, while they will achieve many things, will not help the creation of a more just and equitable society in South Africa?

The Prime Minister: Of course we want a more just and equitable society in South Africa and we condemn apartheid. We still believe that we must not close the door on future negotiations and that the group's basic approach of promoting dialogue and a suspension of violence remains correct. Of course, we shall consider this distinguished report carefully, and consider it with our European partners, our Commonwealth partners and with the seven industrialised nations. I am sure that my hon. Friends will agree that that is the right way to go about it, before dashing into premature conclusions.

Dr. Owen: Can the Prime Minister promise the House that when President Reagan applies economic sanctions against South Africa she will not turn round and follow suit? When will she lead world opinion instead of being led by the nose? In the light of the state of emergency that was declared today in South Africa, will she tell us now that she will be ready to stop direct intercontinental flights to South Africa?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman is well aware that those flights are conducted under legal contract. There are specific legal obligations in those contracts, which cannot suddenly be abrogated. I note that in an article in The Sunday Times on 24 March 1985 the right hon. Gentleman said:

"Total, or even selective trade sanctions, will not succeed."

Mr. Baldry: Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is time that Northern Ireland said yes to something? The SDLP vetoed the Assembly and the Unionists have vetoed the Anglo-Irish accord. Is it not time that Northern Ireland said yes to something and then tried to seek a solution to its problems? Northern Ireland should not always look to Westminster for a new initiative, because we have rather run out of initiatives and out of patience with the people of Northern Ireland, who sabotage everything that we try to do.

The Prime Minister: I appreciate what my hon. Friend has said. As he knows, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland will make a statement later today. In the meantime, the invitation to the Unionists stands. We invite them to come and discuss how to get devolved government and to discuss the future of the Assembly. It is also open to them to come to discuss the future arrangements about the conduct of Northern Ireland legislation in the House. I hope that one day they will take up that offer.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: Will the Prime Minister invite her security advisers to study with great care the implicit timetable behind the outrages and attempted outrages for which the perpetrators have just been convicted? Will she compare those with the successive stages of negotiation between Her Majesty's Government and the Governments of the United States and the Irish Republic?

The Prime Minister: I shall deal separately with the two parts of the right hon. Gentleman's question. Of course security advisers will learn any lessons that are to be learnt. It is their duty to do so. They go to great lengths to try to protect us and they do a supremely good job. I totally reject the latter half of the right hon. Gentleman's question.

Q2. Mr. Patchett asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 12 June.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some time ago.

Mr. Patchett: Does the Prime Minister accept that the uprating by 10p per week of child benefit is an insult to the many families who depend upon it? Is that not another example of the Government's callous indifference to those that have not?

The Prime Minister: No. Child benefit is at just about the right level. The hon. Gentleman fails to observe that the money for child benefit often has to come from the very families to which it goes. There are of course increased amounts under supplementary benefit. In so far as the hon. Gentleman refers to supplementary child benefit, the increase is low because inflation is low—lower than ever his Government had it.

Q3. Mr. Craigen asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 12 June.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Craigen: When it comes to the crunch, is the Prime Minister prepared to break the Commonwealth rather than back stronger concerted measures to break the pattern of apartheid in South Africa?

The Prime Minister: I have said that we shall be consulting the Commonwealth, I think at the beginning of August, when the seven Heads of Government come to London for that purpose, and I shall be seeing the two co-chairmen of the Eminent Persons Group later this afternoon.

Q4. Mr. Jessel asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 12 June.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Jessel: As it is only the Conservative party which is united, with a strong and clear defence policy for the defence of Britain, is it not a danger to our country that unilateral nuclear disarmament is supported not only by the Labour party but by five out of every six Liberal candidates, over which they are deeply split with the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen)? Is this not a total abuse of the word "alliance", which should now be dropped?

The Prime Minister: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I wholly agree with my hon. Friend that only the Conservative party and the Government have a defence policy which is based on British interests and not on trying to reconcile irreconcilable views.

Q5. Mr. Allen Adams asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 12 June.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Adams: Is the right hon. Lady aware that many parts of Rolls-Royce aero-engines are made in my constituency at Hillington and that there is deep concern about the company's future in Glasgow, particularly its capacity to produce in the west of Scotland? Will she ask her Ministers to seek assurances from the directors of the company that they will keep a presence in Glasgow?

The Prime Minister: I shall, of course, pass on the hon. Gentleman's request, and I am sure he will appreciate that the likelihood of the company maintaining a presence in Scotland is the greater the more orders Rolls-Royce wins. It appears to be being very successful on design and merit.

Business of the House

3.30 pm

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney): May I ask the Leader of the House whether he will state the business for next week?

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Biffen): Yes, Sir. The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 16 JUNE—Opposition Day (15th Allotted Day) (1st Part). Until seven o'clock there will be a debate on an Opposition motion entitled "The crisis in big city hospitals".

Afterwards progress on remaining stages of the European Communities (Amendment) Bill.

TUESDAY 17 JUNE—Opposition Day (16th Allotted Day). There will be a debate on South Africa on an Opposition motion.

Afterwards there will be a debate on EC Document 9360/84 as amended by EC Document 5752/86 relating to EC proposals on the marketing and testing of medicinal products.

WEDNESDAY 18 JUNE—There will be a debate on Foreign affairs on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

THURDSAY 19 JUNE—Motions on Northern Ireland orders and consolidation measures. Details will be given in the Official Report.

FRIDAY 20 JUNE—There will be a debate on the arts on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

MONDAY 23 JUNE—Until seven o'clock, opposition Day (11th Allotted Day) (2nd Part). There will be a debate on a motion in the name of the leader of the Liberal party. the subject for debate to be announced.

Second Reading of the Rate Support Grants Bill.

Debate on Tuesday 17 June:

Relevant documents

(a) 9630/84	Marketing and testing of medicinal products.
(b) 5752/86	Marketing and testing of medicinal products.

Relevant reports of European Legislation Committee

(a) HC 5-viii (1984-85), para 1 and HC 21-xix (1985-86), para 1

(b) HC 21-xix (1985-86), para 1

Northern Ireland orders to be debated on Thursday 19 June:

Northern Ireland Assembly (Dissolution) Order.

Northern Ireland Act 1974 (Interim Period Extension) Order.

Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1978 (Continuance) (No. 2) Order.

Consolidation Measures:

The Company Securities (Insider Dealing) (Northern Ireland) Order.

The Companies (Northern Ireland) Order.

The Business Names (Northern Ireland) Order.

The Companies Consolidation (Consequential Provisions) (Northern Ireland) Order.

Mr. Shore: We are grateful for the full day's debate on foreign affairs on Wednesday, but the Opposition believe that it is essential that the House should have the earliest possible opportunity to debate separately the report of the Eminent Persons Group on the crisis in South Africa and that is why we have given Opposition time next Tuesday. Will the Lord Privy Seal arrange for an early statement on the Eminent Persons Group report so that the debate can be fully focused upon the Government's response and future policy?

Secondly, in view of the exceptional constitutional importance of the European Communities (Amendment) Bill, with its further reductions of the powers of this Parliament and the removal of the unanimity rule as accepted in the Luxembourg compromise from a large part of the Treaty of Rome, will the right hon. Gentleman make it plain that there will be a further day's debate and that there will be no attempt to bulldoze through all its stages on Monday night?

Thirdly, the right hon. Gentleman replied favourably last week to the pressure from my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition for a debate on the crisis in the tin mining industry and the effects of mine closures on communities in Cornwall. Can he now say whether time for that debate will be included in his next business statement?

Fourthly, the right hon. Gentleman will know of the widespread disappointment caused by the findings of the Lord Chancellor's consultation paper on family courts. The report's tone was certainly very negative. When will the House have an opportunity to debate that report?

Finally, on the important question of the restitution of private Members' time following the disgraceful manoeuvres that led to the loss of last Friday's business, can the Leader of the House now make that positive response that he referred to in my exchanges with him last Tuesday?

Mr. Biffen: I shall respond to those questions in reverse order. I am glad to say that, following discussions through the usual channels, I shall arrange for a motion to be tabled providing for private Members' notices of motion to take precedence over Government business until 7 pm one evening, and for a ballot to be held for those notices.

Perhaps the question of the Lord Chancellor's report can be examined through the usual channels.

I confirm that it is our intention that there should be a debate on the tin industry in the near future. However, I cannot give the guarantee sought by the right hon. Gentleman.

We shall have to see what progress we make with the European Communities (Amendment) Bill next week. But I quite understand the importance of the right hon. Gentleman's point.

Finally, I appreciate the co-operation that has been given to ensure that a full day's debate on South Africa can take place early next week. I shall draw the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary to the question about the possibility of a statement.

Sir Anthony Grant (Cambridgeshire, South-West): Is my right hon. Friend aware that the whole House would very much welcome a debate on defence in the not too distant future? Presumably that opportunity will be afforded by the Liberal party on Monday, but should it absent-mindedly forget to provide it, will it be possible to have another debate, or to raise such issues in the foreign affairs debate on Thursday? Does my right hon. Friend realise that there is so much confusion in Cambridgeshire between the Liberals, the SDP and the Labour party that we do not know whether we are a nuclear-free zone. It is very worrying.

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend is perfectly correct to say that during the next few weeks there will be several occasions when defence can be debated in the House, and not least during the debate on the defence White Paper. I believe that on that occasion, nemesis will be awaiting the respective parties of the alliance.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): Is the Leader of the House aware of the very large number of university teachers who have come to the House today because they are concerned about the future of higher education? Will he find an opportunity in Government time to enable the Secretary of State for Education and Science to make a statement on his policies towards that sector of education and give him the chance to offer some new hope to an area that is of great concern to the future of our country?

Mr. Biffen: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has made the most excellent start in disseminating hope and confidence. I shall draw his attention to the fact that the Liberal party believes that a statement from him on the subject of higher education might add to that. We shall have to see how we go.

Mr. Derek Conway (Shrewsbury and Atcham): Will my right hon. Friend give an undertaking that the much exercised usual channels will do their best to bring together the Liberal and Social Democratic parties so that they use their day, on Monday 23 June, to debate defence policies? We could then examine in detail the so-called Commission defence report which was published yesterday, and question those hon. Members involved, if they manage to turn up, on paragraph 55, which urges Parliament to look 10 years ahead to new technology in preparing for defence, while paragraph 67 conveniently ducks the issue of an independent nuclear deterrent for Britain until after the next general election.

Mr. Biffen: The usual channels have proven and enviable powers, but it may be stretching them somewhat to suppose that they can secure what my hon. Friend wants from the two component parties of the alliance. But it would be more revealing if the Liberal party did not choose to debate defence on Monday 23 June than if it did.

Mr. Jack Ashley (Stoke-on-Trent, South): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that from today advertisements are being placed in newspapers up and down the country by disabled ex-service men who believe that they were disabled as a result of negligence while performing non-combatant duties? Those advertisements warn potential recruits to the armed force that they lose the right to sue for damages when they join the forces. They disclose facts and tell the truth, and I take it that the Leader of the House is in favour of disclosing the facts and telling the truth. As this dispute is escalating and we want service men to have those rights, may we have a debate next week?

Mr. Biffen: The right hon. Gentleman's dedication in this matter is well known and acknowledged. I will certainly draw the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence to the point that he makes, but I am afraid that I must disappoint him by saying that I cannot alter the order of business already established for next week.

Mr. Michael Shersby (Uxbridge): Will my right hon. Friend try to find time as soon as possible for a debate on the reform of the rating system based on the Green Paper "Planning for Local Government"?

Mr. Biffen: It is a matter of great significance which I am sure will detain the House at some point, and maybe in the not too far distant future, but, having a great sense of realism at this point of the parliamentary calendar, I must say to my hon. Friend that no provision is made for it next week and I doubt that it will be the week after.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): Has the Leader of the House read the display advertisement concerning the European Single Act on page 3 of The Guardian today? Is he aware that it is subscribed to by many of his hon. Friends, and by Lord Stoddard and Mr. Douglas Jay? In view of the fact that the Foreign Secretary has described some similar statements as constitutional fantasy, will he assure the House that there will be ample time for the House to decide whether the facts in the advertisement measure up to the description of the Foreign Secretary?

Mr. Biffen: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will appreciate that for me there are other newspapers whose page 3 takes priority over that of The Guardian. I of course recognise the importance of the point that he makes, and obviously it will be germane to the debates that we shall be having next week.

Sir Eldon Griffiths (Bury St. Edmunds): Now that the court has reached its conclusion about the Brighton bomber and those others who sought to destroy innocent people across our country, will my right hon. Friend invite the Home Secretary to make a statement to the House about the police operation that led to the successful conviction of these persons, first, so that the House can express its congratulations to the police service on having achieved this victory against terrorism, and, secondly, so that we may consider maturely what further measures and resources may be required to ensure the proper protection of our citizens against terrorism?

May I also ask my right hon. Friend to negotiate with those on the Liberal Benches in respect of next Monday's business so that before 7 o'clock the Liberal sector of the alliance can offer us its policy and after 7 o'clock we may hear the different story from the other part of the alliance?

Mr. Biffen: I associate myself most warmly with the tribute that my hon. Friend has paid to the police concerning their role in the detection of the bombers. I note the point that he makes about the need for an adequate level of resources for this work. I think that I had better leave it there and say to him that I will, of course, refer his request for a statement to my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary.

I must admit that, as we move into the witching season of June and July, it is fascinating to dwell upon the irrelevances that are presented by the Liberal and Social Democratic alliance, particularly as their differences become the more acute and the more inflamed. I am sure that we will all have an entertaining time thinking about what they might have done and then thinking how poor and lacklustre is the performance against what could have been.

Mr. Donald Coleman (Neath): May I remind the Leader of the House again of the Association of University Teachers lobby of the House today? Will he arrange for a debate on the funding of the University of Wales? If that is not possible on the Floor of the House, could it be held in the Welsh Grand Committee?

Mr. Biffen: I take note of what the hon. Gentleman says. I realise only too well that it is a topic of great concern in the Principality, and I will refer his suggestion to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop (Tiverton): Will my right hon. Friend ensure that the report of the Select Committee on Trade and Industry on the collapse of the tin industry, the Government's response to it and the Committee's observations on the Government's response are debated before the decision concerning the application by South Crofty, Pendarves and Wheal Jane is taken and announced rather than after the event? That is very important if Parliament is to perform its proper role.

Mr. Biffen: As my hon. Friend knows, I have indicated that I hope and expect there to be a debate on the tin industry in the fairly near future. I hope that he will excuse me from making a commitment as precise as he would wish.

Mr. Robert Parry (Liverpool, Riverside): Has the Leader of the House seen early-day motion No. 919 concerning the Iran-Iraq war?

[That this House welcomes the observation of 10th June as the International Day of Action to stop the Iran-Iraq war; supports the resolutions carried at the recent Non-Governmental Organisation International Conferece at Geneva to end the war; notes that the war has continued longer than World War II with the loss of more than a half a million people killed, the violation of international laws and the use of chemical weapons; commends the efforts of the United Nations, the non-aligned movement and the Islamic Conference to resolve the conflict; and calls upon Her Majesty's Government to use its influence at the United Nations and within the Council of Ministers to call for an immediate cease fire, the release of all prisoners of war and to emphasise on the occasion of the International Day of the Child the need for the protection of children of both countries, and to make particular use of the World Congress devoted to the International Year of Peace to be held in Copenhagen in October to promote the above-mentioned aims.]

May the House have an early debate on how we can initiate a ceasefire, bearing in mind the appalling loss of life on both sides, especially among children, in that war?

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman could take advantage of Wednesday's debate on foreign affairs, which will provide him with a better opportunity than any other to deploy his arguments.

Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport): If, following the request by the right hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley), there should be a debate on the conditions of service for armed forces personnel, will my right hon. Friend bear in mind that the right hon. Gentleman has been less than fair to the current excellent conditions of service for those in the armed forces, especially as they can be compensated for injury whether or not they have been negligent in any act that caused the damage?

Mr. Ashley: That is not true—it is quite wrong.

Mr. Biffen: I note and appreciate the point made by my hon. Friend. Doubtless it could be considered if we were to have such a debate.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): Is there any prospect of an early debate on electoral law, during which we could consider early-day motion No. 943 headed "Bradford North and Conservative financial support for non-Conservative candidates."?

[That this House notes the touching concern of the Chairman of the Conservative Party for the selection of candidates by members of the Labour Party to fight the next General Election; wonders if such concern will again be translated into financial support for non-Conservative candidates, as with the late Lord St. Oswald, former Vice-Chairman of Mid-Yorkshire Conservative Association, and the Conservative candidate for Yorkshire West, in the first election to the European Parliament, who paid £2,500 of the election expenses of Ben Ford to stand as an independent in the 1983 General Election in Bradford North; and considers that the almost unprecedented unity of hysteria between the Chairman of the Conservative Party and the leader writers of the 11th June editions of The Guardian, Daily Mail, Sun, Daily Telegraph, Daily Express and Today, in opposing Labour's democratic choice of Mr. Pat Wall to fight Bradford North at the next General Election, shows that if that decision worries the establishment that much, it must be good for working people and their families.]

Might we not then have an explanation, from someone sufficiently high in the Tory party, about why the late Lord St. Oswald paid £2,500 of the electoral expenses of an independent to stand against the official Tory candidate?

Mr. Biffen: I feel unbriefed fully to deal with that point. May I suggest that, at least as an initiation into the subject, the hon. Gentleman raises the matter with the Home Office during Question Time?

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): When will the House have a debate on the negative approach of Labour local authorities to unemployment, especially that of Leicester, which seems to take great delight in showing how many people are unemployed while carefully forgetting the number of people who have found work? Should not the House have an opportunity to correct the balance and show that under this Conservative Government many people have found work, and that the position is not quite the lies and untruths that the Labour party would have us believe?

Mr. Biffen: Every Thursday I begin to feel that Leicester is carved on my heart. I cannot offer an early prospect of Government time for such a debate, but my hon. Friend may wish to take the opportunity provided by Adjournment debates. However, I know that by raising the matter with me he ensures that the folk in Leicester truly appreciate that the position is as he so graphically describes it.

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): In spite of the unhappy juxtaposition of this question with that which has just been asked, I shall ignore the idiotic approach to the problems of the people of Leicester, where in parts of my constituency they face 60 per cent. unemployment.

May I ask the right hon. Gentleman, as he no doubt expected me to do, what has been the result of the investigation into the Nazi criminal activities of Dr. Kurt Waldheim and whether we are to have a statement about that before the debate on Wednesday? If the Foreign Office is considering United Kingdom representation at Dr. Waldheim's inauguration, on the same ground as the Prime Minister has sent a disgraceful message of congratulation—that it is normal so to do—perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will bear in mind the very great regret felt on both sides of the House at the presence of United Kingdom representation at the inauguration of Chancellor Hitler in Germany in 1934?

Mr. Biffen: When I behold the sartorial elegance of the hon. and learned Gentleman, I realise that he represents gentrified Leicester and that my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) represents working Leicester. I think that the hon. and learned Gentleman might best hold his attention for the Adjournment debate on Friday in the name of the right hon. Member for Brent, East (Mr. Freeson), which I think will touch on the subjects that he has raised.

Mr. Derek Spencer (Leicester, South): Is my right hon. Friend aware of the misgiving that there is in many quarters, and not only in Leicester, about the political bias that is shown by various officers in local government? The Lewisham council has said only recently that it will employ senior officers only if they are wedded to the Labour party. Is my right hon. Friend aware also that the treasurer of Leicester city council, only a short time before the local authority elections, printed a letter in the Leicester Mercury seeking to explain and justify an 80 per cent. rate increase, and that he has added insult to injury by seeking to justify his original letter? Can my right hon. Friend tell us when we can expect some early legislation to prevent various areas of local government destroying themselves?

Mr. Biffen: I do not know what three Leicesters in a row means in the parliamentary jackpot. I have taken careful note of what my hon. and learned Friend has said. I put it in the context of a request for legislation, and I shall see that it is conveyed to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Crawley): Will my right hon. Friend make time available for the House to debate the excellent report from the Public Accounts Committee on the torpedo programme and the other procurement scandal, apart from Nimrod, that lurks within the Ministry of Defence? At the end of the day it is likely that the Tigerfish torpedo will cost even more money than the Nimrod programme. May we have an early debate on this vital waste of taxpayers' money.

Mr. Biffen: Perfectly properly, my hon. Friend raises a matter of major public concern. He will know that there is a recognised convention for responding to and debating PAC reports. I shall make investigations to ascertain when such a debate can be made available.

Mr. Michael Latham (Rutland and Melton): When Hansard appears tomorrow, will my right hon. Friend read the exchanges that took place during Question Time today on agriculture? Great concern was expressed by Conservative Members about the prospects of agriculture and the need for drastic policy changes in the year ahead. Is it not time that the House debated this issue properly?

Mr. Biffen: I had the privilege of being in my place and hearing my hon. Friend's most formidable question. I recognise that there is much interest in the present state of British agriculture and an interest in what the future may hold. I shall refer my hon. Friend's remarks to my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, with the prospects of possibly having a debate.

Mr. David Sumberg (Bury, South): In the context of a call for a defence debate, may we have a debate on the ridiculous concept of the nuclear-free zone, especially as the Labour-controlled council of Bury has now declared my constituency to be a nuclear-free zone? Does my right hon. Friend accept that such a debate would give us an opportunity to condemn this wasteful and misleading statement in so far as it relates to my constituency?

Mr. Biffen: I am sure that my hon. Friend will be reassured to know that reasonably soon we shall be having a debate on the defence White Paper. I hope that he will then have the opportunity to make the pertinent point that he has put before us.

Mr. Ivor Stanbrook (Orpington): I think that everyone agrees that the present arrangements for considering Northern Ireland business in the House are inadequate. As the Government have now decided to abolish the only public forum for the expression of opinion in Northern Ireland, is there not an obligation on the Government to produce proposals for the more adequate consideration of Northern Ireland business in this place? Surely the Government should not rest upon the rather spurious and misleading invitation to Northern Ireland's political leaders to make approaches themselves. Is it not the Government's responsibility, having put Northern Ireland in this position, to bring forward proposals?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend will appreciate that I cannot anticipate the statement that my right hon. Friend will make shortly. However, I remind him that the Assembly had no legislative role and, therefore, the law-making factors remain unaffected by any changes that might take place in the Assembly.

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): I reinforce the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Orpington (Mr. Stanbrook). Is it not time that the House had an opportunity to debate the internal affairs of our country, as the American Congress has? Perhaps we would then have an opportunity to say to the Americans, "It is not your cheap conscience money we want; it is an extradition treaty."

Mr. Biffen: Discussion of the extradition treaty could be reasonably pursued in the foreign affairs debate on Wednesday. I assure my hon. Friend that the existing structures provide plenty of opportunities for making points about the Province as well as the foreign affairs aspects.

Mr. Michael Forsyth (Stirling): Will my right hon. Friend find time for the House to debate, as a matter of urgency, the activities of the Animal Liberation Front and other so-called animal rights groups which, according to articles in the Daily Express, are involved in creating cells in constituencies to carry out attacks on property and individuals, representing a serious threat to public order?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend has raised a legitimate point. I suggest that, in the first instance, it might be an appropriate subject for an Adjournment debate.

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth): In view of the serious statement made by the Leader of the Opposition when he was in India about removing our immigration controls — the two Acts which we have introduced — and, ever-mindful that the Labour party granted two amnesties for illegal immigrants, much to the distaste of those who had entered the United Kingdom legally, will my right hon. Friend make time for a debate on that subject so that we can ask some awkward questions?

Mr. Biffen: I underline the importance of what my hon. Friend has said. It relates to a topic which is of major concern to the British public. There is no provision for a debate next week. I am sure that my hon. Friend realises the difficulties of providing time at this stage of the year, but I shall bear in mind what he has said.

Mr. David Harris (St. Ives): I underline the pleas made by my hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton (Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop) and by the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) on the tin crisis and the urgent need for a debate. I know that the Leader of the House does not want to be tied down to a precise date, but, when he considers the need for an urgent debate, will he bear in mind the fact that the Government have published their response to the Select Committee's report? More importantly, a shadow hangs over the far west of Cornwall, especially in the area I represent, as a result of the dire news about Geevor.

Mr. Biffen: I appreciate the point that my hon. Friend has made. I appreciate it all the more because, although his constituency is acutely affected by what is happening, he put it temperately. I cannot go beyond what I have already said. I shall look at the matter as sympathetically as I can.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): I am glad that, however reluctantly and truculently, the Government have decided to restore last week's hijacked private Members' day. Does the right hon. Gentleman recollect that last Friday was not only a Labour Back-Bench day but specifically the day of my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell)? [HON. MEMBERS: "No".] It was indeed. He won the ballot to bring a matter before the House last Friday. If there is to be a new ballot, will the Leader of the House recognise that there is, at best, only a one in two chance that it will be a Labour Back Bencher who wins it and a less than one in 500 chance that it will be my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow? Will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that a motion reinstating the lost private Members' business can reinstate the ballot that has already taken place? If that is so — I believe that it is — will the right hon. Gentleman give an assurance that the motion will be so worded? If he will not, may we have an assurance from the Government Chief Whip, who so destructively and maladroitly organised last week's filibuster, that on this occasion he will exercise his Machiavellian powers to ensure that he keeps Conservative Members out of the ballot?

Mr. Biffen: I am disappointed at that somewhat less than generous riposte. Careful thought went into the wording of my response to the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore). I do not think that there will be any advantage in my going beyond what I have already said.

Mr. Cecil Franks (Barrow and Furness): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It may have escaped the attention of the right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams), although I am sure that it did not escape yours, that three motions were tabled for debate last Friday. Apparently, the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) gave his speech, albeit to members of the press in a Committee Room upstairs. May I suggest that the motion standing in the name of the hon. Member who held second place should be reinstated? Perhaps I should declare a personal interest, as that motion stood in my name.

Mr. Speaker: That is not a matter for me. I assure the whole House that the ballot will be conducted fairly.

Mr. Williams: Further to the point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am afraid that the Leader of the House, rather coyly and calculatedly, failed to answer the procedural point that was raised. I suggest, therefore, that it is a point for the Chair to consider. Will you confirm, Sir, that the motion, which is unusual, to restore the lost private Members' day could procedurally and legitimately reinstate the last ballot?

Mr. Speaker: Any motion that is tabled will say what it intends. I am not omniscient. I do not know what the motion will say.

Mr. Williams: But can it?

Mr. Speaker: It could, if it is tabled in that form.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is it not unfair that the Leader of the House should be required to comment on an incorrect hypothesis? Is it not a fact that the hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens) made a totally incorrect assessment of what my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition said in India?

Mr. Speaker: I do not know.

Northern Ireland Assembly

4.2 pm

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Tom King): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a statement about the Northern Ireland Assembly.

Under the Northern Ireland Act 1982 the present Assembly has two functions. The first is to consider and report on how a devolved Northern Ireland Administration should be formed. Secondly, the Act requires the Assembly to monitor and report on the policies and activities of the Northern Ireland Departments.

The task of making proposals on devolution was undoubtedly made much more difficult by the regrettable decision of members of the SDLP not to take their seats. The Assembly has not been able to come forward with agreed proposals and there is no present prospect of that occurring. As for the monitoring of the Northern Ireland Departments, the Assembly suspended this work on 5 December. In spite of clear warnings about the threat that this action would pose to the continuation of the Assembly, the Unionist parties have not been prepared to resume this function. As a result, the Alliance party withdrew from the Assembly since it believed that there was no longer any useful role to be played.

On 13 March the Assembly formally resolved not to carry out its monitoring functions, to wind up the Devolution Report Committee, and merely to meet one afternoon a week for a debate on aspects of the Anglo-Irish agreement.

The position, therefore, is that the present Assembly, charged under the Northern Ireland Act 1982 with two important functions, is now discharging neither. As long ago as last December in this House, I warned that if the Assembly continued the suspension of its scrutiny role for long, questions about its future would inevitably arise; and on 1 May and 19 May I repeated this warning. On 27 May I invited the leaders of the main parties in the Assembly to discuss with me the position of the present Assembly. The leaders of the two main Unionist parties refused even to talk about it. I regret that I have therefore had to reach my decision without hearing their views.

The decision I have now taken is to lay an order today for the Assembly's dissolution under the powers in section 5(1) of the Northern Ireland Act 1982. This order will come before the House for debate under the affirmative procedure. In taking this step I would make the following points. The present Assembly would in any case reach the end of its normal life on 20 October. There would then automatically within six weeks be fresh elections for a new Assembly. The effect of this order is not to abolish the legal basis for an Assembly but simply to dissolve the present Assembly and to leave open the date for a new election for a fresh Assembly.

I wish to emphasise to the House that dissolution of the present Assembly in no way conflicts with our desire for devolved government, nor our commitment to the Anglo-Irish agreement. Devolution remains the Government's preferred option, and I hope that we may see a future Assembly playing a responsible and valuable role in the Province. The sooner that happens, the better.

Meanwhile, the Government remain ready to discuss with all the constitutional parties in Northern Ireland the best way forward. In particular, I would urge the Unionist parties to return to this House to argue their case and to take up the offer of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to discuss with her the four matters proposed: namely, devolution and the possibility of a round table conference; the future of the Assembly; arrangements for handling Northern Ireland business at Westminster; and new means of consultation between the Government and Unionist leaders.

Only if we are prepared to talk together and discuss these matters can we hope fully to play our separate but complementary roles in building a better future for the people of Northern Ireland.

Mr. Peter Archer (Warley, West): Does the right hon. Gentleman appreciate that his statement will hardly burst on the world as a surprise and will occasion neither joy nor regret? The Assembly was

> "A maid whom there were none to praise
> And very few to love".

As there was no one left who both attended and used it for the purpose for which it was established, it is only seemly that it should be laid to rest in peace, and on another occasion we can pay tribute to those who at least tried.

Does the right hon. Gentleman appreciate that missing from his statement is any positive proposal either for the immediate future or for the longer term? As he reminded us, the Assembly, when it functioned, played a role in scrutinising the Northern Ireland policies that came before the House. Has he now grasped that that role must be assumed more effectively by the House? Will he consider how to make greater use of the Northern Ireland Committee? Can he persuade the Government's business managers to treat Northern Ireland business less contemptuously and to arrange debates at less bleak hours?

More importantly, does the right hon. Gentleman understand that the people of Northern Ireland will see his statement as pronouncing the obsequies on yet another institution which they were once told offered hope? Where are they now to turn for that?

Will there not be those who seek to represent the expiry of the Assembly as a consequence of the Anglo-Irish agreement? The people of Northern Ireland will consider it worth the price if the agreement makes a measurable contribution to their livelihoods, environment, community services and civil liberties. If these benefits are seen to arise from discussions and co-operation between North and South, Catholic and Protestant, may not the people themselves denounce the bickerings of their politicians?

When the House debates the matter more fully, will the Secretary of State, if he can, give an account of the positive side of the balance sheet, or, if not, give an indication of how long we must wait? If people cry for bread and they are given a stone, can we be surprised if they turn in despair to the demagogues, the bullies and the witch doctors?

Mr. King: It is true that my statement can hardly come as a surprise, because I gave the clearest warnings that, if the Assembly did not discharge the functions for which it was set up, its continuation would obviously be brought into question. That is precisely what has happened.

It would be unfortunate if it were not recognised that I regard this very much as a lost opportunity because—certainly in respect of the scrutiny role—there is no doubt that the Assembly and its various committees were doing some useful work. I especially regret that the decision was made to discontinue those responsibilities.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman spoke about the way in which Northern Ireland business is handled in the House. The Government have made clear their readiness to sit down and talk. The Government are often accused of not having enough consultation. I hope that we can sit down with all parties in the House, and with those who ought to be here and are not present in the numbers that they should be, to discuss ways in which we might meet those concerns.

I must correct the right hon. and learned Gentleman in one important aspect. I was in no sense pronouncing obsequies on the Assembly. I was making it clear that this Assembly is no longer fulfilling a useful function, but I hope that it will be possible to see a new Assembly which can move forward on a new basis.

Mr. Julian Amery (Brighton, Pavilion): I hope that I shall not embarrass my right hon. Friend by expressing my support for the decision he has just announced. Would he be gracious enough to acknowledge that a number of his right hon. and hon. Friends kept the House up late at night warning that the Assembly would not work? In saying, "We told you so," may I express the hope that he and his colleagues will pay rather more attention to our views on Northern Ireland policy than they have hitherto?

Mr. King: I hope that I can assure my right hon. Friend that I shall contain my embarrassment at that expression of support. I shall, of course, wish to take his views fully into account with the respect that I know he would wish to receive.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that in 1982 the two main Unionist parties, as they were then represented in the House, opposed the legislation establishing this Assembly with all the resources that parliamentary procedure admitted? Will he acknowledge that the judgment of those Conservative Members who supported us in our endeavour to prevent that mistake being made has been validated by the statement he has now found it necessary to make?

Mr. King: I do not agree with the right hon. Gentleman, precisely for the reasons I gave in part of my answer to the right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer). I think that the Assembly proved that it could discharge a useful role. It is important that people in Northern Ireland should feel that they have much more of an immediate say in the administration of the Province. I say that as somebody who, under the present structure, exercises a degree of power and authority which, in a democracy, raises difficult issues. I would much rather see a situation in which there was greater authority and responsibility for those in the Province. It is unfortunate that the actions of some members of the Unionist parties have prevented the Assembly from discharging its proper functions, but I hope that we will see a day when that can be done.

Sir John Biggs-Davison (Epping Forest): Since the abolition of the Northern Ireland Parliament we have had about as many short-lived successive assemblies as in the French revolution. May I ask whether Her Majesty's Government will now declare a moratorium on assemblies and on political initiatives, including the Intergovernmental Conference, and concentrate on the conduct of parliamentary business as befits a Province of the United Kingdom and the good government, administration and local government of Northern Ireland?

Mr. King: My hon. Friend would not necessarily expect me to agree with all that he has said. However, I welcome the fact that he is prepared to express his views and argue for them, and I welcome the opportunity, which I have from time to time, to discuss them with him. I hope that he will join me in urging everybody who is interested in the affairs of the Province to come forward and have the confidence to argue their views as well. That must be the right approach, and I hope that the House will support me on that.

Mr. Ian Gow (Eastbourne): Does my right hon. Friend accept the paradox between his announcement of the suspension, if not the death, of the Assembly, one of the principal tasks of which was to present proposals for devolution for the Province, and the passage in his statement in which he said that the preferred choice of the Government was still devolution? Would he acknowledge that, even if that is the preferred solution of the Government today, he will not exclude from his consideration the fact that we should govern Northern Ireland in the way in which we govern other parts of this kingdom?

Mr. King: That begs many questions which need considerably more discussion. Obviously we would seek to govern Northern Ireland as fairly, equally and impartially as we seek to govern every part of the United Kingdom. However, to suggest that that involves total harmonisation of every structure of government flies in the face of experience and practice of the present situation. What it does emphasise—I say this fairly to my hon. Friend and I pay tribute to him because I know that he disagrees with the policies we have recently pursued and honourably took the course that he did in the matter — is that he is prepared to stand up and argue his views. Above all, at present we need people in Northern Ireland who are prepared to have the courage to argue their case in debate and not to fly from this Chamber. They should be prepared to come here and argue for what they believe is the best way forward. That is what I hope to see, and I know that my hon. Friend will support me on that.

Mr. John Hume (Foyle): I can hardly shed any tears over the Secretary of State's announcement today, which is long overdue. I simply repeat our willingness as a party to accept his invitation to sit down and discuss with the Unionist parties devolution or any other matter pertaining to peace and stability in Northern Ireland. Since Unionists in Northern Ireland seem to fear the future more than anything else, the SDLP would welcome the opportunity to talk to them and explain and set out in detail its strategy and view of the future. We would like to hear from them what in that strategy in any way threatens the people they represent and we would also like to hear, for a change, their view of the future.

Mr. King: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his comments. He will have noted in my statement my regret about the previous attitude of the SDLP. Perhaps part of the reason for the statement today goes back to the failure of his party to take part at that time. Therefore, it is certainly an advance in the sense that there might by an opportunity for all the constitutional parties in Northern Ireland to be prepared to sit down and talk constructively.

To cover a point that perhaps I did not answer in the question of my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow), that is perhaps part of the reason why it is worth making a further attempt to try to achieve devolved government.

Sir Adam Butler (Bosworth): Does my right hon. Friend accept, from my experience as a Minister on the receiving end, that the Assembly did some valuable work in fulfilling its scrutinising role? Does he also agree that perhaps the main lesson from the demise of the Assembly is that if there are those who refuse to participate in the constitutional processes available to them, it serves only to give heart and encouragement to the men of violence? As long as the Unionists continue their boycott on similar lines, they will not only do no good to themselves but will push the peaceful resolution of the Northern Ireland problem further away.

Mr. King: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend, especially with his experience of Northern Ireland, for the tribute he paid to the work done by the Assembly in its scrutinising role. It was a great pity that it chose to discontinue that role. I certainly agree that if a vacuum is left because of people's inability to sit down and discuss the problems frankly and openly and try to find a way forward, traditional to our parliamentary democracy, by argument and debate, it will be a dangerous vacuum into which others may walk.

Mr. Stephen Ross (Isle of Wight): Is the Secretary of State aware that, unlike many Conservative Members who have spoken so far, we share his disappointment at the demise of the Assembly but think that in the circumstances he has taken the right decision? Is he further aware that we share his hope that we will see a new devolved Assembly with all parties of good will serving in it? That is the only way in which the economy of the people of Northern Ireland can be put on better lines. Is not now the time to set up a parliamentary tier between this House and Dublin?

Mr. King: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his opening comments. Some hon. Members seek no initiative, but to preserve the status quo. I find it unsatisfactory to have nothing between the Secretary of State and local authorities, the powers of which are not much in excess of a parish council. [Interruption.] That problem may be tackled in a number of different ways. I make no apology to the House for repeating that what is true, above all, is that we shall not begin to find the best solution unless people are prepared to sit down and talk the problem through. The present position is not a long-term solution. I regret the announcement that I have had to make today, but I hope it may provide the opportunity for discussions to start soon on a better way for the people of Northern Ireland to have more say in the administration of the Province. We are certainly willing to consider ways in which there could be a better interchange with the Republic.

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson (Newbury): Bearing in mind that the chance of the Assembly being revived in the near future is small, is this not the ideal moment to set up the Royal Commission, which should perhaps have been set up in 1980, to consider the structure of local government in Northern Ireland? When considering that, will my right hon. Friend also bear in mind that local government in Northern Ireland has always been unequal when compared with the rest of the United Kingdom, and that that way forward would not be obstructed by the road block created by politicians who refuse to get together?

Mr. King: At present I have no proposals for that particular approach. I would rather see direct discussions taking place. I appreciate that my hon. Friend has once again made a constructive proposal in an attempt to see a way forward in this matter. That must be the right approach. There is a range of different ways. Although I am not instinctively inclined to his suggestion, I recognise that it is a serious proposition.

Mr. Alfred Dubs (Battersea): While I understand the reasons for the Secretary of State's statement this afternoon, may I urge him to resist as forcibly as possible the blandishments of Conservative Members below the Gangway, that a do-nothing policy is best for Northern Ireland? What does he intend to do about the Anglo-Irish parliamentary tier? We have raised that matter on many occasions and time and again the Government have said that it is a matter for the House. The right hon. Gentleman knows, and we know, that it not possible for us to make any progress unless he backs that proposal. I urge him to do so and to give us a date when we can get on with the task of establishing the parliamentary tier, which is part of the agreement and is a desirable feature of the relationships between Britain and both parts of Ireland.

Mr. King: I have never regarded any comment from my hon. Friend the Member for Newbury (Mr. McNair-Wilson) as a blandishment. His serious interest in these matters could never be described as such. I know that the hon. Gentleman does not want me to give this answer, but the parliamentary tier must be a matter for the House to consider. I know that my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House has made that position clear.

Viscount Cranborne (Dorset, South): Does my right hon. Friend accept that the spirit in which the Assembly was introduced to the House was the same spirit in which the Anglo-Irish agreement was introduced? Is there any guarantee that the agreement will not suffer the same fate as the Assembly? Is not a more sensible approach—this has been suggested to my right hon. Friend several times this afternoon — to pursue parliamentary forms of government in Northern Ireland? In that context, will he consider setting up or advising the setting up of a Northern Ireland Grand Committee?

Mr. King: I see no similarity between those two items. These matters can be looked at seriously. We have made clear our willingness to consider the arrangements in the House, but we must also consider the administration of government in the Province. It is a great fallacy to assume that one can simply change the arrangements in this House in isolation, without also considering the arrangements for administration in the Province. At present very little lies between Ministers in the Northern Ireland Office and councils, most of which sadly are not meeting, and which have little more power than parish councils. We must consider the totality of the problem.

Mr. Robert Parry (Liverpool, Riverside): Does the Secretary of State believe that the statement today will help to reduce violence in the Province, bearing in mind that we are now fast approaching the marching season?

Mr. King: It is widely recognised in the Province, and by many responsible politicians, that, sadly, the present Assembly is no longer discharging a useful function and that it is not helpful in present circumstances. Many of those who believe in devolution and the concept of an Assembly think that the state of the present Assembly is a positive blockage to considering the form of a new and effective Assembly and how it could work. I hope that that will be recognised. I see no reason why the absence of the Assembly should lead to an increase in tension, especially as it was about to go into recess for the summer.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): Will my right hon. Friend undertake to issue a White Paper so that the House may be reassured that the aggressive English liberals in both the Northern Ireland Office and the Foreign Office will not attempt a similar expensive, dangerous and destabilising experiment, at any rate within the next decade?

Mr. King: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for the typically unpejorative way in which he puts his question. I do not want to issue a White Paper now, precisely because I want first to hear the views of those most involved. Rather than trying to lay down the matter in tablets of stone at this stage, I should like to talk to people and hear their views. In the absence of any contribution from those who have been elected to represent the people in the Province and in their continuing refusal to express any views whatever on behalf of their constituents, we may have to consider a step such as that suggested by my hon. Friend.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Is not the fallacy of the argument advanced by many Conservative Members today that Northern Ireland is just like any other part of the United Kingdom? Was not the signing of the Anglo-Irish agreement a recognition by the Government that Northern Ireland is indeed different? It is about time that Conservative Members recognised that position. If the Unionists continue their present tactics of obstruction, boycotting the House, and so on, will not many people come to the same sort of conclusion as that illustrated in the question by the hon. Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry) to the Prime Minister today — namely, that many people will get so fed up with Northern Ireland and its problems and with the refusal of politicians to accept any possible agreement that they will shrug off the problem and conclude, on balance, that there is no positive role for Britain to play?

Mr. King: That would be a tragic and defeatist approach to the genuine problems that exist in Northern Ireland and a betrayal of all those who live there, who are part of the United Kingdom and who are entitled to good government. Obviously, all parts of the United Kingdom are not identical. The many areas, while all being part of the United Kingdom, are different. The arrangements in the House for handling Scottish affairs are different and the arrangements in Northern Ireland are different. I make no apology for emphasising that point.

Sir Eldon Griffiths (Bury St. Edmunds): I agree with my right hon. Friend that a properly elected democratic Assembly is an essential part of the local government of the Province, but may I ask for his assurance that it is in the best interests of the Union that until civil peace is restored in Northern Ireland, there can be no devolution of responsibility for the enforcement of the law, the administration of justice and the upholding of internal security?

Mr. King: I should like to make it absolutely clear that we support the point made by my hon. Friend. There could clearly be no question of devolution on those matters unless there was a considerable basis of confidence, perhaps at an earlier stage with experience of devolved administration in other areas more traditionally associated with devolved government.

Mr. Merlyn Rees (Morley and Leeds, South): In the face of a divided Northern Ireland, where 2,500 people have died and more than 30,000 have been injured by the violence and where the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act has been in force for 10 or 12 years, does the Secretary of State accept that to continue to talk about devolution is a pipe dream and, equally, to talk about integration is also a pipe dream? If both sides in Northern Ireland will not sit down and talk with the Secretary of State—I wish that they would—they should be asked to sit down together without hon. Members being present and, if nothing results from that—which is likely—we should completely reassess our policy towards Northern Ireland. Perhaps only that thought will concentrate the minds of people in the Province.

Mr. King: The House respects the right hon. Gentleman's considerable experience on these matters. I listened carefully to his comments. He has had experience along this path and knows the difficulties that exist. It might be fair to say that the concentration of minds to which he referred at the end of his question, has followed in part after the Anglo-Irish agreement. In the coming months it might be possible to see more interest in the idea of sitting down and talking.

It is true that those matters upon which agreement could be reached would be removed, and the Anglo-Irish agreement would cease to operate on those points. There is, therefore, clearly an interest among those parties opposed to the Anglo-Irish agreement to see whether certain matters can be removed from the ambit of the agreement.

Mr. James Prior (Waveney): Is my right hon. Friend aware that for those of us who have a deep and abiding commitment to all the people of Northern Ireland, this afternoon's announcement must come as a disappointment? Is he further aware that others, like myself, do not believe that integration is the answer to the problem? In the United Kingdom's interests there must be devolved government some time in Northern Ireland, if not now. The SDLP more than any other party, which has achieved significant success through the Anglo-Irish agreement, should play its part by helping to bring about an Assembly in Northern Ireland. That would be a great advantage to the unionists, because the more the Assembly could do, the less the Anglo-Irish agreement would have to operate. Does that not afford some way forward? Is it not right that the House should always seek some way forward to resolve a problem which is not new, which will not go away, and which it is our duty to solve?

Mr. King: I am grateful for my right hon. Friend's comments. I share the feeling of sadness at the necessity of having to make the announcement today. I understand that the concept that he launched was well worth pursuing and had shown merit. It was a tragedy that the SDLP did not take part, and that posed difficulties. I know that the hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume) understands why my right hon. Friend the Member for Waveney (Mr. Prior) made the comments that he did. I hope that the idea launched by my right hon. Friend will be carried forward in a new form in future.

Several hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I appreciate the interest of the House in these matters. However, there is pressing business to come. I shall allow questions to continue for another seven minutes, after which we must proceed to the next business. I hope that by then all hon. Members will have been called—if they speak briefly.

Mr. Jerry Hayes (Harlow): Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is regrettable that the House has heard some distasteful crowing about his announcement this afternoon? People should be looking to the future. Perhaps this drastic measure—which will be debated on another day — might concentrate the minds of all parties in Northern Ireland and force them to sit down and negotiate. That is the only way to keep the peace in the Province.

Mr. King: It is clear that we must make progress. The danger is that people talk in slogans — perhaps I am guilty of this also—about devolution or integration, and they do not consider the problem as a whole — the relationship of this House with the Province and the problems of the Province's administration. We must consider the totality of these problems and find a basis on which we can go forward which will command the widest possible acceptance among people in the Province. We know the difficulties. We realise that so far that has been unachievable. The House must try to find the correct approach. I will try to do that.

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): Does my right hon. Friend accept that by raising even now the spectre of devolution at some future date, he is turning his face away from the only lesson that can be learnt from the inevitable demise of the Assembly — that devolution in Northern Ireland will never work? It will never work because neither the minority community nor a United Kingdom Government will accept that the ballot box in Northern Ireland will always, for the foreseeable future, produce a Unionist majority. Faced with those inevitable facts, can he say whether there is a realistic way forward, other than the integration, on suitable terms, of the Province into the local government and parliamentary structure?

Mr. King: My hon. Friend glides easily with a wave of the wand from the problems of achieving devolution to integration, as if that was immediately achievable on some acceptable basis. He greatly underestimates the problems that that would pose. I have made it clear, and my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has made it clear to the Unionist leaders, that, while we remain committed to the principle of devolution, we are also prepared to consider the ways in which Northern Ireland business is handled in this House. These matters require serious discussion. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls) will lend his shoulder to the wheel and try to get people to join in these discussions.

Mr. John Mark Taylor (Solihull): Does my right hon. Friend agree that if Northern Ireland is to be governed in the same way as the rest of the United Kingdom, as many Unionists would urge, one of the first requirements must be to have county councils or a provincial council? Does he accept that he has now abolished the elected Assembly which could have adopted that role? If he were to use the introduction of county councils or provincial government as a point of departure, what guarantee is there that everyone will sit in the chamber?

Mr. King: That is the point that I was making. My hon. Friend has understood the point that the present Assembly comes to the end of its life on 20 October, at the end of its four-year term. However, it has ceased to discharge the functions for which it was set up. There is no question but that the Assembly could have moved on in the direction that my hon. Friend has mentioned. I hope that we can have discussions to discover whether it is possible to move in any way along the lines that my hon. Friend has described.

Mr. John Stokes (Halesowen and Stourbridge): Will my right hon. Friend be assured that, in spite of the natural and inevitable impatience in England about affairs in Ireland, many English people hold the Province in great esteem? They remember its wonderful contribution in both world wars. The English people wish it well. I believe that our best efforts must be directed towards improving parliamentary and local government in the Province, not to have too many new initiatives here.

Mr. King: Everyone who has had the honour to serve in Northern Ireland would share the comments made by my hon. Friend at the start of his question. Our recognition and appreciation of the quality of the overwhelming majority of the people in the Province is completely unquestioned. That is why we are so committed to trying to find the most acceptable way in which to proceed and to give the people of Northern Ireland as substantial a say as we can in their administration.

Mr. Michael Brown (Brigg and Cleethorpes): Does my right hon. Friend agree that whatever our views on the Northern Ireland Assembly previously, the most important conclusion that any hon. Member representing Northern Ireland should draw from today's announcement is that, whatever their views and however aggrieved they may feel, this is now the central forum for political debate?

Mr. King: One of the comments that may be made about my statement today is that the Government are in some way seeking to choke or close off channels of communication and expression. That charge falls flat when one sees the Benches opposite and realises that one of the most important channels open to anyone in this United Kingdom is this Chamber. Nevertheless, the House is completely neglected and unused by the overwhelming majority of Unionist Members. They are abusing district councils at the same time. They are failing to use the channels that are available to them. I very much agree with my hon. Friend.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle (Lincoln): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the failure of the Assembly is to be regretted, because it provided a local forum in Northern Ireland where the various parties could try to resolve their differences? Does he also agree that no actions or words in this House can thrust peace on Northern Ireland? Does he accept that peace can be achieved in the Province only if all parties there genuinely wish to talk and reach some accord on future life and prosperity there?

Mr. King: I very much agree with my hon. Friend. There is no doubt that if we are to find a way forward, the people in the Province and their representatives will have to be prepared to come forward and make their contribution.

Mr. Neil Hamilton (Tatton): Is if not clear from the SDLP's attitude to the Assembly and a comparison of that attitude with its attitude to the Anglo-Irish agreement that it is prepared to support Government initiatives only when it calculates that they are likely to weaken the Union? That should be enough to make us view with suspicion any initiatives that it supports. Did not my hon. Friend the Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls) put his finger on the central point about experience in Ulster in the past 16 years? The attempt to reconcile two irreconcilable opposites merely by talking will never succeed. The time has come to allay Unionist fears by moving towards proper integration of the Province, ceasing to govern it as a colonial dependency and treating it properly as part of the United Kingdom.

Mr. King: I am not sure that an agreement which gets the British Government and the Government of the Republic of Ireland to sign an undertaking which was originally given in this House, concerning the rights of the Unionist majority in Northern Ireland, represents consent to the right to dominate. Membership of the United Kingdom is an important safeguard. I do not regard that agreement as weakening the Union in any way. As for integration, I do not have much to add to what I have already said. I am anxious to deal with affairs in the House, and especially to get hon. Members to focus on the real problem of administration in the Province.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the most important thing is to take the politics of Ireland off the streets and into the debating chamber? I have consistently advocated a Select Committee. That would help. Will my right hon. Friend consider it? In such a forum, members of the SDLP, Unionists and others who represent the rest of the United Kingdom could, in a proper constitutional framework, scrutinise legislation in a calm atmosphere, which would, I hope, enable progress to be made.

Mr. King: I am interested in that suggestion. The right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) made just such a one in the debate on the appropriation order earlier this week. I confirm that that is the type of matter that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said we would be prepared to discuss.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): I accept that the Assembly has been used improperly. It has been used as a political platform against the Anglo-Irish agreement. I have some sympathy with that, but will my right hon. Friend consider the role of the Democratic Unionist party, which has threatened to take politics on to the streets rather than pursue genuine debate? Will he consider the £2·5 million that it costs to run the Assembly? Could it not be better used helping the economy and providing jobs to encourage the people of Northern Ireland who want to remain part of the United Kingdom?

Mr. King: The Democratic Unionists must answer for their own utterances, but I hope that everybody will show responsibility at a time when problems can easily arise in Northern Ireland. One cannot sit back and do nothing if expenditure is being incurred when none of the functions for which it is authorised are being performed. Bearing in mind the state of the Northern Ireland economy, there are several areas where the money could be much better used.

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): Does not the fact that the Assembly is now to be dissolved and there is no progress towards devolution mean that there is an added burden on the Anglo-Irish agreement? Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that, under article 10 of that agreement, there will be a responsibility to promote co-operation between the two parts of Ireland, so there is an additional responsibility on the agreement? Does he also agree that it ill behoves those who do not come to the House to presume that, by their actions in Northern Ireland and laying the Assembly to rest, they can somehow achieve back door integration? Will he confirm that there is nothing mutually exclusive about the Anglo-Irish agreement and round table talks on the future of Northern Ireland without preconditions?

Mr. King: I believe that talks without preconditions must be the way forward. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for making that clear. One component of the Anglo-Irish agreement is the opportunity for the minority to be able to advance its views. In no circumstances was the Anglo-Irish agreement intended to supplant the opportunity for the majority view to be taken into account. The present tragedy is that the majority representatives have chosen to switch themselves off.

Leyland Bus

4.47 pm

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): As the House is aware, when the Government feel unable to make a statement on a matter of national importance and urgency, hon. Members have the right to apply for a private notice question. This morning, British Leyland made an announcement to its work force, and it was not possible, for obvious reasons, for the Government to make a statement. I felt that it would be wrong to apply for a private notice question, although the matter is most urgent, because of the tragic circumstances that have befallen the Channon family and because the Secretary of State would have been required to answer the private notice question if you, Mr. Speaker, had granted it.

I therefore beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing an important and specific matter, that should have urgent consideration. It is specific because it relates to the affairs of Leyland Bus and important because it concerns a large manufacturing company with nearly 3,000 employees at three locations in the United Kingdom — Lowestoft, Farringdon, near Preston, and Workington.

The matter is urgent, as I have already described. At midday today, British Leyland announced that the company will no longer be known as British Leyland plc but as Rover Group plc. BL will no longer exist. The Leyland name will be retained for commercial vehicle interests only. Through its advisers, Hill Samuel, BL today informed the three parties which have expressed interest in acquiring Leyland Bus that it is inviting offers from them for the entire business on the basis of a tender procedure. We should debate the issue because we need to know whether it is a sealed bid basis.

Tenders are to be delivered to Hill Samuel by 26 June, after which time the BL board will consider them and submit a recommendation to the Government, as the majority shareholder, as soon as possible. The three prospective purchasers are Aveling Barford, the Laird Group and Leyland Bus management consortium.

It is also proposed to establish Leyland Bus as a registered limited company with its own business before any sale. That has not been known hitherto. The company aims to keep the current parts business intact. It is planned to achieve that by selling to the purchaser of Leyland Bus an interest in Leyland parts. The effect will be to leave the loss-making Leyland Bus group free-standing without any support from Leyland parts operations. It means that what remains will be ripe for asset stripping. I earnestly implore you, Mr. Speaker, to allow those matters to be raised under Standing Order No. 10.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he thinks should have urgent consideration, namely,

"The statement today made by British Leyland about the future of Leyland Bus."

I have listened carefully to what the hon. Gentleman has said, but I regret that I do not consider the matter that he has raised as appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 10, and therefore I cannot submit his application to the House.

BILL PRESENTED

RATE SUPPORT GRANT

Mr. Secretary Ridley, supported by Mr. Secretary Edwards, Mr. William Waldegrave and Mr. Norman Lamont, presented a Bill to validate certain block grant determinations already approved by the House of Commons; and to clarify and amend the law relating to rate support grants: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow and to be printed. [Bill 177.]

Orders of the Day

Financial Services Bill

As amended (in the Standing Committee), further considered.

New Clause 12

JURISDICTION AS RESPECTS ACTIONS CONCERNING DESIGNATED AGENCY ETC.

'(1) Proceedings arising out of any act or omission (or proposed act or omission) of a designated agency, transferee body or the competent authority in the discharge or purported discharge of any of its functions under this Act may be brought in the High Court or the Court of Session.

(2) At the end of Schedule 5 to the Civil Jurisdiction and Judgments Act 1982 (exclusion of certain proceedings from the provisions of Schedule 4 to that Act which determine whether the courts in each part of the United Kingdom have jurisdiction in proceedings) there shall be inserted—

"Proceedings concerning financial services agencies

10. Such proceedings as are mentioned in section [Jurisdiction as respects actions concerning designated agency etc.] of the Financial Services Act 1986.".'. — [Mr. Howard.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

4.50 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Michael Howard): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): With this it will be convenient also to discuss the following: Government amendments Nos. 27 to 31, and 88 to 92.

Amendment No. 175, in page 142, line 35, at end insert —

'(7) If the agency is a limited company incorporated in England, it must establish a place of business in Scotland or take such other steps as will render it amenable to the jurisdiction of the Scottish Courts.'.

Government amendments Nos. 182 and 231.

Mr. Howard: A number of hon. Members have written to me about points which were raised by the Law Society of Scotland concerning the Bill. I am grateful to the society for the detailed consideration which it has given the Bill. The Government have always made it clear that the Bill would take account of the differences between the English and the Scottish financial and legal systems and that amendments would be tabled to fulfil this commitment.

The new clause is designed to remove doubts as to whether actions could be brought against a designated agency, transferee body or competent authority in a part of the United Kingdom in which it did not have a place of business, or a registered office. There was particular doubt about whether any such organisation could be subjected to the jurisdiction of the Scottish courts. The Government have decided to bring forward this new clause which makes it clear that action against the relevant bodies may be brought in the courts in any part of the United Kingdom.

The other amendments are mainly technical and designed to bring certain of the provisions in the Bill into line with the procedures and terminology used in the Scottish legal system.

The aims behind the amendment tabled in the names of the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) and the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) are I believe already achieved by the Government new clause.

Mr. Alex Fletcher (Edinburgh, Central): Will my hon. and learned Friend confirm that it has always been the intention of the Department and its Ministers — even before his tenure of office — to ensure that the differences in Scottish law are catered for in the legislation?

Mr. Howard: No one will know better than my hon. Friend that that is the case. We owe much to my hon. Friend for his achievements in respect of this legislation. I am happy to confirm that the intention was always as he stated it to be.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 13

OFFERS OF SHORT-DATED DEBENTURES

'As respects debentures which, under the terms of issue, must be repaid within less than one year of the date of issue —

(a) section 79(2) of the Companies Act 1985 (offer of debentures of oversea company deemed not to be an offer to the public if made to professional investor) shall apply for the purposes of Chapter I of Part III of that Act as well as for those of Chapter II of that Part; and

(b) section 371(2) of the Companies Act (Northern Ireland) 1960 (corresponding provisions for Northern Ireland) shall apply for the purposes of Part II of that Act as well as for those of Part XI.'. —[Mr. Howard.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Howard: I beg to move, that the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government admendments Nos. 270 and 277.

Mr. Howard: The amendments may appear rather technical but could have significant advantages for United Kingdom companies.

The new clause will give United Kingdom companies the same freedom to issue sterling commercial paper as foreign companies currently enjoy under section 79(2) of the Companies Act 1985 and the corresponding Northern Ireland provision, and will facilitate the development of a new United Kingdom financial market in sterling commercial paper.

SCP is a form of short-term negotiable debt which companies can issue as an alternative to bank borrowing. There is a flourishing market in the USA in the equivalent dollar instruments. The development of a United Kingdom market will give companies greater financial flexibility and be a welcome addition to the array of services provided by the City. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced on 29 April that the Banking Act 1979 obstacles to issuing SCP would be relaxed, and that this amendment would be brought forward to extend the benefit of section 79(2) of the Companies Act to United Kingdom companies.

SCP will be issued in minimum denominations of £500,000, and the market will effectively be limited to professionals. The requirement to issue a prospectus is thus inappropriate and unnecessary. Section 79(2) of the Companies Act already exempts offers to professionals by foreign companies but gives no comparable relief to United Kingdom issuers. The new clause will rectify this anomaly and place United Kingdom issuers on the same footing.

Mr. Bryan Gould (Dagenham): I found the Minister's explanation interesting. We shall certainly watch with interest the development of the market for commercial paper. Will the Minister say a word about the rather unusual timing arrangements that are effected by amendments Nos. 270 and 277?

Mr. Howard: It is intended that these provisions should take affect immediately the legislation is on the statute book. We do not wish any delay if the new market is established and that is the reason behind the amendments to which the hon. Gentleman referred.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New clause 15

DISCLOSURE OF INFORMATION UNDER ENACTMENTS RELATING TO FAIR TRADING, INSURANCE AND COMPANIES

'The enactments mentioned in Schedule [Disclosure of information] to this Act shall have effect with the amendments there specified (which relate to the circumstances in which information obtained under those enactments may be disclosed).'—[Mr. Howard.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Howard: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendments Nos. 246 to 250 and 274, 275 and 278.

Mr. Howard: The clause and the associated group of amendments relates to the disclosure of information obtained under the Bill or under various existing statutes. I shall not detain the House with an exhaustive account of these provisions, but I shall confine myself to outlining some of the main provisions.

Our first aim is to permit financial and company regulators to share information while retaining appropriate protection against undesirable disclosure. We announced on Second Reading that we would bring forward amendments to this end. Amendments to the Banking Act 1979 will be tabled in another place, but our proposals to amend the Insurance Companies Act 1982 and the Companies Act 1985 are set out in this new schedule. It will be possible for information which is restricted under those two Acts to be disclosed in almost any of the circumstances in which information under the Bill may be disclosed by virtue of the gateways set out in clause 149. That will include assisting not only the various regulators under the Bill, but also, for example, the Bank of England and certain overseas regulators.

Information obtained by inspectors appointed under the Companies Act 1985 is not restricted information. That Act expressly permits its disclosure in certain circumstances, but the amendment makes express provision to remove uncertainty about its disclosure in other circumstances. The amendments provide that persons appointed as inspectors may give any information acquired during their investigations to the Secretary of State, and the Secretary of State may direct them to do so. Once the information is in the hands of the Secretary of State, he may disclose in any of the circumstances in which information which is restricted under the Companies Act may be disclosed. This will remove doubt as to whether the Secretary of State may disclose information or unpublished inspectors' reports in circumstances where it is clearly desirable that he should be able to do so.

[Mr. Howard]

That is the effect of the provisions in relation to financial and companies regulation. The sharing of information is not intended to extend fully to authorities concerned with other matters, but special provision is required for competition purposes. I shall explain that and other specialised aspects of the clause and associated amendments if asked by any hon. Member.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New clause 16

PENALTIES FOR FAILURE TO CO-OPERATE WITH S. 147 INVESTIGATIONS

'(1) If any person—

(a) refuses to comply with any request under subsection (3) of section 147 above; or

(b) refuses to answer any question put to him by the inspectors appointed under that section with respect to any matter relevant for establishing whether or not any suspected contravention has occurred, the inspectors may certify that fact in writing to the court and the court may inquire into the case.

(2) If, after hearing any witness who may be produced against or on behalf of the alleged offender and any statement which may be offered in defence, the court is satisfied that he did without reasonable excuse refuse to comply with such a request, the court may—

(a) punish him in like manner as if he had been guilty of contempt of the court; or

(b) direct that the Secretary of State may exercise his powers under this section in respect of him; and the court may give a direction under paragraph (b) above notwithstanding that the offender is not within the jurisdiction of the court if the court is satisfied that he was notified of his right to appear before the court and of the powers available under this section.

(3) Where the court gives a direction under subsection (2) (b) above in respect of an authorised person the Secretary of State may serve a notice on him—

(a) cancelling any authorisation of his to carry on investment business after the expiry of a specified period after the service of the notice;

(b) disqualifying him from becoming authorised to carry on investment business after the expiry of that period;

(c) restricting any authorisation of his in respect of investment business during that period to the performance of contracts entered into before the notice comes into force;

(d) prohibiting him from entering into transactions of a specified kind or entering into them except in specified circumstances or to a specified extent;

(e) prohibiting him from soliciting business from persons of a specified kind or otherwise than from such persons; or

(f) prohibiting him from carrying on business in a specified manner or otherwise than in a specified manner.

(4) The period specified in such a notice as is mentioned in paragraphs (a) to (e) of subsection (3) above shall be such period as appears to the Secretary of State reasonable to enable the person on whom it is served to complete the performance of the contracts in question and to terminate such of them as are of a continuing nature.

(5) Where the court gives a direction under subsection (2) (b) above in the case of an unauthorised person the Secretary of State may direct that any authorised person who knowingly transacts investment business of a specified kind, or in specified circumstances or to a specified extent, with or on behalf of that unauthorised person shall be treated as having contravened rules made under Chapter V of Part I of this Act or, in the case of a person who is an authorised person by virtue of his membership of a recognised self-regulating organisation or recognised professional body, the rules of that organisation or body.

(6) A person shall not be treated for the purposes of subsection (2) above as having a reasonable excuse for refusing to comply with a request in a case where the contravention or suspected contravention being investigated relates to dealing by him on the instructions or for the account of another person, by reason that at the time of the refusal

(a) he did not know the identity of that other person; or

(b) he was subject to the law of a country or territory outside the United Kingdom which prohibited him from disclosing information relating to the dealing without the consent of that other person, if he might have obtained that consent or obtained exemption from that law.

(7) A notice served on a person under subsection (3) above may be revoked at any time by the Secretary of State by serving a revocation notice on him; and the Secretary of State shall revoke such a notice if it appears to him that he has agreed to comply with the request in question.

(8) The revocation of such a notice as is mentioned in subsection (3)(a) above shall not have the effect of reviving the authorisation cancelled by the notice, except where the person would (apart from the notice) at the time of the revocation be an authorised person by virtue of his membership of a recognised self-regulating organisation or recognised professional body; but nothing in this subsection shall be construed as preventing any person who has been subject to such a notice from again becoming authorised after the revocation of the notice.

(9) If it appears to the Secretary of State—

(a) that a person on whom he serves a notice under subsection (3) above is an authorised person by virtue of an authorisation granted by a designated agency or by virtue of membership of a recognised self-regulating organisation or recognised professional body; or

(b) that a person on whom he serves a revocation notice under subsection (7) above was such an authorised person at the time that the notice which is being revoked was served, he shall serve a copy of the notice on that agency, organisation or body.

(10) The functions to which section 96 above applies shall include the functions of the Secretary of State under this section but any transfer of those functions shall be subject to a reservation that they are to be exercisable by him concurrently with the designated agency and so as to be exercisable by the agency subject to such conditions or restrictions as the Secretary of State may from time to time impose.'.—[Mr. Howard.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

5 pm

Mr. Howard: I beg to move, That the new clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to take Government amendment No. 245.

Mr. Howard: I undertook to my hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, South (Mr. Yeo) to consider how to amend the Bill to enable pressure to be applied, within the proper limits of United Kingdom jurisdiction, to dispose offshore intermediaries to co-operate with investigations into suspected insider dealing on United Kingdom markets. This new clause fulfils that undertaking. If an offshore intermediary refuses to co-operate with an inspector, the inspector may refer the matter to the court.

If the court is satisfied that there is no reasonable excuse for the refusal, it may direct that the Secretary of State may use his powers.

These powers take two forms, depending on whether or not the intermediary is authorised in this country. If the intermediary is not authorised, the Secretary of State may direct that authorised businesses shall not transact specified kinds of business for it. Thus, its access to United Kingdom markets may be restricted or completely cut off. Contraventions of the direction will be a regulatory offence. If the intermediary is authorised, the Secretary of State may serve a notice applying a range of sanctions from restrictions on its business to de-authorisation.

I should say a few words about "reasonable excuses". Not knowing the identity of a principal will not be regarded as a "reasonable excuse". Nor will the existence of banking secrecy laws if the person might have obtained a waiver. The defence is intentionally drawn narrowly. The limit of the knowledge which it would be reasonable to expect a person to have will be taken into account in exercising the power. But the clause is based on the premise that if an overseas bank could know the identity of the principal behind a transaction on a United Kingdom market, who may have committed a criminal offence, but chooses not to find out, then it is reasonable for that bank to have restrictions imposed on its United Kingdom activities.

Given the importance of this matter, I should add a few words about the way in which we propose to exercise this power. I have already explained that we propose to use it against intermediaries who have participated in transactions which have taken place in our markets without putting themselves in a position where they can give us the necessary assistance to ensure that such transactions are properly policed. Therefore, there is a close connection between our jurisdiction and what we propose to do.

However, it has to be admitted that this clause can be operated so as to attach legal consequences to failure to answer inquiries abroad. Because of this aspect of the matter we propose to exercise this power with great care, moderation and restraint as indeed the Government have always argued should be done in these kind of circumstances. In particular, where arrangements are in place to ensure that the information we need can be obtained by other means through the co-operation of the relevant foreign authorities, we shall always resort to those means. It may be that the clause can be further refined to build in these necessary considerations. This is one of the matters that I shall be considering in this context.

The new clause should prove a worthwhile addition to the powers of the investigators, and I commend it to the House.

Mr. Gould: This is one of those welcome occasions when it is appropriate to congratulate the Minister on his response to an expression of opinion in Committee. It is perhaps foolish to be too sanguine in advance, until we see how the clause works out in practice. We have here a determined and fair response to the Committee's concern.

It may be as well to remind the House just what the Committee was worried about. The Minister rightly referred to the views expressed by the hon. Member for Suffolk, South (Mr. Yeo), in which he was strongly supported by the Labour party. Nothing that has happened since the Committee sat has reduced our concern—indeed, the news from New York heightens it about the press reports and other evidence that insider dealing, which had been a criminal offence since 1980, had nevertheless continued to grow in scope. It has particularly flourished in the context of major takeover bids. There were reports current when the Committee was sitting of professional advisers to major companies who were parties to bids and using their insider knowledge to set themselves up and provide nominee shareholders and overseas companies, and then traded the shares of the companies to which they were advisers and of which they had insider knowledge.

In Committee, it emerged that the Bill as drafted was inadequate to deal with such problems. The danger that we had to face, and which particularly worried the hon. Member for Suffolk, South, was that, as a consequence of the Committee's deliberations, it had become clear that the range of measures proposed as the Bill then stood was inadequate and that, in a sense, those who were engaged in this practice might be encouraged to believe that they could proceed without fear of any sanction.

The measure contained in the new clause is an earnest of the Government's seriousness of purpose. I wish the provisions of the new clause well, and we shall watch it to see how well it works in practice. I fear that I cannot be absolutely confident that it will plug every loophole or be a total solution, but it is a substantial step forward. It is welcome to see that the Securities and Investments Board has concurrent jurisdiction in this matter, and that goes well in tandem with the other changes brought about in Committee, those giving the power to prosecute and investigate unauthorised persons.

I conclude on the happy note of congratulating the Minister on introducing the new clause.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): In respect of recognised professional bodies and the implications of this clause for them, I am bound to draw attention to the fact that the word "accountant" is used, but quite rightly without any definition that would necessarily confine the description to members of the chartered bodies concerned. This also happens in new clause 15. This is a matter of great importance and was considered in the evidence given in the early part of this century — in the 1930s — by the Institute of Chartered Accountants. My great-uncle gave evidence to the House of Commons on this very question. The conclusion was that in the course of the hearing, it had become clear that the word "accountant" by itself was almost meaningless. The description accompanying it was all-important, yet it was impossible to define what was covered by the word "accountancy".

Persons other than those who are members of the chartered bodies—for example, the Society of Company and Commercial Accountants — have a grave concern about the provisions that will apply to them. Therefore, although most of the provisions refer to recognised professional bodies, arrangements will have to be made to ensure that those who are members of other accountancy bodies are not precluded simply because they are not chartered. It will be necessary to return to this matter at a later stage, but I wanted to make the reference in connection with this clause.

Mr. Anthony Nelson (Chichester): I congratulate my hon. and learned Friend the Minster, on moving the new clause, and I welcome its content. The House owes a debt of gratitude to my hon. Friend, the Member for Suffolk,

[Mr. Anthony Nelson]

South (Mr. Yeo). He cannot be here this afternoon, because he is in the Committee debating the Finance Bill. I know that he would want it recorded that he took a close interest in this matter, and introduced the relevant amendment in Committee.

I welcome the extension, provided for in the new clause, of the proposals in the Bill to deal in a tougher fashion with insider dealing, which is a great mischief that is more rife than is currently recognised. It is exceedingly difficult to detect and even more difficult to prosecute and convict for. Recent events, such as those highlighted by the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) in the United States, and, particularly, in the indictment of Mr. Levine, a former senior executive of Drexel Burnham, give one great cause for concern about the way in which offshore mediums are being used to cover up insider dealings.

My hon. and learned Friend the Minister will know that I wrote to him about this matter recently, because it came to my attention that there is a special agreement between the Swiss banks and the Securities and Exchange Commission in the United States with the express intention of trying to release information on suspected cases of insider dealing. That seemed to be of relevance to the United Kingdom in the new financial climate in which we shall be operating.

In Committee, we debated the difficulties of investigating or proving insider dealing where an offshore account or medium is used. Therefore, I drew to the attention of my hon. and learned Friend Agreement 16 between the Swiss Bankers Association and the Swiss banks generally, which was a gentleman's agreement relating to the handling of requests from the Securities and Exchange Commission in the United States for information on insider dealing and share transactions in the United States. There is no legal obligation for customers of a Swiss bank to signify their agreement to this clause, but if they fail to do so, the bank concerned may thereafter refuse to conduct security transactions with America for the client. If the SEC wishes to obtain information, its first recourse is to the police department of Switzerland, which, if it considers that there is prima facie evidence of insider trading, may approach the Swiss bank concerned to seek the disclosure of information under the terms of this agreement. In the last resort it is also possible, by invoking the provisions of this agreement, to freeze the assets of a customer with a Swiss bank account who is suspected of engaging in such activities, which are criminal activities here and in the United States.

We have some provisions under the companies legislation and now in the Financial Services Bill, as amended by this new clause, to limit the extent to which insider dealing will take place and to make investigations in a more incisive way. We shall have to look again at this problem if the incidence of insider trading continues to grow. I understand that the Council of Europe, which includes the Swiss, has made some progress in drawing up a convention which will seek to tackle the problem of insider dealing as part of a false market. I understand that the Government are trying to strengthen their contacts to develop exchanges of information with regulatory authorities overseas.

In his written reply my hon. and learned Friend the Minister was good enough to say that we may well have to look at this again. For the time being he feels that this agreement may be of limited application to us. I hope that in his reply to this short debate on the new clause he will tell us that he will keep an open mind about ways in which at a supranational level we can investigate more incisively and proactively than we have done in the past the mediums being used for these pernicious and criminal activities, which are a fraud perpetrated on all investors.

Mr. Howard: I am grateful to the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) and my hon. Friend the Member for Chichester (Mr. Nelson) for the welcome that they have given the new clause. It is an earnest of our intentions to be serious about this pernicious abuse. I can give my hon. Friend the assurance that he seeks and tell him that we shall keep a close watch to see whether anything further that needs to be done can be done. I listened carefully to my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) and I shall consider whether there is anything I can usefully add to what he already knows of my views on this matter.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time and added to the Bill.

New Clause 4

REGISTER OF PERSONS EMPLOYED IN BUYING, SELLING OR ADVISING ON RIGHTS UNDER CONTRACTS OF INSURANCE, ETC

'(1) The Secretary of State shall keep a register of individuals who appear to him to be employed or proposing to become employed in connection with buying, selling or advising on:

(a) rights under contracts of insurance falling within paragraph 10 of Schedule 1; and

(b) units in collective investment schemes.

(2) An application for entry on the register shall contain or be accompanied by such information as the Secretary of State may reasonably require for the purposes of determining whether to make a direction in respect of the applicant under section 54 of this Act, and such information shall, if the Secretary of State so requires, be in such form or verified in such manner as he may specify.

(3) An entry in respect of a person in the register under this section shall include particulars of any direction made by the Secretary of State in respect of that person under section 54 of this Act and of any consent for that person's employment given by the Secretary of State.

(4) The Secretary of State may make regulations requiring authorised persons to give him forthwith notice of such events in relation to individuals employed by them as mentioned in subsection (1) as are specified in the regulations and such information in respect of those events as is so specified.

(5) The Secretary of State may make regulations requiring authorised persons to furnish him at such times or in respect of such periods as are specified in the regulations with such information in relation to individuals employed by them as mentioned in subsection (1) as is so specified.

(6) Regulations under this section may require information to be given in a specified form and to be verified in a specified manner.

(7) The information contained in the entries included in the register kept under this section shall be open to inspection and the Secretary of State may publish the information contained in those entries in any form he thinks appropriate and may offer copies of any such information for sale.

(8) The register kept by the Secretary of State under section 89(1)(e) of this Act need not include entries in respect of persons included in the register kept under this section unless the direction under section 54 (by virtue of which section 89(1) (e) applies) relates to or includes a kind of investment business other than that mentioned in subsection (1).

(9) It shall be the duty of an authorised person and an exempt representative to take reasonable care not to employ or continue to employ as mentioned in subsection (1) above any individual in respect of whom there is no entry in the register kept under this section.

(10) In this section references to employment include references to employment otherwise than under a contract of service, and references to buying and selling are to be construed in accordance with paragraph 23 of Schedule 1."

Brought up, and read the First time.

5.15 pm

Sir William Clark (Croydon, South): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

This new clause seeks to establish a comprehensive register of all those employed or proposing to become employed in selling or advising on life assurance or collective investment schemes such as unit trusts. If we have a central register and if it became necessary to take from someone the authorisation to do those things, it would be extremely easy. Companies that advise on investment matters, such as insurance companies, building societies and the like, would themselves keep registers of those employees who were allowed to give advice to the general public. It is said that a central register would be exorbitantly costly, but I am not sure that I accept that point. Obviously, there would be no cost to the taxpayer because there would be a registration fee to cover the administrative costs and that fee would be paid by the applicable investment organisation.

Clause 4(9) is the main part of the new clause and its powers parallel clause 54 in the Bill. A person who has given bad advice will be taken to task by his or her employer. The employer may decide that that person is no longer capable or competent to give advice. However, that prohibition would apply only in that company or organisation. If the person left the company and was employed somewhere else, he could start giving advice again. Companies are worried about that, because it may put employers in an impossible position. That is because employers would probably treat similar cases in different ways. One employer may tell his employee not to make the same mistake again. Obviously, an insurance company or building society would take upon itself the responsibility for the bad advice or the misadvice that had been given, whether wittingly or unwittingly.

How many misdemeanours have to be committed before authorisation is removed from an organisation? I am sure my hon. and learned Friend the Minister has addressed his mind to that because it seems ridiculous to penalise a company when it is an individual who is at fault. Somehow, there must be a blacklist. How does one compile a blacklist if there is not some sort of central register?

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): I am listening carefully to the hon. Member's argument. I am not clear whether he is proposing a requirement for entry to the register. Will it be an objective test of competence, or does he propose that entry to the register is purely on the gift of the company or, indeed, of the Secretary of State? I should like the hon. Gentleman to expand on how one is placed on the register and what it means in terms of competence. Will there be an objective standard by which entries will be judged?

Sir William Clark: Of course there will be some test of competence. I am sure the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) appreciates that Back Benchers do not have the facilities of parliamentary draftsmen, and for that reason it is possible that there is some ambiguity in the new clause. I am speaking about the spirit of the new clause. I realise, and I am sure my hon. and learned Friend the Minister realises, that the Marketing of Investments Board Organising Committee advocated a central register. I also realise that the National Consumer Council is against the new clause, but that council is against it for the wrong reasons. It thinks that a central register would give credence to anybody on that register. However, if there is a test of competence for entrants to the register, there is no difficulty.

The Building Societies Association is against a register. The British Insurance Association agrees with it but has some reservations about the test of competence. I declare an interest because I am a consultant to the Life Insurance Association. It has 12,000 members working on the ground and is avidly in favour of the new clause and some sort of registration so that a blacklist can be identified immediately.

If one can believe the leaks in the press over the past few days I am certain that at the top of the Minister's reply notes there is the word "Resist." If he resists, I should like him to give me the assurance that it is the Government's opinion that the Bill, as drafted, will be sufficient to protect the general public from blacklisted investment advisers and that immediately such persons would not be able to give advice anywhere. If he is certain that the Bill will do that, can he give me the assurance that if in future we find it is essential to have some sort of central register because the Act is not working and there are loopholes in it about non-registration, he will not only keep it under review, but will change the legislation? That would be necessary in order to protect the investments of many people.

Mr. Gould: I listened with considerable interest to the hon. Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark) and I had a great deal of sympathy for what he had to say about the new clause. It is worth recalling that the industry set up a consultative group, I think embracing virtually every body known to the industry, long before the Financial Services Bill hove into sight. That consultative group had gone a long way towards the proposal for the establishment of a register or licensing system.

The Government then appointed MIBOC, a practitioner-based body which considered the whole issue and produced an extremely well thought out set of proposals which were duly modified, following extensive consultation with the industry. We then had the situation, which is unfortunate to say the least, in which the Government, having set up a body to obtain the industry's advice, then refused to accept it. Indeed, that has been overridden, so far as one can tell, by the advice of their civil servants, but, perhaps more significantly, by the representations made to it by that familiar combination of banks and building societies and other powerful institutions——

Mr. Howard: And consumer bodies.

Mr. Gould: I shall mention them in a moment. The Minister would do well if he could make the claim, without blushing, that it was the Consumers Association which had weighed with him rather than the banks and the building societies on this issue.

[Mr. Gould]

It is yet one further regrettable instance of how on so many occasions the major financial institutions, particularly the banks, tend to come along at the last moment and express a view which is then adopted by the Government contrary to the views and evidence of most other people.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): That is an unrealistic assessment of the situation. The hon. Gentleman may be right about the banks and building societies, but he needs to recognise that in relation to MIBOC many other financial institutions had a vested interest in the scheme. Perhaps we should set those two up against each other and look at what the consumer bodies, who are supposed to represent investors, have to say about it.

Mr. Gould: I am content to accept the hon. Gentleman's endorsement of my point about banks and building societies. On MIBOC, I draw his attention to the fact that the Government set it up to provide them with exactly the advice that they are now rejecting.

So far as one can judge from the Minister's public pronouncements on these matters, the major argument against the MIBOC proposal and against the register seems to be that of cost. Of course, investor protection costs money. If the argument about cost were thought to be overriding, we would not be legislating at all. The Financial Services Bill will cost money. To provide essential protection to the consumers—to investors who buy life insurance policies—will cost money. There is no question about that. However, the sum of money involved can be made to seem extremely large only by multiplying it by 200,000 or 300,000, because that is the number of people involved in selling life insurance. Per head the cost is marginal. As a proportion of the total cost of putting a salesman into the business of selling, the cost of putting him on the register and providing him with a course enabling him to pass a test of competence is so marginal as not to worry anybody. That seems a small price to pay for an essential and entirely desirable element of consumer protection.

Without the register, the Government, the Secretary of State, and eventually the Securities and Investments Board, will have to rely for virtually their only weapon, apart from the general processes of authorisation, on the power provided by clause 54 — the disqualification power. I am encouraged at least to hear from Sir Kenneth Berrill that he intends to exercise that power rigorously. But even he could not conceal his disappointment at the Minister's announcement that registration is not to be proceeded with.

The difficulty with the clause 54 power—this is an analogy drawn to my attention by a spokesman for the industry; I do not claim authorship—is that it is rather like abolishing the concept of the driving licence and saying that we can deal with any problems that arise by prosecuting those who are thought to have committed offences of dangerous driving. The difficulty with that is that people tend to be hurt in traffic accidents, just as they will be hurt if they are buying life assurance and other investments from people who have not been required to establish in some way their competence and probity.

It is not to denigrate the industry unduly to point out that higher standards of competence and probity are desperately needed in this area. It is very much to the industry's credit that it recognises that that is the case. It is most unfortunate that the Government, through a failure of will or for whatever reason, have failed to accept the advice which has been tendered to them.

I conclude by echoing the appeal of the hon. Member for Croydon, South to the Minister. If he does not proceed with this, will he at least undertake to watch this area extremely closely? If he feels, as he may well be forced to conclude after a year or so, that higher standards and some test of competence is required, will he then be prepared to review the situation within a short period?

Mr. Robert McCrindle (Brentwood and Ongar): I have long held the view that true investor protection requires not only authorisation of the principal but also some form of licensing or registration of the individual acting on behalf of his principal. It is not sufficient to assume that the company to be authorised under the Bill will at all times be able to control the activities of its salesmen, yet that is what really matters to the customer.

The ideal system may well contain a basic test of competence, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark) and the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) referred. It is sometimes thought that a basic test of competence is unnecessary, yet it is within my experience that the ability to differentiate between different types of life assurance policy is not always present among those who purport to advise an individual on what is arguably one of the more important financial transactions of his lifetime.

It is surely also not expecting too much that some knowledge of personal taxation should be available to the customer through the individual who will either be an insurance company representative or an independent intermediary. It is surely not too much to expect that the company representative will have a full knowledge of his company's range of products and that an independent intermediary will have an understanding of what is available on the market. Such a basic test of competence is something to which we should be wholly attracted.

Allied to that there should be, as the new clause suggests, a register and a black list for periodical publication. My fear is that one without the other will present an unbalanced aspect of investor protection. If I have a concern about the new clause as proposed, it is that it seems to propose that the Secretary of State should have a considerable involvement in the creation and the keeping of the register. However, it does not make it clear who, in his ideal situation, would be the provider of a competence test.

Whether or not the new clause is acceptable to the Minister, I suggest that the obvious candidate to apply such a test of competence must surely be either the SIB, into which MIBOC will have been subsumed when the legislation becomes fully operative, or the self-regulating organisation.

Therefore, I submit to my hon. and learned Friend the Minister that if the new clause is not acceptable as it stands because it involves the Secretary of State in collating and publishing information, perhaps the message should go out from the Minister that over a few years SROs will be urged to introduce such a licensing or registration system by themselves as they become more able to run a test of competence on their own account.

If the Minister were prepared to back such a progressive introduction of such a scheme, he would have widespread support, including, perhaps, as the Government understand it a little more, some of the consumer organisations which do not appear to like the idea so far put forward, almost entirely due to the cost. I have some reason to believe that the estimate of the cost of introducing such a system has been considerably exaggerated. Only yesterday, I had a conversation with a prospective member of an SRO, who expressed the opinion that there should be no great difficulty or cost in the progressive introduction of a test of competence allied to a system of registration or licensing.

5.30 pm

Those who have so far objected, apart from the consumer interest groups, are the building societies, the direct sales forces and the banks. I do not wish to cast aspersions on the sales forces of the banks or on the direct sales life assurance companies, which have served the public well during the past few years, but I am a little worried to discover that the building societies seem to be so vehement in their opposition to the idea of a test of competence because other legislation still going through Parliament will authorise them to move much more effectively and actively into life assurance and general insurance than has been the case. There are no prizes for guessing that they are already active in recruitment, and I have no doubt that many of the people whom they will recruit will be extremely estimable.

However, without a test of competence, and remembering that building societies cannot be expected to have the experience in insurance that we expect and know them to have in mortgages, they might be guilty of recruiting some people who would be incapable of giving the advice that a consumer has a right to expect. I hope that my hon. and learned Friend the Minister will not be too influenced by institutions such as the building societies —rather, I hope, the reverse. I hope that he will accept my point that, especially in the case of the building societies, there is a strong argument for extending the consumer protection that underlies the legislation.

I remain convinced that the prospect of an individual losing his licence, or losing his right to practice and to sell life assurance, would be a salutary discipline. I also believe that a representative of an authorised company who is not registered or licensed gives less than full investor protection. I appreciate that the legislation allows for the provision of a blacklist. I know that only yesterday Sir Kenneth Berrill, the chairman of the SIB, said that the clause would not be dormant, but would be fully acitivated under his leadership of the SIB. That is all very well, but a blacklist alone without a registration or licensing system — I hope that the Minister will forgive me for so describing it—is a little like closing the door after the deed is done.

The idea suggested by my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South in his new clause, which regrettably, if press reports are to be believed, the Minister will be resisting, overlooks the fundamentally important aspect that it is good to have a blacklist. Few of us who have anything to do with insurance would wish to resist it, but a blacklist alone without a reasonable test of competence and a reasonable implication of probity on the part of the individual does not go far enough.

The new clause may be the wrong method of protecting the consumer because it seems to bypass the SROs. I am sure that that could be put right in a way that would be acceptable to my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South. The SROs should be charged to introduce a competence test and to create a register progressively over a period of three to five years. I hope that when my hon. and learned Friend the Minister replies he will say whether my suggestion, subject to its being a system under which the cost would be kept to the minimun, strikes a chord of response in him. I sincerely hope that it does. I approve of a blacklist to protect investors, but not one which stands alone. The blacklist should complement what in my judgment is a much more important aspect of investor protection.

Mr. Ashdown: Not for the first time, I agreed with almost every point made by the hon. Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. McCrindle) on insurance matters. However, I wish to expand upon some of them.

I am grateful to the hon. Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark), who moved the new clause, for saying that the principle enshrined in it was important, not necessarily its drafting or the words, because it falls significantly short of what I had wished to see, especially in relation to competence. A register that does not include, as an essential part, a test of competence which is objective and industrywide rather than established by the firm could mislead people instead of safeguarding them. I shall return to that matter later.

In Committee, we discussed basic principles at some length. One basic principle in the Bill to which the Minister agreed is now enshrined in an amendment. It is the concept of tapering safeguards so that those who are most competent — who are at the top of the profession — would require fewer safeguards. The rule of caveat emptor would apply more precisely to them than to those at the bottom, most vulnerable end of the sector who have less knowledge and less competence in making judgments.

No one in the entire area where we seek safeguards for investors who have little knowledge of affairs can be more easily misled than the people with whom insurance salesmen frequently deal. As we said in Committee, insurance salesmen conduct business not in offices but frequently in the comfortable and disarming environment of people's homes.

If the Minister is to carry through the basic principle of tapering safeguards, it is essential that we afford those people greater safeguards about the advice that they will receive about competence and honesty than we do to others. The principle of the new clause is an important piece of armoury in that balance of safeguards. In the sale of insurance to private individuals, I have a strong suspicion that more damage is done through incompetence than through venality or dishonesty. I have no doubt that dishonest people exist in the insurance industry as they do in any other especially one which deals in such an environment and has such a large work force. However, I suggest that the number is small. There is not much evidence to suggest that that is the major problem. Incompetence probably does more damage in this area than in any other.

If the Government introduced a blacklist, even if such a thing could exist without a register alongside it — I have practical doubts on that matter — they could at least in some measure deal with the problem of dishonesty, but they could not cope with the problem of incompetence, which in my judgment and that of others does much more damage.

[Mr. Ashdown]

Recently, there have been suggestions that one way of getting round this problem and coping with it in terms of establishing a level of competence would be to set up a test of competency after 18 months. That is a sensible suggestion, and I was worried to see that it was dropped from the latest MIBOC draft proposals. As the hon Member for Croydon, South and the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) said, it was dropped because of the cost that might be involved. A cost of £10 per insurance salesman was predicted. That may sound a lot, but, as the hon. Member for Dagenham said, it is as nothing compared with the cost involved—in a typical case, 20 per cent. of premiums — in administration and commission for every individual during the entire term of the policy. Ten pounds is nothing, not even in relation to a handful of people who take out insurances, let alone in relation to the number of insurances that could be sold by salesmen during one month, let alone a year. That is a small price to pay for what will be a significant and, because the people concerned are most vulnerable, essential safeguard.

I listened with interest to the Minister's reply to the hon. Member for Dagenham about why he had rejected MIBOC's and SIB's proposals. He asked us to believe that he rejected them because of the excellent work and suggestions made to him by the Consumers Association. His rejection had nothing to do with the banks and the other large, powerful organisations which recommended that course to him. At present we shall put aside unreasonable and inelegant suspicions on this matter.

It is a matter of some confusion to us that the Minister has not accepted other recommendations put forward by the Consumer Association. He says with sincerity and with his hand on his heart that the Consumers Association has argued the case against this most powerfully and that he has listened to most of it.

I ask the Minister to re-examine what the consumer associations have said. The National Consumer Council said that it did not want such a register for one reason — it could mislead the public on the matter of competence. The hon. Member for Croydon, South made it clear that he wishes a test of competence to become an essential element of such a register. The NCC's objection must fail if the register shows that the membership has such a level of competence, for the public would not be misled in the way that the NCC feared.

The Consumers Association also told the Minister that it was opposed to a register. I ask the Minister to consider that carefully, because the Consumers Association says that it would be preferable to ban cold calling than to have a register. I agree with that. If the Minister agrees with the second part of the recommendation, does he also agree with the first? I am prepared to give way to the Minister in the hope that he will answer my question. If the Minister will tell the House that he is prepared to introduce a complete ban on cold calling, we may not need such a register. The Consumers Association made its recommendation on that basis.

One is left with the inelegant suspicion that in this, as in so much else, the Minister was moved more by the power of the banks and those who have the most financial clout than by the Consumers Association. I hope that the Minister, will answer the Consumers Association's request for a ban on cold calling.

If the Minister, for reasons of drafting or other reasons, will not accept the new clause, I hope that he will look closely at the matter and will make recommendations to solve this problem. If he will not do that, will he make a clear declaration to the House that he will keep this important matter under close review?

Mr. Cash: I raised the matter of competence many times in Committee, tabling a series of amendments to the schedules to introduce the concept of competence and of the qualifications of members of SROs. I expect that that matter will continue to be debated on later amendments.

With respect to my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark), may I say that the clause appears to have attracted an unusual amount of opposition. The Office of Fair Trading, the Consumers Association, the Linked Life Assurance Group, the Committee of London and Scottish Bankers, which has contacted me on the matter, the Pearl Assurance Group, the Co-operative Insurance Society, the Royal Liver Friendly Society, the Building Societies Association and the National Consumer Council have all appeared to take exception to the provisions. In view of the weight of opinion, and despite my hon. Friend's arguments, I do not believe that the new clause should be accepted.

The chairman of the Chief Executive Officers' Committee of London and Scottish Bankers, Mr. Philip Wilkinson, said:

"We are in favour of a list of rogue salesmen, but not of a huge index of reputable ones. This extra layer of bureaucracy proposed by the Board would only serve to create unnecessary cost with no discernible benefit . . . Our member banks are already highly selective in their recruitment and require rigorous standards to be met before allowing staff to advise the public on any financial matter. There are at least 50,000 staff involved, from time to time, in marketing and advising on life assurance and unit trusts, often as an integral part of a wider advisory service."

Mr. McCrindle: Can my hon. Friend say whether any of the many objectors to the new clause objected also to my suggestion that the task should be given to the SROs, and that a register and some form of licensing should be introduced progressively? There is no sign that they would object to that.

Mr. Cash: I listened with interest to my hon. Friend. He and I are ad idem on the test of competence, and we were together on that point in Committee. From the synopsis that I have of those organisations' views, I do not know whether they said other things too. The Committee of London and Scottish Bankers made its position perfectly clear. It stated:

"The costs of registering them individually is likely to be over £2 million with an ongoing compliance cost of £1 million annually, a cost which would have to be borne by customers eventually."

The banks support high standards of competence and probity——

5.45 pm

Mr. Ashdown: The hon. Gentleman said that one reason why he opposes the new clause is that the cost would have to be borne by the customer. Surely that is the case with all regulations. Costs are always borne eventually by the investor—the customer. If that is to be the reason for opposing the new clause, it must be a reason for opposing everything else.

Mr. Cash: We might also have to pay the cost of having an alliance in due course. Costs occur in all matters; the point made by the Committee of London and Scottish Bankers is fair and reasonable, and I fully support it. The sheer diversity of the methods of selling life assurance and unit trusts is a good reason for not having a universal register.

Mr. Howard: I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) for his support. He has correctly anticipated my position in relation to the new clause moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark).

The hon. Members for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) and for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) have adopted a curious approach to our discussions both yesterday evening and this afternoon. They select what they regard as the basis upon which I reach decisions in these matters, and, on that false premise, mount an argument which diverges ever more rapidly from reality. I could put up with the fact that they credit me with having no independent judgment, but I must object when they select people to whom they say I listen on such matters, and ignore the fact that representations come from other bodies which are less easy for them to attack. In reaching my decisions, I pay careful attention to everything that is said, and, at the end of the day, I make my independent judgment on the basis of those representations.

Bearing in mind, as one does in considering such suggestions, the existing powers in the Bill which will give substantial control over individuals employed by investment businesses, my judgment is that the suggestions put forward in the new clause are unnecessary and expensive. As the hon. Member for Yeovil said—it was not his most original thought—cost must be taken into account and all regulation is expensive. Although that is true, it does not relieve us of the responsibility of assessing the value of every proposal as against its cost. I sought to do that in relation to the proposals and, measured against that criterion, the proposals are found wanting.

As those making representations on the proposals put forward by MIBOC said, there is a danger that the competence test could mislead. It was intended to be a basic test. There was a real danger that salesmen who had acquired that basic qualification could present it as a basis for advising consumers on matters far exceeding the competence to which the certificate testified. It would be rather like referring everyone who wished to travel to Crewe to obtain a ticket to Watford Junction.

Of course it is right, as several hon. Members have pointed out, that clause 54 provides for a blacklist. We have already heard what has been said by Sir Kenneth Berrill about the way in which the powers in clause 54 are to be exercised. Indeed, I welcome his remarks. Clause 54 is intended to provide a real safeguard for the investor, and no doubt it will do so. My hon. Friend the Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. McCrindle) mentioned the possibility of a register and a competence test being administered by SROs. There is no reason why they should not, if they think it appropriate, have a register for the businesses that they authorise or have a competence test. But for the reasons advanced, I believe that it is unnecessary to have a statutory central register with a statutory competence test.

I can give the assurance sought by my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South. Of course we shall continue to keep the matter under close review. If evidence materialises to show that our judgment needs to be revised, we shall not close our eyes to it. However, on the evidence so far presented, I must invite the House to reject the new clause.

Sir William Clark: I am grateful to my hon. and learned Friend the Minister for his remarks. I think that the debate on this important subject has been worth while. However, I hope that my hon. and learned Friend did not think that I in any way implied that any undue pressure had been brought to bear on him. I regret the accusations that have been made to the effect that that might be so. I am delighted that my hon. and learned Friend has accepted that there could or might be evidence to the contrary, and that, if there is, he will keep the matter under close review. He has indicated that if the Bill, as drafted, is found to be inadequate, he will alter it to give the investor the necessary protection. Given that assurance by my hon. and learned Friend, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New clause 14

TAKEOVER PANEL

'(1) The Secretary of State shall supervise the functions of the Takeover Panel in formulating publishing and applying the rules of the Takeover Code, and shall himself have power to make, modify and enforce the rules of the Takeover Code, either directly or through the agency of the Takeover Panel.

(2) The rules of the Takeover Code shall take effect as if they were made by the Secretary of State under this Act.

(3) The Secretary of State may exercise any of the functions described in this section notwithstanding that any or all of the persons affected by the exercise of such functions are not authorised persons for the purposes of this Act.

(4) An authorised person who contravenes rules made or described under this section shall be treated as having contravened rules made under Chapter V of Part I of this Act or, in the case of a person who is an authorised person by virtue of his membership of a recognised self-regulating organisation or recognised professional body, as having contravened the rules of that organisation or body.

(5) A person other than an authorised person who contravenes rules made or described under this section shall be guilty of an offence and liable—

(a) on conviction on indictment, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years or to a fine or both;

(b) on summary conviction, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months or to a fine not exceeding the statutory maximum or both.'.—[Mr. Gould.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Gould: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The Bill regulates the very wide area of virtually all the investment business conducted in the City. But it is, to say the least, odd and unfortunate that we are not dealing with one of the matters that has put the City into the headlines in recent weeks. I refer to the merger mania that has broken out in the City, which now involves billions of pounds and virtually all our major firms.

The Bill is basically concerned with setting up a Securities and Investments Board to provide a structure of authorisation for investment business. But partly as a result of amendments in Committee, the SIB now deals with issues well beyond the scope of authorisation. For example, it deals with unauthorised persons and the investigation of insider dealing. It is, after all, entitled the Securities and Investment Board, and is not just concerned with investments. Its role as a securities authority should incline the Minister and the House towards believing that it should accept some responsibility in the sphere of takeover bids.

That view is advanced and supported by Professor Gower in his seminal report on the whole question of City regulation and administration. It is not as though the need for such rules is unrecognised. The need for rules to regulate procedures in takeover bids was recognised by the City itself as long ago as 1968, when it felt that it was very much under pressure, and it introduced for the first time the takeover code.

It is appropriate to pay tribute to the work of the takeover code and of the panel that administers it. The question is not essentially the content of the rules but increasingly, and more pressingly, whether the voluntary arrangements underpinning those rules suffice. We face a new situation, and that is why we have this Bill. The City will now be dominated by huge, powerful new players, by new techniques in financing, and by grand takeover bids which this year already total, I believe, about £20 billion. Thus, the sums involved are massive. Yet apparently, judging from the Bill, we are not yet prepared to subject that one aspect of the City to statutory rules.

The Takeover Panel and the rules of the takeover code will no longer be sufficient to keep control of the increasingly difficult situation. The crucial question is what will happen if the clear rules of the takeover code are breached. What sanctions will follow? What will happen to those in breach? We have a recent example. Only yesterday it was reported that in the context of Dixons' bid for Woolworth, the merchant bank Rothschild was severely rapped over the knuckles by the Takeover Panel for what was described as permitting a materially deficient profit forecast in the exchange of information relevant to that takeover battle. But having rapped the bank over the knuckles, what does the Takeover Panel do?

One assumes that Rothschild is jealous of its reputation and that it will respond. One assumes that it did not welcome being rapped over the knuckles and that it will make an excuse, or will not repeat the mistake. However, what happens if those involved do not care so much about their reputation, are prepared to take such reprimands and to toss them aside, accepting them as the price for obtaining a lot of money? What would happen if Rothschild and other prominent and reputable City institutions were rapped over the knuckles so frequently because their practices were so endemic that standards fell so low that nobody took any notice of being rapped over the knuckles? We have seen that happen in the City before under a regime of voluntary and self-regulation. In a rapidly changing period when huge sums of money are involved, new techniques are being introduced and huge new players are getting in on the act, how can a voluntary code keep control?

Further evidence for that concern can be found in an article published in The Sunday Times by the financial journalist Ivan Fallon. He says:

"In bid after bid these days there is evidence that a merchant bank shamelessly uses its fund management side to support its side in the battle, sometimes getting it to add to its holding, more often persuading it to vote its shares the right way. There are so many instances of odd purchases made by a merchant bank, on behalf of clients who presumably never know how their money is being used, at key times in takeover bids that it seems to me the rules are being breached almost weekly."

I do not say that that paints an accurate picture in every respect, but it is sufficiently accurate to worry many Opposition Members, and it should worry the Minister too.

Recently, the Takeover Panel issued its own rules on Chinese walls to ensure that the practice described by that journalist does not occur during takeover bids. It is excellent that they should be published, but unlike the rules published by the SIB under the Bill the rules on Chinese walls have no effect. There is no sanction attached to them and no statutory back-up. The SIB issues its rules on Chinese walls, and, side by side, the Takeover Panel issues its rules for a similar purpose. It could hardly be argued that the rules issued by the Takeover Panel are less important than those of the SIB, as they deal with an extremely important aspect of City operations. Yet the Takeover Panel's rules lack that sanction or statutory authority.

I believe that the clear and sensible solution to the problem is to do as Professor Gower originally recommended — to bring the Takeover Panel and therefore the rules of the takeover code within the framework created by the Bill. I believe that there is considerable support in the City for this view, and the Government have indicated their willingness to contemplate the solution. I am disappointed, to say the least, that apparently the Government have thought about it and decided to do nothing. I hope that, even at this late stage, they will take the opportunity to do something about an area that is going to be increasingly difficult to control. If they do not do something, I believe that we shall be storing up a disaster for the future.

Mr. Fletcher: I am grateful to the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) for bringing this point before the House even, as he himself said in his closing remarks, at this late stage. It is unlikely that there will be any other new clauses or amendments as important as this proposal, but it would be quite wrong for the Bill to go further without the House at least expressing some views on the role of the Takeover Panel.

I should like to take this opportunity to express my appreciation—if it will not damage him too much—of the masterful way in which the hon. Member for Dagenham has handled his brief on the Bill and, indeed, on a previous occasion on the Insolvency Bill on which I had the pleasure of working with him. Having said that, I do not go all the way with the proposal that he has placed before the House, for reasons that I shall describe briefly.

It is hard to imagine that the panel can stand still while everything else in the City moves. Indeed, everything else moves with great speed. Yet it appears to be the considered view of the panel, to the best of my knowledge, that it can go on as it has done for some years, while everything else toughens up in terms of the regulation and overall practices of the City.

I agree with the hon. Member for Dagenham that the panel has worked well over the years, but it cannot continue to work with club rules while all around there is a much higher degree of professionalism and, of course, a much higher degree of competition requiring tougher and more professional regulations. These are, indeed, the criteria on which Government policy and the Bill are based.

The panel has made no case of which I am aware as to why its activities should be an exception to the general rule and policy underlying the Government's approach to the City. Although the panel may not have changed its view about its role in the new City regime, I think that important parts of the City and industry would disagree with the panel in that respect. Even in the past few months, I believe that there has been some change in the operation of many practitioners in the City. I know that the SIB has enough on its plate to keep it going for some time, as has my hon. and learned Friend the Minister.

While I am making what are probably the last remarks that I shall make on the Bill perhaps I may say that my hon. and learned Friend has done an excellent job in piloting the Bill through the House. He is not to blame for all its inadequacies. He has done a fine job. While he has been doing that, I have gone back to working for a living. I have been at the receiving end of regulatory decision-making of one kind or another, and it has been rather tough at times. I will spare the House my experiences of the last few months in this respect.

I ask my hon. and learned Friend not to leave this final stone unturned, even if I did when I was in the Department. I do not wish to see the panel in a regulatory straitjacket. I think that if the proposal of the hon. Member for Dagenham were accepted, that would be the case. I should like to see a more professional and representative body than exists in the City at present. I believe that the executive should be stronger and have more authority. The executive and the panel should be comprised not simply of City practitioners sitting in judgment on themselves—indeed, that is a remark that I have heard frequently from City practitioners—but of the users of financial services—the victims of their decisions. The users, of course, are industrial and commercial businesses and the managers of those businesses, to whom the club rules of the panel are often something of a mystery. I know how anguished and frustrated they feel about some of the decisions that are made and the time that it can take to get any action following a decision.

Again, I agree with the hon. Member for Dagenham in wondering what will happen if, as the competitive climate in the City grows, merchant banks and others—perhaps not the old guard or the sort of firms that we are used to in the City, but newcomers and big international players—are less likely to accept the club rules or the sort of ticking off that the panel gives in the hot situations that exist, particularly over mergers.

My hon. and learned Friend will be delighted to hear that I have no proposal for legislation. In fact, I have no idea how the problem might be tackled at this late stage, except to suggest—this is nothing new or original, but it is worth while—a short, sharp, independent review of the panel's role and, most important, its authority.

The panel plays a critical role in the City. I believe that it will be well worth while to re-examine this, particularly if its credibility is to be maintained as we move into this highly competitive situation in financial markets and services.

My hon. and learned Friend will recall that, at the beginning of this legislative process, he was under some pressure to include Lloyd's in the Bill. I think that he handled that extremely well and responsibly by appointing someone to examine Lloyd's in relation to legislation and the changes that the Government propose. That is naturally a bigger and more complicated task than examination of the panel. However, I believe that it would be better for the Department to hold an independent re-examination of the panel rather than to wait for a year or so, when things may have started to crumble. This is an area where a little foresight now might save a lot of trouble in a few months' time.

Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth (Stockton, South): I agree very much with what the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Fletcher) has said about the panel and the need for it not to carry on as it is and has been doing, although, like him, I believe that it has done a very good job. Times are changing. Indeed, they have already changed in recent months, and, as everybody knows, they will change ever more later this year and next year.

I do not think that the proposal in the new clause would put the Takeover Panel in a straitjacket. I am sure that the members of the SIB would not regard it as a straightjacket into which all the SROs must fit, conform and be restricted. Indeed, the system will not work if it operated in a rigid and inflexible manner. Therefore, the hon. Gentleman's conclusion is wrong. A review would only cause confusion in a situation that is already confused, and create great uncertainty. It is quite unnecessary when a solution is available such as that contained in the new clause.

I support the proposal embodied in the new clause because the future responsibilities of the panel will be considerably greater and more important than at present. With the number of takeover bids now occuring and the changed behaviour to which the panel and the Director General of Fair Trading have already referred, we have had a taste of what is likely to happen after the big bang takes place. Life will become rougher and tougher in the City, so the Takeover Panel needs to be within the net of the regulatory framework, not out on a limb, if it is to perform its critical, central function.

It is because the role of the panel is so critical that it should be contained within the new regulatory framework. In a sense, it is almost a vote of no confidence in the new framework if the panel is not contained within it. It is such an important part of the regulation of the City that to be outside the new framework would reflect badly and also confuse many people about the ability of the new regime to operate effectively. For the credibility of the new system and for the effectiveness of the future work of the panel, it must be included within the SIB's remit. It would be an anomaly were it to float free. There is great danger that there will be not only overlap and confusion but conflict between the bodies responsible for that area. Putting the panel within the ambit of the SIB would help to avoid such confusion and potential conflict.

I hope that the Minister will not close the door completely on the proposal. I hope that, even at this late stage, it is possible for him to give some hope that this very important body will be seen to be part of the new framework, that it will come under the SIB and will form part of what everyone in this House—despite our various views—hopes will be a successful system of City regulation when the big bang comes.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): I intend to be very brief. I had experience last year of abuse by one company representing Scottish and Newcastle Breweries during the battle for the takeover of Matthew Brown Breweries—a major brewer in my constituency and in Blackburn. I hope that the Minister will take on board the comments of hon. Members about the great need for some form of regulatory control, especially to cover the operations of merchant banks involved in takeover decisions in advising their clients and securing shares on their behalf.

[Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours]

6.15 pm

I wish to draw attention to the Scottish and Newcastle takeover of Matthew Brown. When the abuse took place in the stock exchange on the afternoon of 11 December, I immediately came to the House to table an early-day motion to protect the interests of my constituents. In the new environment envisaged in the new clause, I believe that the early-day motion would have led to action against the companies concerned. The motion tells the story. It states:

"That this House condemns the highly irregular activity and questionable practice of Scottish and Newcastle Breweries on the London Stock Exchange who at 3.30 p.m. on Wednesday 11th December extended their deadline for acceptances of the Scottish and Newcastle's offer for Matthew Brown's shares; recognises that by 3.30 p.m., the original deadline set by Scottish and Newcastle in their own offer document, the attempt to take over Matthew Brown had failed, with the acquisition of only 47 per cent. of Matthew Brown's shares; expresses profound concern over the fact that by subterfuge and with the use of irregularity Scottish and Newcastle secured a further 3 per cent. of Matthew Brown shares by 5 o'clock at which time they claimed control; welcomes the decision to convene the full City takeover panel on Thursday 12th December to carry out an inquiry into Scottish and Newcastle's activities; and believes that Scottish and Newcastle's predatory acquisition of Matthew Brown is to be condemned by all those who believe in fair dealing and fair play."

I returned to the House to table the motion because I was advised by certain persons that it was important to make as much noise as possible to ensure that no decisions were ducked. I secured a number of interviews in the national media, including breakfast television, to provide publicity for the case prior to the Takeover Panel examining the matter in the City at 10 o'clock the following morning.

I stayed up until 3 am. Indeed, I remember telephoning my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore) at 2 am on a matter relating to Lloyd's—and he was in bed. I was advised that it was important to make as much noise as possible to ensure that the panel dealt with the matter in a reasonable way and that no one could secure the takeover by what I described in my motion as "irregularity."

What would have happened if the new clause had, in fact, been in legislation? I understand that the merchant banks advising Scottish and Newcastle would have found themselves in difficulty. They might have been in contravention of rules, which might have led to proceedings. If that had happened, I am sure they would have advised Scottish and Newcastle, prior to the 3.30 pm deadline, not to enter into such questionable activity. That would have avoided all the difficulty and hassle that I, a number of my hon. Friends and others experienced during the night of 11 December.

I hope that the Minister will take on board my comments about that incident, and also those of my hon. Friend the Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) about other incidents. There is a great deal of public concern. People want to feel sure that the rules are being complied with in every way. The Minister, by accepting the new clause, will have the opportunity to achieve precisely that.

Mr. Howard: First, I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Fletcher) for his kind remarks during his contribution. I have paid tribute to him for his responsibility for the Bill and I am happy to join in the tribute which he paid to the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould).

The hon. Member for Dagenham referred to the Government's original attitude to the issue that is taken up by the new clause. I remind the House that the White Paper on financial services stated that the panel had been "a good example of self-regulation working in an important area of the securities market in the United Kingdom. The Government wish it to continue to do so. If practitioners and users of the securities market felt that statutory backing would be helpful, the Government would be willing to consider it."

Following the publication of the White paper, we received representations from various bodies on this issue. Some favoured a degree of statutory backing, but many were opposed to it. The panel itself, on which many City organisations are represented, argued against statutory backing, as did the Governor of the Bank of England. In the light of the advice that we received, having approached the matter with an entirely open mind, as stated in the White Paper, the Government decided not to include provisions in the Bill on the regulation of takeovers. We believed, and continue to believe—our belief appears to be shared by most hon. Members who have contributed to this short debate—that the panel is doing a good job in regulating takeovers on a non-statutory basis and that it enjoys the support of the City. We announced our decision when the Bill was published in December and we have received no representations that the decision should be reversed.

Experience indicates that the conduct of takeovers is an area which is best left, as far as possible, to self-regulation rather than statutory provision. The City code on takeovers and mergers, and its administration by the panel, compares favourably with the more legalistic approach that is adopted in the United States. There are few in the City, or in industry and commerce, who would wish to move towards the American model if we can possibly avoid it.

I would argue that all the examples which have been cited by Opposition Members during the course of their observations strengthen the Government's case rather than detract from it. They have not been able to point to any example of anyone flouting the takeover panel. There may have been instances where, in the view of the panel, the code has been breached, but in those instances the panel has so ruled and the panel's decision has been accepted. As for the example cited by the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours), I would not care to speculate on the extent to which his experience on breakfast television may have influenced the decision of the panel. The fact is that the panel came to a decision which even the hon. Gentleman recognises was the right one to make.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: What about the financial advisers? What happened to them?

Mr. Howard: The point is that no attempt has been made to flout any decision of the panel. The panel's decisions have been respected.

The hon. Member for Dagenham posed a hypothetical question and asked what might happen if a decision of the panel were to be flouted. I face that question and address it. The Bill already contains powers which could be used to support the takeover code. There are wide-ranging powers to make conduct of business rules for authorised businesses in part I, chapter V and it would be possible to require authorised businesses acting for participants in the bid to conduct themselves in ways which would support the code. Under part IV, obligations could be placed on listed companies. Clause 138 in part V enables the conduct of offers to be regulated. There would also be an indirect impact even on unauthorised offerers or offerees because clause 52 severely limits the circumstances in which investment advertisements can be issued by someone who is not authorised.

I suggest that the Takeover Panel is doing a good job and that there is every reason to suppose that it will continue to do so. I listened carefully to what was said by my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Central but I cannot go along with his argument that there is a need for a review of the sort for which he asked. I believe that there are powers in the Bill which could be used to support the code if necessary. It is on that basis that I invite the House to reject the new clause.

Mr. Gould: I am grateful to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Fletcher) for his kind personal remarks and for his support in principle of the new clause. I understand his reluctance to commit himself to the detail of it. I am grateful also to my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) and to the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth) for their support for the new clause.

I cannot welcome the Minister's response in the same terms. By relying upon the views expressed to him by practitioners and users of the takeover code, he was applying the wrong test. His obligation was to apply the test which he has adopted in other instances, that of the public interest and the proper regulation of the City. The Minister should not confine himself to those who in one respect or another have a vested interest in the situation as it exists.

I think that the Minister missed the point of the example stated by my hon. Friend the Member for Workington. We believe that one of the beneficial consequences of effective regulation is that it has a prophylactic effect and deters the breaking of rules. That is not the same as coming along ex post facto, assuming that one is lucky enough to detect what has gone wrong and who was responsible, to issue a stern warning and no more. We want a proper system of rules, proper sanctions and proper penalties so that people are deterred from breach. What worries so many of us is the vast volume of breach that is taking place, which is largely undetected and unpunished.

For all these reasons I fear that I cannot be satisfied——

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Is this not an area to which the next Labour Government will have to return with new legislation? There are clear deficiencies, and it seems that the Government have no desire to deal with them.

Mr. Gould: My hon. Friend is right. Irrespective of the colour of the next Government—I have a firm view about that which, I am glad to say, is shared by all commentators and opinion polls, which is that there will be a Labour Government—that Administration will be obliged to legislate in this area. The developments that will take place will demand nothing less. For all these reasons I feel that we must press the matter to a Division.

Clause 1

INVESTMENTS AND INVESTMENT BUSINESS

Mr. Howard: I beg to move amendment No. 2, in page 2, line 3, leave out from 'Schedule' to 'shall' in line 9 and insert

'and is not excluded by Part III of that Schedule.

(3) For the purposes of this Act a person carries on investment business in the United Kingdom if he—

(a) carries on investment business from a permanent place of business in the United Kingdom; or

(b) by way of business engages in the United Kingdom in any activity which falls within any paragraph in Part II of that Schedule and is not excluded by Part III or IIIA of that Schedule.

(4) Part I to IIIA of that Schedule'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): With this it will be convenient to take Government amendment No. 19 and the amendments thereto: (a), line 7, at end insert 'or with a person who, by reason of the number of occasions he enters into transactions of the kind in question, the consideration involved in those transactions or the circumstances in which they are entered into, may reasonably be taken to understand the risks involved'.

(b), line 10, after 'exempted person', insert 'or a person who may reasonably be taken to understand the risks involved'.

(c), line 15, leave out 'authorised person or exempted'.

(d), line 16, leave out 'the authorised'.

(e), line 16, leave out from 'person' to end of line 17.

Mr. Howard: When we discussed this subject in Committee some suggestions were made that the territorial scope of clause 1 was in some respects too broad and that there was a risk that if unamended the provisions of the Bill might drive away business from overseas which is very valuable to the balance of payments and which is not done with ordinary investors in this country. I undertook at that stage to consult and to bring forward amendments excluding from the scope of the Bill certain transactions entered into by overseas businesses. The amendments are the fruit of that consultation.

The amendments are designed to deal with two types of business. The first, which is covered by paragraph 22A of schedule 1, concerns business done here by an overseas person—that is, a person without a permanent place of investment business in the United Kingdom—with or through a qualified person. By "qualified person", I mean either an authorised person whose ordinary business involves transactions of the kind in question or an exempted person doing business in respect of which he is exempt. When the transaction is done with or through an authorised person, that person will be sufficiently expert to understand the risks involved in dealing with an overseas person who is not subject to the Bill. If he is acting for a client, it will be for the authorised person to look after his client and to have regard to his client's circumstances.

The provision allowing transactions to be effected through an exempted person would also allow overseas persons to use the facilities of a recognised investment exchange without obtaining authorisation.

The second type of business with which I was concerned was the sort of business where the overseas person made no effort to solicit business in the United Kingdom from unauthorised persons. This is the purpose of paragraph 22B. The effect of this paragraph will be to exclude from the definition of investment business certain activities undertaken by an overseas person. The exclusion will apply where the activity is engaged in either on the unsolicited initiative of a person in the United Kingdom or where the overseas person's client or customer is a person on whom he is permitted to cold-call or to whom he is permitted to send advertisements under the regulations to be made under the Bill. It is likely that these regulations will allow cold calling on and the sending of advertisements to professional and business investors and existing clients. I believe that that exclusion will meet the objectives underlying the amendments put forward by my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South.

The provisions in the amendment would, I believe, meet most of the concerns which have been expressed about undermining the protection that the Bill will afford to investors. However, I would welcome comments on the extent to which they achieve the desired effect. This is a complex matter on which our deliberations are greatly assisted by the representations that we receive from interested parties. I believe that, overall, our proposals strike about the right balance, but I am prepared to consider further adjustments of the balance if a case can be made for them.

Amendment agreed to.

Schedule 1

Investments and Investment Business

Amendments made: No. 3, in page 130, line 14, at end insert

', industrial and provident societies or credit unions'.

No. 4, in page 131, line 17, at end insert

'or in respect of two or more different investments falling within paragraph 3 above and issued by the same person.'.

No. 5, in page 131, line 19, after 'in', insert 'or securities of'.—[Mr. Howard.]

Mr. Howard: I beg to move amendment No. 6, in page 132, leave out lines 30 to 39 and insert—

(a) the benefits under the contract are payable only on death or in respect of incapacity due to injury, sickness or infirmity;

(b) no benefits are payable under the contract on a death (other than a death due to accident) unless it occurs within ten years of the date on which the life of the person in question was first insured under the contract or before that person attains a specified age not exceeding seventy years;

(c) the contract has no surrender value or the consideration consists of a single premium and the surrender value does not exceed that premium; and

(d) the contract does not make provision for its conversion or extension in a manner that would result in its ceasing to comply with paragraphs (a), (b) and (c) above.

(2) Where the provisions of a contract of insurance are such that the effecting and carrying out of the contract—

(a) constitutes both long term business within the meaning of the Insurance Companies Act 1982 and general business within the meaning of that Act; or

(b) by virtue of section 1(3) of that Act constitutes long term business notwithstanding the inclusion of subsidiary general business provisions, references in this paragraph to rights and benefits under the contract are references only to such rights and benefits as are attributable to the provisions of the contract relating to long term business.'.

The intention behind paragraph 10 of schedule 1 is to exclude from the definition of "investments" long-term insurance contracts whose sole purpose is protection against risk. However, the precise dividing line between those contracts which have an investment element and those which do not is obviously a somewhat difficult one to draw, given the complexities of the insurance market, and for that reason I was happy to acknowledge in Committee that we might not initially have got it exactly right in all respects. I promised, however, to consider the matter further, with a view to tabling appropriate amendments to the Bill on Report and I have now done that. The wording of the amendment reflects the result of extensive and wide-ranging consultations with a variety of interested parties, in an attempt to draw as accurate and as precise a dividing line as may be possible. The broad effect of the changes is to allow a slightly wider class of pure protection insurance contracts to qualify for exclusion but the exemption is still, of course, intended not to be available for any contract that would normally be regarded as an investment.

Mr. Tim Smith: On 30 January I moved in Committee an amendment that was similar to the Government amendment. I am grateful to my hon. and learned Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the consultation that the Government undertook with interested parties on this matter. Those who have commented to me on the Government amendment have said that they are satisfied with the changes that the Government have made, and they are therefore duly grateful.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Ashdown: I beg to move amendment No. 7, in page 132, line 46, at end insert—

'(11A) Real property of any type or description, except residential property, wherever situated and whether or not subject to encumbrances.'.

The purpose of the amendment is to bring investment in non-domestic property within the meaning and the terms of the Bill—property relating to office buildings, shops, factories, agricultural land, and so on. The amendment closely follows on the proposals and recommendations put to me by the National Association of Pension Funds. However, we have deliberately excluded residential property because we have no wish to draw every estate agent in the land within the ambit of the Bill.

I do not pretend for one moment that this is a perfect solution. It is a balanced one which nevertheless is useful because it goes some way, in a sensible and reasonable way, towards recognising the type of investment decisions that can be taken and their impact in relation to property, without drawing in domestic property.

The word "real" in the amendment is well understood. The National Association of Pension Funds advised us that it was normally used in the trade and its lawyers said that it was appropriate. It may well be that it is not the right term to use, in which case we shall be more than happy to accept an amendment. The principle is what is important.

6.45 pm

The pension funds have vast amounts of money invested in property. The Government have calculated that they have about £12 billion invested in property. According to the NAPF's 1984 survey, 10 per cent. of its portfolios are in that category. In the 1970s the investment in property was much higher — about 20 per cent. of portfolios. The percentage has now dropped, for reasons that we can well understand — for example, lower inflation and the recession in rental growth. That position could easily be reversed if inflation were to increase, as some say it might, if there were a rise in property prices, or if the Government simply stopped issuing index-linked bonds.

Whatever the case in the future, at present substantial proportions of the portfolios of pension funds are invested in property. Few of those funds have their own property departments. They therefore rely heavily on agents of one sort or another for management and advice on acquisition and disposal. There is potential for severe conflicts of interest between clients of the same firm and between agents and the firms and their clients. The Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors attempts, and in many cases does a good job, to regulate the market. I understand that on a number of occasions pension funds nevertheless have had to seek redress through the courts against property agents for breaches of duty under the law of agency.

I have no doubt that every vested interest will oppose the amendment, and I suppose that one can understand that. I suggest that there is no reason why, given the impact and importance of decisions in this respect, conflicts of interest here should be treated differently from conflicts of interest anywhere else. The acquisition by larger conglomerates of some of the firms involved may lead to the wholy inconsistent position in the future in which one service offered by a conglomerate is regualated and another — on property advice — is not. There could be the stupid situation in which pension fund trustees meet a number of advisers sitting around the same table — say, an adviser on United Kingdom securities, an adviser on international securities and an adviser on property — some of whom are regulated and therefore fall under the Bill's provisions, but the property adviser escapes those provisions. We wish to bring that aspect within the scope of the Bill.

The exclusion of this provision from the legislation would be more understandable if property investment had not created problems in the past, but we know that that is not so. The early 1970s were marked by what one Conservative Prime Minister referred to as the "unacceptable face of capitalism" directly, I recall, in relation to property investment.

Mr. Tim Smith: It was in relation to Lonrho.

Mr. Ashdown: I stand corrected, but it was certainly part of the same era. Without doubt, problems have been created in the past with respect to the law of agency. Without doubt, the scandal of the secondary banking crisis in the 1970s was created because of problems of property valuation.

Our purpose is to bring such investment advice within the scope of the legislation and to prevent such a thing happening in the future. If the Under-Secretary of State intends resisting the amendment, we shall want to know that he will be ready and willing to extend the Bill's scope under the powers given in, for instance, clause 2, should such problems again arise.

Mr. Howard: By the exercise of characteristically tortuous logic, the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) has passed from the identification of inaccurate reasons why I come to the decisions which I do to an identification of the vested interests which he suspects will oppose any amendment which he tables and which will accordingly doom that amendment. It is an interesting sign of the degree of accuracy with which his party approaches these matters. Any allegation may be made as long as it corresponds to a certain period, if it relates to the right era, and it does not matter whether it is inaccurate in every other respect. However, the general principle underlying the definition of investments in the Bill is that it excludes physical property which a potential purchaser can inspect and which passes under his direct control on purchase.

A person wishing to buy a building can have it surveyed and establish its physical condition, the cost of any essential repairs and the likely maintenance costs. Once he has purchased it, he will be able directly to influence at least that part of its value which relates to its structural condition. This distinguishes real property from investments as defined in the Bill, where the purchaser acquires rights, directly or indirectly, in underlying assets which he generally cannot inspect or control.

Two arguments have been advanced for including real property within the scope of the Bill. The first is that for large fund managers, such as insurance company and pension fund managers, property is an alternative store of value to investments as defined in the Bill, and that it should therefore be regulated in a similar fashion. The second is that property is frequently promoted and purchased as an "investment" in the sense of an asset which it is hoped to sell subsequently at a profit. But the problem with both these arguments is that they do not present a case for drawing the line at real property. Fund managers have other stores of value available, such as works of art. A wide range of things — for instance, stamps or limited edition porcelain plates — are promoted on the basis that they will rise in value, and are bought in that expectation, or at least that hope. It would be wholly impracticable to extend the scope of the Bill to cover all those areas.

Moreover, to include real property within the definition of investments would greatly increase, to no clear advantage, the range of businesses to which the Bill would apply. For instance, even with an exclusion for residential property, the mainstream activities of a large number of estate agents and property management agents and solicitors who undertake commercial conveyancing would be brought within the Bill's scope. What would be the benefit of doing so? To what sort of rules should they be subject? Clearly, rules drawn up to cover, for instance, the management of a portfolio of shares would be wholly inappropriate to the management of an office block as such.

I believe that what has been called the touch-and-see principle is the right one to adopt when defining investments. The provisions of the Bill are inappropriate for physical objects and real property which pass under the direct control of the purchaser. I urge the House to reject the amendment.

Mr. Ashdown: The opening of the Minister's speech, in which he sought to play the person not the argument, was rather typical of the rest of it because I was very dissatisfied with that. He failed to recognise the scale of the problem and sought to relate it to the same kind of area as, for example, advice on works of art when he knows that, by the Government's own figures, £12 billion is currently invested in pension funds in property. The scale is wholly different.

It seems that the Minister has considerably underestimated the seriousness of this problem in terms of scale, of the damage done to the probity of the City and to the economy in a previous age, and of the effect and possibility of its happening again. I found his remarks offensive in the early stages and downright complacent in the latter part of the speech. In the light of his reply, I am tempted to call a vote on this amendment. I shall not do so for one reason only. There is pressure on time and we are being asked to move things forward. I accede to that because I may want to call a vote later in the interests of the business of the House.

We have put down a marker, and in the future we shall probably have good cause to remind the Minister, or some other person who holds his position, of it so that we can say that the complacency he has shown in this matter will be called into account later.

Amendment negatived.

'PART IIIA

ADDITIONAL EXCLUSIONS FOR PERSONS WITHOUT PERMANENT PLACE OF BUSINESS IN UNITED KINGDOM

Transactions with or through authorised or exempted persons

22A.—(1) Paragraph 12 above does not apply to any transaction by a person not falling within section 1(3)(a) of this Act ("an overseas person") with or through—

(a) an authorised person whose ordinary business involves transactions of the kind in question;

(b) an exempted person acting in the course of business in respect of which he is exempt.

(2) Paragraph 13 above does not apply if the arrangements are made by an overseas person with, or the offer or agreement to make them is made by him to or with, an authorised person or an exempted person and the arrangements are with a view to the authorised person or exempted person entering into a transaction which is within the ordinary business of the authorised person or, as the case may be, a transaction in respect of which the exempted person is exempt.

Unsolicited or legitimately solicited transactions etc. with or for other persons

22B. (1) Paragraph 12 above does not apply to any transaction entered into by an overseas person as principal with, or as agent for, a person in the United Kingdom, paragraphs 13, 14 and 15 above do not apply to any offer made by an overseas person to or agreement made by him with a person in the United Kingdom and paragraph 15 above does not apply to any advice given by an overseas person to a person in the United Kingdom if the transaction, offer, agreement or advice is the result of

(a) an approach made to the overseas person by or on behalf of the person in the United Kingdom which either has not been in any way solicited by the overseas person or has been solicited by him in a way which has not contravened section 51 or 52 of this Act; or

(b) an approach made by the overseas person which has not contravened either of sections.

(2) Where the transaction is entered into by the overseas person as agent for a person in the United Kingdom, Sub-paragraph (1) above applies only if

(a) the other party is outside the United Kingdom; or

(b) the other party is in the United Kingdom and the transaction is the result of such an approach by the other party as is mentioned in sub-paragraph (1)(a) above or of such an approach as is mentioned in sub-paragraph (1)(b) above.' [Mr. Howard.]

Mr. Bruce Millan (Glasgow, Govan): I beg to move amendment No. 20, in page 135, line 23, at end insert

'22A Paragraphs 12, 13 and 15 above do not apply to anything done in connection with the purchase or sale of a business, or the assets of a business, offered for sale as a single entity.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient also to consider the following amendments: No. 21, in page 135, line 23, at end insert

'22B Paragraphs 12, 13 and 15 above do not apply to anything done by a body incorporate in relation to the internal organisation of its own funds.'.

No. 22, in page 135, line 23, at end insert

'22C Paragraphs 12 and 15 above do not apply to anything done by a company in relation to a reconstruction of its own capital, except in a case where such reconstruction involves activities falling within paragraph 13 above.'.

No. 24, in page 136, line 6 at end insert

'(3A) Advice given to a company in relation to the activities mentioned in subparagraph (3) above shall not be regarded as investment advice for the purposes of this schedule.'.

Mr. Millan: I shall make it clear immediately that these four amendments are probing amendments because I want to have some clarification about schedule 1.

The first amendment deals with the "purchase or sale of a business, or the assets of a business, offered for sale as a single entity."

I know that in Committee the Minister said that this matter is excluded from the definition of investment in the Bill. However, to me and to professional people outside it is not at all clear where or how this matter is excluded in the Bill. It seems that some clarification is required. If the Minister can point to the words or passage in the Bill which deal with that item and satisfy us that it is adequately dealt with, fair enough. However, as far as I can see it is not currently dealt with explicitly in the Bill.

The other three amendments deal with advice on corporate finance given to companies. The Minister will know that the accountancy bodies have been rather concerned about which elements of corporate finance advice are caught by the Bill and which are excluded. That is not clear at present. There is a misprint in amendment No. 21 because I have in mind a body corporate, not a "body incorporate" as is printed on the Amendment Paper. Since I am complaining about the lack of clarity elsewhere I feel that I should make that clear.

There have been discussions between the Departments and the accountancy bodies on this matter and I have seen a letter written on 19 May from the Department. However, far from clarifying the position, the letter, if anything, makes it less clear than I had understood it to be. Obviously there is a need for some clarification, and that can be done only by an amendment to the Bill. It would obviously be undesirable for the Bill to reach the statute book with some doubt as to exactly what the schedule covers. It must be in everyone's interest that that should be put right before the Bill becomes an Act.

Amendment No. 21 deals with the body corporate in relation to the internal organisation of its own funds. I am thinking specifically of whether advice in relation to that would be covered as investment advice in the schedule. I think that there would be a case for saying that it should not be covered because one is not dealing with an outside party which is being invited to invest. One is dealing with the internal organisation of the company's own funds. Of course, in itself that may involve a certain amount of investment advice on changing investments or financing arrangements and so on. I do not have a particular view as to whether that should be excluded. My amendment would say that it should be but, as I have said, it is a probing amendment. I am simply saying that we should know whether it is excluded or not. That is the important element in the amendment. There are arguments on both sides.

Amendment No. 22 deals with the capital reconstruction of a company. There are different circumstances, whether it is a capital reconstruction which involves further investment from outside and further calls on shareholders, or whether it is capital reconstruction which does not involve that. Again, it is not covered exclusively in the schedule to the Bill and it is not clear to many professional people whether that is covered or not. In some circumstances investment advice in relation to capital reconstruction should be covered by the Bill, and in others it should not. I do not want to be dogmatic about where the dividing line should be, if, indeed, there should be a dividing line at all. Accountants and other people involved in professional advice must know whether a particular activity is covered by the Bill.

Amendment No. 24 deals with what is already an exclusion in the Bill. Schedule 1 paragraph 23(3) relates to the issue by a company of its shares, which is not regarded as falling within the schedule. That does not make clear the position of advice in relation to the issue by a company of its shares. That is not mentioned specifically in the schedule. It may be that, although the issue by a company of its shares is excluded, advice in relation to that is not excluded. Again, there are arguments on both sides about whether the matter should be included or excluded. My point is that there must be clarity so that professional advisers know exactly how they are placed in relation to the legislation.

I have chosen only three examples of matters involving advice on corporate finance. Many other matters may arise which are not dealt with clearly in the Bill. The way in which schedule 1 is drafted makes it extraordinarily difficult to table amendments which one can be reasonably confident will have the effect that one intends. I tabled the three amendments in order to ask the Minister for clarification or at least an undertaking that the matter will be reconsidered in the other place. Then we can be reasonably confident that when the Bill reaches the statute book we have it right, and those who will be involved will know what their responsibilities are.

Mr. Tim Smith: I support the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan). His amendment No. 20 has the same object as my amendment No. 1, which was not selected for debate. The White Paper stated clearly:

"'Investments' will be defined to exclude . . . business, or the assets of a business, offered for sale as a single entity".

It would be helpful to hear what progress my hon. and learned Friend the Minister has been able to make towards incorporating such a provision in the Bill.

I know of the letter to which the right hon. Gentleman referred because I have seen a copy of it. It was intended to be helpful and to be a clarification, but it illustrated the complexities of the problem of corporate financial advice. That has been highlighted further by the fact that the Association of Corporate Treasurers has now written to many hon. Members saying that it has recently been suggested that its activities may be covered by the Bill. We are a long way from the original object of the Bill if it covers corporate treasury work, and I understand that the advice of the Department is that it does. Within a group there may be a subsidiary company with a minority holding, so I can see how that may be the case. If that is so, we are a long way from the original object of protecting domestic investors. Anything that can be done to clarify the Bill's ambit as precisely as possible before it becomes law cannot be other than the best possible course of action.

Mr. Howard: I shall do my best to respond to the entirely reasonable requests of the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan) and my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) for further clarification of the points that they raised. I shall endeavour to provide a degree of further clarification or, failing that, to say how we propose to set about the task of providing further clarification.

I can offer the right hon. Gentleman some reassurance on two points regarding amendment No. 20. First, the sale of the assets of a business will not normally constitute an investment activity, so a person whose business it was to arrange the transfer of assets, such as plant and machinery, from one proprietor to another would not be caught by the Bill. Secondly, the Bill would not catch a privately arranged sale by shareholders of their shares to a new proprietor or proprietors. However, the Bill as drafted would catch someone who advises on such transactions by way of business or is a transfer agent whose business is to arrange sales of the shares of small companies with few shareholders — often members of the same family — to new proprietors.

We are sympathetic to the idea of excluding such activities from the scope of the Bill, but the difficulty comes when one starts to try to define the transactions to be excluded. It would, for instance, be possible to provide an exclusion when a transfer agent advises on or arranges the sale by one person of the entire issued share capital of a company, or virtually the entire capital because there must always be two shareholders in a limited company, to another person. But that would be of limited use. Frequently, there will be more than one person on one or other side of the transaction, and the transaction may not involve all the shares, either because those wanting to sell do not own all the shares or because they want to retain an interest in the company, which they may, after all, have founded.

If one tries to accommodate such transactions a number of other questions quickly arise. Should there be a limit on the number of people involved on each side of the transaction, and if so, what should it be? Should it be a requirement that the people on one side were connected to each other in some way, and if so, how? What should be the minimum proportion of shares that would have to be transferred for the exclusion to apply? I hope that the whole House will agree that these are not easy questions to answer.

Obviously, there is no point in providing an exclusion if it is so limited as to be of no value to advisers and transfer agents. Equally, we must avoid opening up unacceptable loopholes. The references in the right hon. Gentleman's amendments to the sale of a "business" are not apt to the sale of shares in a business, and the amendment does not answer the important questions I have mentioned. But we have certainly not ruled out amendments to deal with the point, and I would welcome any suggestions as to how they might be framed so as to achieve a satisfactory balance between two objectives that conflict to some extent. If a satisfactory definition can be found, the Government would certainly be prepared to bring forward amendments in another place.

The remaining amendments deal with the position under the Bill of corporate treasurers and advisers on corporate finance. It might be helpful if I deal with them separately.

In addition to what has been said today, I have received some representations about the impact of the Bill on corporate treasurers. I accept that the present exclusion in schedule 1 for own-account dealings may not deal adequately with the problem of transactions undertaken by a company with or for another company in the same group. There may also be problems when a corporate treasurer deals with professional and business investors overseas. I propose to consider what needs to be done to deal with these problems, and the Government will bring forward amendments in another place.

The term "corporate finance" is broad and rather vague. It includes activities which are clearly within, and ought to be within, the definition of investment business, as well as activities which are outside that definition and others which fall close to the borderline. It may be possible to exclude from the definition certain restricted categories of corporate finance advice, such as the particular activity identified in amendment No. 24 of advising a company on the issue of its shares. I would be very willing to consider any other proposals which might help to clarify the boundary of investment business without opening up unacceptable loopholes. But I should repeat that some of the activities of the larger corporate finance advisers are clearly within the scope of the Bill, and I would not be prepared to exclude them completely.

Mr. Millan: The Minister has just told us that this is a difficult problem and that he does not have the answers to some of my points.

Mr. Howard: Yet.

Mr. Millan: I am not entirely confident from his speech whether he ever will have the answers to these particular problems. I am sure that the professional bodies outside will want to read his speech carefully. It is clear that some amendments to the schedule will be required, and it is unsatisfactory for the House that we do not have them at this stage. Obviously, it is not possible to judge what the amendments are likely to be and whether they will be acceptable because we shall not have an opportunity to see them.

Mr. Gould: Does my right hon. Friend share my surprise that, given that the Bill had its genesis some time ago and was foreshadowed by a substantial report, we still have not had answers to these important questions?

Mr. Millan: It is surprising because one would have thought that these questions would have had to be answered before the Bill was drafted beyond its preliminary stage. The Bill should explain what it covers, what an investment is and what is investment advice. Everything else in the Bill depends on such definitions.

This is the core of the Bill. Although these amendments may appear to be technical, we are dealing with the definition of matters upon which the whole Bill hangs. The professional bodies, will, as I have said, wish to consider what the Minister has said and I hope that there will be further discussions. I admit that these problems are difficult and I am in no way minimising the difficulties of producing the correct definitions.

I accept the Minister's point that we do not wish to have exclusions in the schedule which would allow loopholes. I would certainly support that. I have made the point, and the Minister accepted this, that there must be further amendments. I hope that the discussions which will no doubt take place, will eventually produce a reasonably satisfactory and comprehensive solution. In the meantime, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

REQUIREMENTS FOR RECOGNITION OF SELF-REGULATING ORGANISATION

Amendments made: No. 32, in page 137, line 32, after 'agency', insert 'a transferee body'.

Mr. Howard: I beg to move amendment No. 33, in page 137, line 42, at end insert

'(2) The arrangements shall not be regarded as satisfying the requirements of this paragraph unless the persons responsible for those matters include a sufficient number of persons who are independent of the organisation and its members.'

As I said when this paragraph was discussed in Committee, I entirely accept the need for effective independent representation on governing bodies of recognised self-regulating organisations so as to ensure that proper account is taken of the interests of users and of the general public. The Bill is intended to ensure such representation. It was suggested in Committee that the requirement ought to be spelt out more explicitly in the Bill, and I undertook to consider that. The amendment reflects that consideration, and I commend it to the House.

Mr. Gould: The Opposition recognise that the element of independence is spelt out in the amendment. That is desirable and welcome. However, we must register our slight disappointment at the use of the word "sufficient". It seems to be a meaningless word in the context, and we would have preferred a word such as "substantial" or "significant", which might have made more sense to the judges if ever they were required to decide upon the matter.

Mr. Ashdown: To reinforce the point, I recall during the Committee debating the matter at some length with the Minister. We finally extracted from him, with the pain of extracting an elephant's tooth, in relation to the SIB the words a "significant proportion". Why can the SIB have a "significant proportion" whereas for the SRO it is reduced to a "sufficient proportion"? Will the Minister tell us what the difference is in numerical terms between "significant" and "sufficient"? What does "sufficient" mean? "Sufficient" is a weak and almost meaningless word for a very important matter.

Mr. Howard: It would defeat the object of the terms used in these clauses if they were capable of being reduced to a specific arithmetical quantity in the way suggested by the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown). I have introduced the amendment in its present terms to accord the maximum flexibility while meeting the objective which was common to both sides in the Standing Committee.

(2) The Secretary of State may make regulations requiring a recognised organisation to furnish him at such times or in respect of such periods as are specified in the regulations with such information relating to the organisation or its members as is so specified.

(3) The notices and information required to be given or furnished under the foregoing provisions of this section shall be such as the Secretary of State may reasonably require for the exercise of his functions under this Act.

(4) Regulations under the foregoing provisions of this section may require information to be given in a specified form and to be verified in a specified manner.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient also to consider Government amendments Nos. 40, 41, 61, 62, 126, 160, 191 and 192.

Mr. Howard: These are largely technical amendments. Self-regulating organisations will need to provide a wide variety of information to the Secretary of State or designated agency. Clause 14 and other provisions specify some of this information in great detail by leaving other elements to be prescribed in regulations.

On reflection, we feel that it would be preferable to have a genuine regulation-making power under the Bill so that the requirements can be more easily adapted to changing circumstances. We have also concluded that the Secretary of State or designated agency might need recognised investment exchanges and clearing houses to notify information other than that specified in subsections (1) and (2) of clause 39. Amendment No. 61 therefore gives a similar regulation-making power to that given in the case of self-regulating organisations.

Clause 26

GRANT AND REFUSAL OF AUTHORISATION

7.15 pm

Mr. Ashdown: I beg to move amendment No. 50, in page 16, line 5, at beginning insert

'Subject to subsection (2A) below,'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to consider amendment 51, in page 16, line 10, at end insert

'(2A) The Secretary of State may refuse the application if he considers that it is unnecessary having regard to the existence of one or more self-regulating organisations which are concerned with investment business of a kind with which the applicant is concerned and which have been or are likely to be recognised under section 10 above.'.

Mr. Ashdown: The purpose of amendments Nos. 50 and 51 is to give a reserve power to refuse direct registration should the Secretary of State wish to do that.

Many hon. Members will recognise—this point arose in Committee and it has been a subject for discussion elsewhere—that there is a danger of too much direct registration with the SIB. If that were to happen, the SIB would be swamped and its effectiveness would be undermined. It might even be possible for a group of would-be members of any SRO deliberately to undermine that SRO by seeking direct registration with the SIB. The amendment copes with that by allowing the Secretary of State the powers to refuse direct registration or to delegate those powers in the case of an existing SRO.

As the Bill stands, it is possible for members of an SRO who found the rules too onerous or too rigidly enforced or who found the fees too high to remove themselves from the SRO and either apply to another SRO or to seek direct registration with an SIB. That could destroy the SRO concerned. It would also negate the whole principle of self-regulation because people would be able to apply to the superior body for direct registration and so undermine the effectiveness of the SRO.

That is the basis of amendment No. 50 and that is the danger which the amendment addresses. The power that we seek is sensible and is essentially a reserve power.

Mr. Tim Smith: Is the SIB seeking this power?

Mr. Ashdown: I am not aware whether the SIB is seeking this power. However, that is a rational judgment. The dangers that I have outlined which may confront us in future make a case for the power. I know that other hon. Members will agree with that.

Mr. Nelson: I have a measure of sympathy for the intent behind the amendment, as I made clear in Committee. I fear that the regime may be thwarted by people who, for a variety of reasons, apply to the designated agency instead of the SRO. The latter is the desirable course and maintains the integrity of the system of regime supervision as foreseen in the White Paper.

My hon. and learned Friend the Minister, in Committee, appeared to state that the cost and rules of either the Secretary of State or the SIB as designated agency might be so onerous as to provide a substantial disincentive for anyone to seek authorisation by that route. That needs repetition on Report. That is the major point of resistance to the amendments.

I am worried that people may treat an application for SIB authorisation as a court of appeal against refusal by an SRO to grant an authorisation. In some circumstances, many operators in the market may feel that the higher cost of attaining authorisation from the SIB is well worth while because they do not have to be subject to the day-to-day monitoring which certain SROs will and should impose. Those who seek protection under the framework as designated should be given sufficient reassurance to allow the amendments to be dropped, or my hon. Friend the Minister should later accept something along these lines.

Mr. Gould: This is a matter which we also argued in Committee. We have some sympathy with the amendment, for the reasons that have already been given.

There is a danger that the Securities and Investments Board's structure will be rendered unworkable because individuals, who are perhaps professional people, whose professional bodies do not seek recognition are obliged to seek authorisation or because some of the very large institutions decide that it is the simpler means of getting authorisation, preferring it to joining three or four SROs. I remain of the view that it would be worth while as a precautionary measure to have a reserve power such as this.

I suspect that the Minister, having heard these arguments before, will not be persuaded by hearing them again. I nevertheless hope that he will recognise the danger and that he does not live to regret overlooking this opportunity.

Mr. Howard: The hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) says that, having failed to be persuaded by these arguments in Committee, it is unlikely that I shall be persuaded by them this evening. He is correct.

I am sure that most businesses will choose to become authorised through membership of an SRO. These bodies form the cornerstone of practitioner-based regulation. They will be close to the market place and best placed to adapt the requirements for investor protection into rules which are relevant and practical for the investment activity with which they are concerned. Their familiarity with the needs of the investment businesses that they regulate will help them to devise effective monitoring and enforcement arrangements which do not impose unnecessary burdens on the businesses.

I am confident that most businesses will regard SRO authorisation as the most practicable route for them. In addition, it may well be found that the cost of direct authorisation is higher than that chargeable for SRO membership and that control by an inevitably remoter body will be less efficient for a business.

Why should a power of the sort described in the amendment be contemplated to back up the attractions of SRO membership? I believe that any coercion over the route by which a business may choose to become authorised is inappropriate. SROs will be private bodies, exercising powers over their membership by the contractual agreement between them. If powers are taken which could in effect be used to direct individual businesses to apply to join SROs, the status of those bodies cannot help but be changed. I do not believe that they should be forced to consider and, if fit and proper, to admit to membership applicants who do not want to become members.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Does not the Minister understand that the amendment proposes only a reserve power? It is not imposing anything. Can he not see it in those terms?

Mr. Howard: I am suggesting that the exercise of that power would be inappropriate. If one takes the view that the exercise of such a power would be inappropriate—I am setting out the reasons—there is no call even for a reserve power. The conflict to which I have referred would inevitably be a cause for friction, and the success of self-regulation depends on voluntary acceptance of the spirit as well as the letter of the rules. An unwilling member is unlikely to have that sort of attitude.

Equally, the business may feel that an SRO is not the right body to regulate its activities, that its charges are excessive or that its rule book or methods present problems for the business's activities. Why should the agency be able to upset the business's commercial judgment and force it to apply to an SRO?

I realise that there is concern among some conglomerates that they may have to join several SROs for various aspects of their business and that this will be costly and bureaucratic. The proposals from the SIB for the creation of a lead regulator which would be responsible for handling overall financial surveillance should be adequate to minimise duplication of effort and over-bureaucracy. Even conglomerates should find SRO membership a convenient route for authorisation.

I do not believe that large numbers of businesses will want to seek direct authorisation, but even if they did I do not agree that they would swamp the agency or that the system could not work, although the agency would have to take on more staff to consider applications and to monitor businesses thereafter. By building up its resources, and with practitioners on the board and staff, the agency would be able to cope. I hope and expect that most businesses will join SROs, but if they do not the system that we are proposing is flexible enough to deal with them. The amendment would remove the right of a business to choose how to get its authorisation. We should preserve that freedom of choice, and I invite the House to reject the amendment.

Mr. Ashdown: I must again express some sadness at the Minister's reply. He said, rather revealingly, that the arguments that had been put to him had not persuaded him to change his mind. We know that no powerful bodies are behind the arguments and that they must stand by themselves.

I am grateful to the hon. Member for Chichester (Mr. Nelson) for his properly qualified support and to the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) for his support. The hon. Member for Dagenham said—the Minister admitted it—that conglomerates might be required to register with three or four SROs. That will put cost burdens on them. The direct registration procedure might prove less expensive and less bureaucratically onerous.

The Minister said that he believed that most businesses would regard SROs as their appropriate route for authorisation. I agree. I envisage most businesses taking that route. As the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) said, we are suggesting a reserve power. Firms might well choose a different route.

The Minister has set his face against the amendment. He ended with a curious statement—he said that we would remove a right and force businesses. That is not what we intend. We are suggesting a reserve power for use in exceptional circumstances. By rejecting the amendment, the Minister has left open the possibility of a chain of events which may cause him to change his mind.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. Howard: I beg to move amendment No. 52, in page 16, line 15, leave out 'exempt' and insert 'appointed'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it may be convenient to consider Government amendments Nos. 64 to 68, 70, 71, 76, 84 to 86, 162 to 164, 193 and 262.

Mr. Howard: In reply to a similar amendment which was proposed in Committee by my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith), I accepted that the phrase "exempt representative" might not be the best one to use in relation to the people covered by clause 41 in so far as it tended to suggest that they were not to be subject to the Bill's provisions at all. This is not, of course, the case. Since the conduct of an exempt representative is treated under clause 41 as the conduct of his principal for the purposes mentioned in the clause, the exempt representative would have to comply with whatever provisions of the Bill or rules and regulations made under it as would have applied to his principal. The only exemption is from the requirement separately to become authorised.

Nevertheless, I am aware that the phrase has tended to give rise to an understandable misconception regarding the precise status of the persons covered by clause 41, and I accordingly undertook in Committee to consider an alternative expression that might convey a rather clearer indication of that status. The phrase "appointed representative" was proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield and is, I believe, the one that best achieves that objective.

Clause 30

AUTHORISATION IN OTHER MEMBER STATE

Mr. Howard: I beg to move amendment No. 53, in page 19, line 13, after 'question', insert '(a)'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it may be convenient to consider Government amendments Nos. 54 to 56 and 170.

7.30 pm

Mr. Howard: The purpose of these amendments is to remove some of the uncertainty about the circumstances in which the provisions of the clause conferring authorisation on certain member state nationals have effect.

I should recall at the outset that clause 30 reflects an existing right under the EEC treaty. The central principle is that a national of any member state is allowed under the treaty to provide services in any member state without being made subject to restrictions which cannot be justified on the basis of certain principles. The ones which are relevant are that the requirements must be objectively necessary and proportionate to the ends to be achieved and that requirements must not duplicate requirements in the member state of establishment which provide substantially the same safeguards. In other words, the law must take account of the safeguards afforded by other member states. That is why clause 30 confers authorisation on persons authorised in other member states whose authorisation procedures provide safeguards equivalent to those provided under the Bill.

The application of this last principle means that the clause must apply whenever, as a matter of fact, there is equivalence between the regimes in question — a matter which can ultimately be decided only by the courts. However, I accept that such a provision could give rise to unwelcome uncertainty, and the purpose of these amendments is to reduce this uncertainty.

The first area of uncertainty concerns harmonised regimes such as exist in the case of life insurance. The whole purpose of harmonised regimes is to allow the products in question to be sold throughout the Community, regardless of their member state of origin. The purpose of the new subsection (3)(d) is to make it clear that the authorisation conferred by the clause applies to a person who is authorised in another member state under a harmonised regime. By virtue of the new subsection (5), to take advantage of this authorisation a person must possess a certificate issued by his home authorities confirming that the relevant provisions of the law in that state conform to the relevant harmonisation directive.

The second leg of the main amendment provides for the Secretary of State to issue a certificate to the effect that the provisions of the law of another member state satisfy the equivalence criterion. The existence of such a certificate would be conclusive proof that the equivalence criterion was satisfied and that a person authorised under the relevant provisions was authorised in the United Kingdom. The power to issue such a certificate would not be transferable to the designated agency. In view of the international implications of the exercise of the power I think that it should be reserved to the Secretary of State.

The amendments would not remove all the uncertainty about clause 30. For the reasons I have explained, the absence of a certificate issued by the Secretary of State could not be conclusive proof that the equivalence requirement was not satisfied. A person authorised under some other provisions might still be authorised under clause 30 to carry on investment business in the United Kingdom. This possibility must be kept open if we are to comply with our Community obligations. However, I believe that the amendments would have the effect of clarifying considerably the application of clause 30.

Because of this remaining uncertainty, and to meet some of the concern expressed in Committee, we have provided that the notice required under clause 31 must be given at least seven days before a person authorised by virtue of clause 30 begins to carry on investment business in the United Kingdom. This will allow the Secretary of State or designated agency time to consider the notice and to seek an injunction restraining the person from carrying on investment business if he or it believes that the person is not in fact authorised under clause 30, or to use the intervention powers if the notice suggests that the person is intending to carry on investment activities not covered by his home state authorisation and it would not be in the interests of investors to allow him to do so.

Mr. Gould: We welcome these amendments, but the Minister will recall that one of the matters arising under clause 30 which concerned the Committee was that the clause appeared, at least on our reading, to be wider in effect than was actually required by our EEC treaty obligations. The Minister will recall that we were exercised by the example of a person authorised to act as an insurance broker in Greece who is thereby authorised to act for all investment business purposes in this country. Will the Minister confirm that he has studied that question but has decided to do nothing about it?

Mr. Howard: After I studied that question, I came to the conclusion that it was not appropriate to take action, for the reasons I expressed when the matter was debated in Committee.

Clause 40

LLOYD'S

Mr. Gould: I beg to move amendment No. 63, in page 25, line 28, leave out clause 40.

In Committee we had a thorough debate on whether Lloyd's should be within the Bill. I have no intention of rehearsing fully all the arguments which were expressed on that occasion. It is important that the House, the City and the public should have an opportunity to hear the issue ventilated once more so that it may be judged on its merits. For that reason, we tabled our amendment and we are delighted it has been selected.

The fundamental point is that Lloyd's is deliberately excluded from the Bill. The Bill regulates investment business. As such business is carried out at Lloyd's, by normal principles it should therefore be within the Bill. Clause 40 makes a specific exclusion in favour of Lloyd's and that is the starting point of the argument. In my view, the onus should be on those who drafted the measure rather than on those who have argued that, based on the general principle, Lloyd's should be within the Bill.

At first sight, most people would be surprised that Lloyd's has been singled out for this special treatment. If one asks the public or those in the City which institution cried out most for regulation, I am sure the answer would be Lloyd's. Lloyd's has been the source of outrageous scandals and has caused much public concern. Lloyd's is the epitome of self-regulation, and therefore the epitome of what can go wrong. On the face of it, Lloyd's is an odd candidate for special treatment.

Other institutions — the stock exchange or the Eurobond market — which could legitimately state that they have a clean record and have done well over recent years, could ask why they are being picked upon. Such protestations are rejected, and I believe that is correct. But it is curious that Lloyd's, which cannot assert such a good record — it has a spotty and blemished record — should receive special treatment.

One of the arguments advanced in favour of this special treatment is that Lloyd's is already regulated as an insurance business by the Department of Trade and Industry. Almost every other institution covered by the Finance Bill is regulated by some other agency. That is true of the friendly societies, the building societies, the insurance companies and the professionals.

It is argued that Lloyd's is covered by the Lloyd's Act 1982 and that is why it is excluded from the Bill. The 1982 Act was simply an assertion of self-regulation. We have now decided that self-regulation, especially in the light of all that has happened in the City since 1982, is no longer enough. It does not produce acceptable results and cannot be relied upon. Why is self-regulation allowed to stand for Lloyd's when it is clear that it is inadequate?

It is also argued that because Lloyd's, since the beginning of 1983, has put its house in order, it should not be criticised for defalcations and other offences which were committed before that date. We were able to detail many aspects of Lloyd's record since 1983 which led us to have little confidence in the view that Lloyd's had learnt anything about the dangers of self-regulation.

I do not propose to dwell on those matters, because most hon. Members will be familiar with them. However, there is the whole question of Lloyd's failure to regulate in the case of the PCW syndicate and its attitude to those of its members who suffered substantial losses in consequence of the fraud and theft and the trading pattern which ensued due to those frauds and thefts. Lloyd's has frustrated and obstructed its members and investors from pursuing legitimate remedies.

Mr. John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West): We touched on this yesterday, but I would like to stress again that I have no personal interest in Lloyd's. The hon. Gentleman is again making assertions for which there seem to be no firm foundations. I understand that Lloyd's has made proposals to deal with the fraud element in the PCW syndicate. The subject of the dispute between Lloyd's and some of its names concerns the subsequent management of the syndicate and whether that management was prudent or rash – underwriting risky business – thereby creating further losses for those names. That is quite different, and the hon. Gentleman is surely misleading the House when he suggests that Lloyd's was responsible for both aspects.

Mr. Gould: It may be that the hon. Gentleman's almost unique position – a Conservative Back Bencher with no links with Lloyd's – has led him to be more than credulous in these matters. What he has described is a device used by Lloyd's to escape its responsibilities. It is true that Lloyd's has attempted to draw a line after 1982. It has argued that all that happened before that date was theft and fraud, but that all that happened after that was due to ordinary trading losses. The fact is that those trading losses were incurred because the crooks chose to underwrite business with no regard for the long-term consequencies. All they were interested in doing was maximising the short-term premium income so that they could cover their tracks and give themselves time to get away – and that is what happened. The PCW names have been pursuing their claim and have met nothing but obstruction from Lloyd's.

Mr. Butterfill rose—

Mr. Gould: I shall not give way again because we had a substantial debate on this in Committee.

I remind the House of a matter of immediate and central significance. Lloyd's, in its preparedness to frustrate a decent and honourable solution of the PCW affair, went to the length of deliberately misleading the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Fletcher) when he was a Minister at the Department of Trade and Industry, to the extent that he was induced to come to the House and tell us a deliberate – not on his part – lie. I say that advisedly. He was given facts and figures that must have been known by those who gave them to him to be false and were subsequently demonstrated to be false.

For those who are looking puzzled, I remind the House that the statement made by the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central concerned a number of those who were alleged to have passed the solvency test among those who were names in the PCW syndicate. That does not build confidence in the reliability and honour of Lloyd's or in its sense of responsibility, or show that it has learnt any lessons as a consequence of its unfortunate experience.

I could go on. I could refer to the argument with the Inland Revenue, which had to insist that a whole series of activities by Lloyd's members were designed specifically to avoid tax and could not be tolerated. I could point to the circumstances and reasons for the resignation of the then chief executive, appointed by the Governor of the Bank of England to clean up Lloyd's. In other words, there are many signs that, after 1983, Lloyd's is still not to be trusted to look after its own affairs.

The one remaining argument and explanation as to why Lloyd's should be excluded from the Bill, contrary to all the general principles that have been laid down, is the one that the Under-Secretary who will reply to the debate advanced in Committee: the admittedly unusual feature that investors in Lloyd's – its members or names – are a section of the investing public whose interests are, in some senses, in direct conflict with those of another section of the public – the policyholders. While accepting that in any conflict between the interests of the investors and those of policyholders, it must be the latter that prevail to do it justice, that has always been Lloyd's policy, quite rightly – it cannot be argued that the price of meeting and protecting the interests of policyholders is necessary that investors at Lloyd's must have their affairs dealt with at a standard lower than and different from that accepted and recognised as appropriate throughout every other part of the City. I cannot believe that that argument would be seriously supported or advanced by the members of Lloyd's Council or Lloyd's.

True to my undertaking that I would not rehearse at length the arguments that I put in Committee, I hope that I have conveyed enough to suggest that we still believe – if anything, our belief is strengthened by these events – that it is an outrage, a scandal and a dereliction of duty that Lloyd's should be excluded from the Bill. Lloyd's remains the last bastion of private privilege in the City – the last private fiefdom. Unless it is brought within the Bill, it will be impossible to take the Bill seriously.

Mr. Nicholas Baker (Dorset, North): I have not had the privilege of hearing the arguments rehearsed in Committee by the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould), but he has been extremely selective in the points that he, admittedly briefly, has put for why Lloyd's should be included in the Bill. The major point that he keeps reiterating is that members of Lloyd's are investors, and that, as I know very well because I declare my interest as a member, is exactly what members of Lloyd's are not. Investors are people who deposit a sum of money and usually get someone else to deal with their money on their behalf, hoping that their investment will increase in that way. Members of Lloyd's are not like that. They are actively engaged in trading, and the fact that some of them take rather less interest in monitoring their trade and ask fewer questions than they should have done, is well known. However, it does not alter the fact that, for tax and in reality, they are traders and not investors.

7.45 pm

Mr. Gould: I intervene to save the hon. Gentleman further embarrassment. If he will take the trouble to read the speech made by the Under-Secretary in Committee, he will see the clearest possible, and extremely helpful, exposition of the three respects in which the business undertaken at Lloyd's by Lloyd's underwriters and by the Lloyd's Council is investment business within the definition of the Bill.

[Mr. Gould]

Mr. Baker: I am answering the point as to whether members of Lloyd's are investors, and they are not. My hon. Friend has a certain view, but the purpose of the Bill is to protect investors. That was the title of the papers by Professor Gower that originally were the background for the Bill.

Mr. Ashdown: If the hon. Gentleman will not accept the opinion of the Under-Secretary on this matter, perhaps he will be prepared to comment on the remarks of his hon. Friend the Member for Wiltshire, North (Mr. Needham) who complained vigorously in the papers because he was clearly informed that this was a safe investment. Is it not odd that the hon. Member should be out of kilter not only with the Minister but with one of his hon. Friends?

Mr. Baker: If my hon. Friend said that, he was wrong. I am talking about what an investor is. He is someone who in principle is not doing what a member of Lloyd's is doing.

Those who joined as members of Lloyd's, as I did, post 1982, had every reason for concern about the risks that they took, which are completely different to those taken by investors. They have had the confidence to join because of the provisions of the 1982 Act. I have not heard the hon. Member for Dagenham present any case to the House, although he may have done so in Committee, to show in which respects the powers given to the Lloyd's Council by the 1982 Act are deficient, or how the exercise of those powers has been deficient. He has quoted a number of incidents, most of which do not relate to whether the 1982 Act was sufficient for the governance of Lloyd's.

I took confidence. I have another interest to declare because I was one of the promoters of the 1982 Bill. I had at that stage no interest in Lloyd's, but I felt that, in helping to promote the Bill, I was doing something that would give a new framework for the governance of Lloyd's, and that is what we have. In doing that, we had the support of the Committee chaired expertly and successfully by the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher). He did an extremely good job to see that the rules that Lloyd's would have to apply were tightly defined.

The Lloyds Act 1982 does not offer protection that is any less than members of Lloyd's or the public would derive if Lloyd's were within the ambit of the Bill. If that later turns out to be the case, there will be other opportunities to legislate. There is a good argument for allowing the 1982 Lloyd's Act to do what it was intended to do and to govern in a self-regulating manner those who work in and are members of Lloyd's. It would be wrong and inappropriate for Lloyd's to be brought within the ambit of the Bill.

Mr. Ashdown: It is with some chagrin and no great enthusiasm that I have to tell the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) that while I share his deep anxiety about the way in which Lloyd's is run, and have listened to him putting his impressive case both eloquently and powerfully in Committee and in this debate, I shall not join him tonight in the Lobby.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Who is under pressure from the large institutions now?

Mr. Ashdown: The hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) talks about big city institutions. I shall happily give way to him if he would like to name one big city institution that would be prepared to put any kind of pressure on me. I shall be delighted to hear of it and perhaps I shall be knocking on its door tomorrow.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will tell us if my accusation is correct. Is it not true that a number of very senior people in the Liberal party are members of Lloyd's? Would he like me to give their names?

Mr. Ashdown: I can assure the hon. Member for Workington that if that is the case I do not know either the number or the names. As I recall, the hon. Member who is the adviser to the Leader of the Opposition is also a member of Lloyd's. I cannot remember his name but I believe that the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) knows perfectly well who I am talking about and no doubt Government Members know as well. If the hon. Member for Workington is unaware of the name he ought to make himself aware of it fairly fast before he casts aspersions on others. As far as I know, not one of my hon. Friends is in that position.

The reason I say, with some lack of enthusiasm, that I will not be able to go through the Lobbies with the hon. Member for Dagenham and his right hon. and hon. Friends is not akin to the rather tortuous and theological reasons put forward by the hon. Member for Dorset, North (Mr. Baker) or indeed for the equally tortuous and theological reasons that will be put forward by the Minister if his reply is anything like last time. My reason is quite simply that I do not believe an appropriate way to deal with the problems of Lloyd's is by bringing Lloyd's within the scope of the Bill.

I do not differ in a single word from the hon. Member for Dagenham in the way that he outlined those problems and their impact on the probity of the whole City. I differ from his opinion on the matter because we would be better advised to deal with the problem that he has so carefully outlined by directly amending the Lloyds Act 1982. That would be better than to bring Lloyd's within the ambit of the Bill.

Having said that, it is incumbent on me to say how I wish to see that done. We all know that the Neill inquiry is currently sitting, and I moved an amendment in Committee which sought to give a sort of year's grace until we saw what Neill recommended. The answers that the Neill inquiry should provide are not about whether to do something but about what needs to be done. I have no doubt that something needs to be done, and if the Neill inquiry were to say that nothing should be done, it may well be that it would be right to vote with the hon. Member for Dagenham, because to do nothing about that problem will give rise to considerable difficulties.

I wish to see the problems of Lloyd's resolved through five separate forms of change in policy and that could be done under the Lloyd's Act 1982. We need to tackle directly the reinsurance system and we will have to introduce some system of licensing for reinsurance. There needs to be closer monitoring of the agencies, and that monitoring should include the power of spot checks. There also needs to be closer monitoring of the funds, especially the personal reserve funds; so that those can be not just checked on 31 December but audited on an efficient basis throughout the year. We need to tackle the problem of conflict of interests, recognising that in the PCW scandal the underwriter not only wrote the reinsurances but managed the company that employed them.

Mr. McCrindle: If the hon. Gentleman sees as one of the solutions to what he poses as the Lloyd's dilemma as the licensing of reinsurers, what steps would he take to license those many reinsurers who are outside these shores?

Mr. Ashdown: The hon. Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. McCrindle) has asked a fair question. I did not go into that kind of detail because I did not think it was appropriate. However, he asked the question and I shall give him a reply. It would not be difficult for those people in reputable companies in places like the United States, Canada and Australia to have reciprocal agreements which would ensure that those licences were effective. In such cases as offshore reinsurance houses which are not directly licenced there ought to be some kind of authority required to use those agencies for reinsurance. It would be proper and appropriate for auditors to report back and reassure those people who have placed money through Lloyd's in that sector that the reinsurances have been carried out correctly.

It is important to cope with the conflicts of interest that I have discussed, and vitally important that the Secretary of State should be able to appoint, and be accountable in the House for, the chief executive of Lloyd's. Those are the things that should be done, and for that reason I support the sentiment of the hon. Member for Dagenham, but bringing Lloyd's into the ambit of this Bill would create a special new dimension of problem for the SIB in its early days and create a situation which would be cumbersome and difficult to manage. Of course it would not swamp the SIB, but it would certainly inhibit the formation in the SIB of the kind of action which would be effective to control the market place. That will be difficult enough to do within the time frame anyway.

Mr. Gould: I am puzzled by the hon. Gentleman's last point. Does he not expect that we are asking the SIB to rely upon SROs which do not yet exist? Why should Lloyd's, which proclaims that it has a wonderful record of self-regulation, pose such a problem to the SIB?

Mr. Ashdown: The hon. Member for Dagenham has carried out his research carefully and well and has been deeply immersed in this subject for some time. No doubt he has spoken to Sir Kenneth Berrill on this very matter. Of course we should not accept Sir Kenneth Berrill's word as the last word on the subject, but the hon. Gentleman may know as well as I do that Sir Kenneth has said that to take on Lloyd's would overstretch the capacity of the SIB precisely because the SIB's main task is to get the other SROs off the ground within the time frame that is available. Sir Kenneth Berrill is a reasonable judge of these matters and I am impressed by his arguments.

It is not just a matter of taking over an existing SRO in the case of Lloyd's, but a matter of taking over a malfunctioning inefficient SRO that is not fulfilling its opportunities and its rules effectively. That will overstretch the resources available to the SIB. I share the description of Lloyd's given by the hon. Member for Dagenham, and I share his concern about the damage that that has created. I have to depart from him on my point about waiting for the Neill inquiry report and then properly and appropriate amending the Lloyds Act 1982. That is the better way to bring about the reforms that he and I agree are essential.

Mr. Brian Sedgemore (Hackney, South and Shoreditch): I do not intend to detain the House by rehearsing the arguments that were put forward in Committee. I can help the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) and the House by reporting the main conclusions of the Neill inquiry. First of all, I should like to say how we reached those conclusions. When this Bill was introduced into Parliament, there was the threat of a Back-Bench revolt by some Government Members and the Neill inquiry was set up to buy time and to buy them off. Sir Patrick Neill has effectively concluded his inquiry and has reported that he believes there are a number of aspects about the situation at Lloyd's that need to be cleared up. He is not sure whether or not changes will be required to the Lloyds Act 1982.

Sir Patrick has also reported that he does not believe that it would be appropriate to bring Lloyd's within the ambit of the Financial Services Bill or to bring it under the aegis of the Securities and Investments Board. Nor does he believe that it would be appropriate for any other body to be put over the existing Lloyd's machinery.

Sir Patrick was in effect asked to carry out a political task by the British establishment. He has performed that political task. He has reported to the British establishment and the British establishment is grateful. I understand that it will not be long before Sir Patrick reports the findings to the Minister who will then be able to come to the House and question me about them.

Mr. Nicholas Baker: The hon. Gentleman is obviously a member of the British establishment. Could he let me have a copy of the report?

8 pm

Mr. Sedgemore: The hon. Gentleman is one of those with whom I sympathise. He is out in the cold and in order to find out what is going on in the British establishment one literally needs contacts in the highest places. What I have just told the hon. Gentleman is the truth. I hope that the report will not be too long delayed. There are a number of hon. Members in the House who know those facts and I hope that it will not be too long before the Minister is informed. Then we can have a fuller discussion about the individual points which Sir Patrick has raised.

Mr. Baker: The Minister apparently is not part of the British establishment.

Mr. Sedgemore: That may well be right. This Minister is not part of the British establishment, as I understand it.

I realised that this was the kind of report that Sir Patrick was going to produce when I was going through the questions of one of the witnesses who was being questioned by the Neill committee. This does not contain the report, but Mr. Dennis Allport who, as everybody knows, is one of the members of the Committee, seemed to me, in asking a rather elongated question, to give expression to all the kind of worries that Labour Members have.

[Mr. Sedgemore]

I simply read out that one question that Mr. Allport asked of the witness at the hearing who gave me the papers and to whom I have spoken on a number of occasions. Mr. Allport said:

"If you set up a body, say, along the lines of the SIB to overview Lloyd's, that would involve a degree of much more stringent control. Do you not think that that might detract from some of the strengths of Lloyd's, namely its flexibility and the fact that it works? I readily accept there have been some awful scandals and real nonsenses, but they are the sort of headline grabbing stuff. During that period, though, nevertheless the balance of payments of this country has been greatly enhanced by the fact that Lloyd's exists at all. Despite all that has happened, it has a very big reputation still, and still does a very significant amount of business. If in fact you brought in over Lloyd's some regulatory agency of the type that you are mentioning, what are your views as to the extent to which that could undermine the way Lloyd's do business?"

I find that statement by Mr. Dennis Allport deeply disturbing, because he begins by saying that he does not want stringent control and that is bizarre. He goes on to draw a fantastic logical non sequitur which is that somehow if one has more stringent control by putting a body over Lloyd's, that would damage the balance of payments. That, as I put to one of the top members of the British establishment yesterday, is simply nonsense. Nobody in his right mind could make that assertion. What he is really saying is, "Yes, we have had a number of scandals and we are a bit upset about those, but let us forget all that and let's get on with the Lloyd's Act 1982."

The only other point that I want to make is simply that my hon. Friend the Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) was right. I am not worried about the Stock Exchange because I constantly contrast what I believe to be the integrity of the people who run the Stock Exchange with what is happening among those who are fairly near and at, or were at, the top of Lloyd's, and a number of them are still fairly near the top of the Lloyd's tree. It is difficult for the public and Parliament to trust them. On Second Reading I outlined some of the difficulties of trust that had occurred – I do not want to go through that again – over Sir Peter Green, a past chairman of Lloyd's, in relation to the case of Unimar. When I submitted some evidence to Sir Patrick Neill I raised that issue with him. I said that it had all been going on for seven years and that seems to be too long to find out the truth of what happened.

I was able to produce in the House papers which suggested, I put it no higher, that there was a prima facie case of serious dishonesty in this case. I picked up my Sunday Telegraph, which is not a paper that I usually read, but I am told that its news reporting is accurate – I am told that it is another establishment paper – and I saw an article by Christopher Elliott which said that the Department of Trade and Industry had completed its report on Unimar. It says here that there were serious criticisms of Sir Peter Green and senior members of Lloyd's – that is the same argument that we are adducing in this Bill – and that the report is going to the Director of Public Prosecutions.

I am happy to tell the House that a Minister at the Department of Trade and Industry, whom I thank, said, in answer to a question from me asking him to publish the report, that he will do so as soon as possible. I congratulate him on that. The Attorney-General has said that he now has that report into Minet Holdings plc and WMD underwriting agency and he is considering what goes on.

Labour Members are concerned with many other things which we have set out before. We are deeply disturbed at the kind of attitudes developed by the kind of people at the top of Lloyd's who have been running that particular part of the City. Of all the bodies which one might exclude on that one ground alone, it is extraordinary that Lloyd's should be the one that is excluded. Something must be done either about the Lloyd's Act or about changing it.

I have just been talking about Unimar and the seven-year delay. It is right to ask how one licenses the reinsurers when they are set up offshore. How would that have been done in the Bellew Parry Raven case? Those companies were set up in Bermuda by Bermudan lawyers who were the directors and shareholders. It is virtually impossible. But those companies were founded in 1970 and it is now 1986 – 16 years on. My understanding is that Lloyd's has asked its solicitors to draw up charges against the people involved. It will be another two or three years before those charges have been heard. There will be an appeal and that will take another year. The papers may go to the Director of Public Prosecutions and we shall be in the 1990s before we know anything about what went on.

What is the purpose of having a regulatory organisation when it can take 20 years before we can draw the appropriate lessons from what went on. Of course it is nonsense. Of course it is a scandal. Of course it is unsatisfactory.

Mr. Butterfill: I had not intended to speak on this issue, but I shall do so briefly simply to say that I am rather surprised at the Opposition's attitude on this. The relevant point here is that the general public should be protected by legislation. That is the purpose of the Bill. Lloyd's is impacting most upon the general public amongst those who take out insurance.

All that Labour Members have done is to say that there have been one, two, three or possibly four bad apples in Lloyd's. Of course, there are in any organisation, but the really important point that the House should consider, and the message that I hope will go out from the House if we have any concern for the standing of the City, its well-being and Britain's overseas earnings, is that no person who has taken up insurance with Lloyd's has lost any money as a result of any of the scandals. All insured persons have had their claims met in full. That is what is important for the insurance industry and for those who use the British insurance industry from overseas to understand. There is no risk to them. There have been a few bad apples, but the overriding important thing is that the public has not been prejudiced in any way.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: The hon. Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) has got it all wrong. There are 25,000 investors in Lloyd's and they are named in a book that I have in my office. Of the investors, 99·9 per cent. recurring regard themselves as investors. Apart from those who are politically motivated, the investors look to the House of Commons to provide adequate investor protection arrangements to cover their interests. That is why the Labour party, without the support of the Liberal party, has for sometime relentlessly pressed for the inclusion of Lloyd's in the financial legislation.

Mr. Butterfill: Can the hon. Gentleman name one of them? Apart from the PCW syndicate, who has asked for the legislation?

Mr. Campbell-Savours: The problem is that many Lloyd's investors speak of their affairs in confidence. I have seen correspondence to and from hon. Members expressing anxiety about arrangements in Lloyd's. I do not intend to identify the hon. Members involved. If the hon. Gentleman has done his homework, he will have seen the correspondence. There are hon. Members present tonight who have also seen that correspondence. We all know that there is anxiety among investors.

It is crucial that we take action in that area. The framework of the legislation is the way forward.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. John Butcher): I address my opening remarks to my hon. Friend the Member for Dorset, North (Mr. Baker), because I would not wish him to leave the debate with the impression that there is something between us as regards the definition of the mainstream business of Lloyd's. Of course the mainstream business of Lloyd's is insurance and the underwriting of risks. My hon. Friend may not have benefited from the advantage of participating in our long debates on Lloyd's in Committee and may not be fully aware of clause 67, which says, to paraphrase a well-known American songwriter, "It ain't what you do, it's the way that you do it."

It is the way in which Lloyd's conducts its business, not so much the product in which it trades, that can be defined as a collective investment scheme. That may be regarded as a somewhat semantic point, but it is worth emphasising because I would not wish my hon. Friend to think that Ministers suffer under some misapprehension as to the type of product in which Lloyd's trades.

It is no surprise that the amendment should have been moved. It concerns one of the major differences across the Floor of the House. As hon. Members will know, the Neill inquiry is well under way; Sir Patrick and his colleagues have been at work for some months. They have received many written submissions and are taking oral evidence. We look forward to their report.

I digress briefly to remark on the interesting and incredible observation made by the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore). He tried to tempt us to give some details of the preliminary findings of the Neill inquiry's investigations.

Mr. Sedgemore: The Minister has got it wrong.

Mr. Butcher: I can only assume that that is why the hon. Gentleman made his speech in the terms that he did.

Sir Patrick was originally asked to present his conclusions by the summer. The Neill inquiry has received a considerable volume of written material and is in the midst of taking oral evidence. It is unlikely that it will have completed taking that evidence before the middle of July. Where the hon. Gentleman gets the idea that a report is simmering away to which he has exclusive access, I do not know. Nor do my officials in the Department have any idea of the report's conclusions.

Mr. Sedgemore: I shall tell the Minister at the back of the Chair afterwards. I shall give him the person's name.

Mr. Butcher: I would be grateful to the hon. Gentleman, but he has made a career of making this sort of observation. I refer him not only to the need to make those observations in public when it is desirable, but to put evidence to the Director of Public Prosecutions, which he has not done in the past, in a manner that will help him to bring prosecutions rather than divert his energies from serious investigations to chase the hares which the hon. Gentleman starts running. To pursue the investigations may be counter-productive. I refer to a letter written to the hon. Gentleman by the fraud investigator which he chose to make public.

8.15 pm

The Neill inquiry will need time to consider the substantial body of evidence. It is essential that it has the opportunity to analyse the issues thoroughly. Because of that, the inquiry said, and we have agreed, that we should not expect its report until the autumn. As we originally announced, it will then be published.

On Second Reading and in Committee, we debated Lloyd's at length. The Government's case remains that, although we are well aware of the problems that have arisen at Lloyd's, it has, as recently as 1982, set up its new regulatory structure. It is not right to condemn that newly reformed structure now. We set up the Neill inquiry to consider whether the system set up to protect the interests of members of Lloyd's provides comparable protection to the system we shall set up under the Bill for investors in general. Until we have Sir Patrick's conclusion, it would be wrong to proceed further.

I remind the House that in December, before the Neill inquiry was set up, the Prime Minister said that we were watching events at Lloyd's closely and would not hesitate to take whatever legislative or other action was necessary. We have set up an inquiry and expressed our will to act should our consideration of the conclusions of the inquiry show that to be necessary.

Against that background, the Opposition's repeated demand to apply the Bill to Lloyd's is unjust and unwise. It is unjust because, having set up the Neill inquiry, we must allow it to do its work and not pre-empt its conclusions. Deleting clause 40 amounts to that, because it would subject underwriting agents of Lloyd's to a new and separate regime from that in the Lloyd's Act. It is unwise because, as we explained at some length in Committee, the Bill is not a suitable instrument for the protection of members of Lloyd's.

It might help the House if I briefly deployed elements of that case again. The Bill is about the protection of investors. The business of Lloyd's is complex, and the legislation governing it must have regard to two factors: first, the protection of the members of Lloyd's as investors in insurance business; but, secondly, and more importantly, the protection of the ordinary holders of Lloyd's insurance policies. The paramount public interest is to ensure that insurers meet their liabilities, and in that Lloyd's has been singularly successful.

Those two aims — investor and policyholder protection — must often conflict. A well-known example of the conflict which lies at the heart of Lloyd's is the principle of unlimited liability, or the ultimate punt as it has been called by some commentators. The unlimited liability of members of Lloyd's to meet claims is an important protection for policyholders, but it is hard to appreciate it as a measure of investor protection for the members of Lloyd's. The regulation of Lloyd's must be carefully balanced between those two antagonistic aims. Simply throwing the activities of Lloyd's into the Financial Services Bill, as the amendment proposes, will not achieve that balance. A special regime to integrate the two systems would be required to achieve that balance.

[Mr. Butcher]

We have drawn attention to the length and complexity of schedule 8, which achieves that balance with long-term insurance companies where investor protection on marketing matters covered by the Bill must be balanced with the regulation of solvency under the Insurance Companies Acts by my Department. The schedule is long and complex, but it deals with a far simpler problem, not least because in the case of long-term insurance companies the investors and policyholders whom we are trying to protect are the same people. At Lloyd's they are not.

I hope that the House will therefore wait for the report of the Neill inquiry before reaching any conclusions. I appreciate that the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch will probably say that he wrote half of it. I hope that the House will also accept that this Bill is not the appropriate vehicle for regulating Lloyd's, and I advise hon. Members to reject the amendment.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Before any Division, will you enlighten the House about the position of those hon. Members who are members of Lloyd's and who wish to vote?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): I remind the House of a ruling given by Mr. Speaker on this very point at an earlier stage, namely, that this is a matter of public policy, and every hon. Member is entitled to exercise his vote.

Mr. Gould: I shall be brief. The Minister is to be congratulated in that his argument that we must wait for the Neill report before addressing the question whether Lloyd's should come within the terms of the Bill is a magnificent example of back to front reasoning. The one point on which I agreed with him was that this remains an issue that divides the two sides of the House. I regret that we shall not have the support of the Liberals in the Lobby, but we shall give effect to the divide that separates us on this issue by pressing the amendment to a Division.

Question put, That the amendment be made:

No. 68, in page 26, line 27, leave out 'exempt' and insert 'appointed'. [Mr. Howard]

8.30 pm

Mr. Nelson: I beg to move amendment No. 69, in page 26, line 29, at end insert

'(5A) The regulations made for the purpose of this section shall make provision to require exempt representatives to inform any person whom they procure to enter into an investment agreement that the cost or premiums payable under each individual agreement will be the same whether that agreement be entered into through the exempt representative or any authorised person.'

The amendment seeks to extend the disclosure requirements on company representatives of insurance and life assurance agreements. In so doing, it seeks to extend the principle of equivalence, about which much has been said in Committee and prior to the introduction of the Bill.

Clause 41, which deals with exempt representatives, was the subject of a good deal of debate in Committee. It was in that debate that a number of Members, particularly Conservative Members, drew attention to their continuing concern about product bias and company bias and in particular the large number of representations that they had received from many independent intermediaries as well as others involved in the sale of life assurance agreements involving investment about the prejudicial impact of the clause and the other arrangements that were being made to try to ensure more adequate standards of disclosure.

As a result of acceptance by my hon. and learned Friend of some of the disquiet felt, he played, I believe, an important and instrumental part in urging MIBOC to come forward with a document on how it saw the arrangements for the supervision and the status of the various people who would be involved in these activities.

The document was published in April and, despite some misgivings of practitioners and commentators, has received a broad degree of support for what was proposed. This applies in particular to its conclusion that should be a polarisation imposed regarding the activities of company representatives and independent intermediaries by which the traditional role and activities of the tied agent who might represent a number of different companies would be ended. There would be only two sorts of practitioner in the market and, potentially, knocking on Aunt Agatha's door — the company representative and the independent intermediary.

It was also proposed in the document that disclosure provisions on commission should attach to the categories of salesmen and representatives. They would be required to say that the commission they would be receiving fell within a commissions agreement that it was hoped — it still is hoped — to establish between the various life companies operating in this sphere with company representatives. They would have to declare the actual commission in comparison with the commissions agreement; that is, if it were more than the commissions agreement, they would have to state the amount of commission that they were receiving and compare it with the amount of commission under the commissions agreement if it had been established.

In making these proposals, MIBOC drew attention, I think rightly, to the fundamental difference in status between a company representative and an independent intermediary. The latter is unambiguously a representative of the company, owes no allegiance to anyone other than the company and is overtly out to sell its investment products and life insurance products while the independent intermediary by his very nature is an agent of the investing member of the public and is in a quite different position from the company representative. Many of the disclosure provisions and other requirements placed upon these two categories flow from that fundamental difference. I think that this is well put in the document and is widely accepted.

The document proposals have gone quite a long way to alleviate some of the deeply felt fears of independent intermediaries about the extent to which they would be placed in a prejudicial position in the market place, in particular by having to declare a commission, whereas those who were company representatives would have no similar requirement placed upon them. It is exceedingly difficult for a member of the public who has never before been subject of any such approaches or sales tactics to know that there is any difference in status of the people who knock at their door trying to sell them exactly the same investment product. However, it is important to establish this difference for the purposes of supervision and proper regulation of the market.

It was feared by independent intermediaries that the requirement on them to declare their commission without a similar requirement on company representatives would be a serious negative sales factor and might deter many people from placing their investment for life assurance through independent intermediaries because it will be felt that a better deal will be done by going to the company direct or dealing through an employee or company representative of the life assurance company concerned.

Concern was also expressed by independent intermediaries and many Members of Parliament prior to Committee consideration of the Bill about the principle of equivalence. This principle should be cherished, and we should be careful not to introduce into the market place different requirements on categories of people selling exactly the same product.

Since the publication of the MIBOC document, there have been expressions of concern as to whether there will be a commissions agreement at all. It is feared that insufficent agreement will be reached among the principal companies involved; that, if there is an agreement, many people will fall outside it, or that it will not be written into the rules of the SRO or insisted upon by the SIB so that to all intents and purposes there will be no commissions agreement.

If that is so, one of the fundamental points behind the MIBOC proposals falls away, and we are left again with a prejudicial position for independent intermediaries in the market place. They will still be required to disclose their commission whereas the company representatives, in the absence of a commissions agreement, will have to declare the commission, but in their case it will be a very small amount. The remuneration that they receive may be a variety of other benefits — salary, bonus or a cheap mortgage that they receive from their company. Therefore, the commission that they have to declare will be very small. Yet that position will be quite unrepresentative for members of the investing public because the cost to them of entering into the agreement, whether through the company representative or an independent intermediary, will be exactly the same.

Like other hon. Members, I have received a great deal of representation from those affected, both during the Committee stage and subsequently. There might be a case for an amendment along the lines of that which I have tabled, which seeks to place a duty on exempt representatives to notify investors that the cost of entering into an investment agreement, by way of premium or cost involved, will be exactly the same whether they do it through a company representative, direct with the company concerned or through an independent intermediary.

The advantage of the amendment is that it extends the principle of equivalence, it does not blemish the integrity of MIBOC proposals and, last but not least, it is even more important if no commissions agreement is established. If the amendment were accepted, I hope that it would not be read by the companies as an alternative to a commissions agreement — the amendment is an addition to that. Basically, under the present proposals an independent intermediary must declare his commission, while a company representative does not have to do so, but say only that it falls within certain minimum standards agreed in the industry. Under the amendment, he would have to say that the commission that he received fell within that standard, but must point out to the public that from whomever they buy their investment agreement, it will cost them exactly the same. Therefore, all practitioners in the market will be obliged to point out to the public that while they are rightly declaring the commission, it will not be cheaper to buy that investment agreement through anyone else. By having a statutory or some other firm duty placed upon them so to declare, we will substantially overcome the negative sales factor about which many independent intermediaries still complain, despite the production of this document.

I hope that my hon. and learned Friend the Minister will favourably consider my amendment. I ask him to say to what extent he considers the commissions agreement, according to latest information, to be likely or unlikely, and to what extent he feels, even if he is unable to accede in law to the amendment — I claim no rectitude of drafting — there may be other means of achieving the same purpose. The purpose can surely be unobjectionable as it will seek in large measure to rectify a wrong and a grievance that are still felt by many people who offer members of the public an important service that should not be prejudiced in the way that I fear it otherwise will be.

Sir Peter Blaker (Blackpool, South): I have no financial interest in the amendment, but my son is a finance broker and I am grateful to him for stimulating me into taking an interest in this important matter. I entirely support my hon. Friend the Member for Chichester (Mr. Nelson). I wish to make one or two supplementary points.

I welcome the proposal for polarisation in the latest MIBOC document — it is a useful step forward. However, I believe that those proposals, or whatever arrangements may be made, could go further in the directions of consumer protection and fair competition. My hon. Friend has described the proposals as they differentiate between independent intermediaries and company representatives on the matter of disclosure. I believe that they are not fair as between those two groups.

I have had the benefit of discussions with MIBOC, to which I pay tribute as it has been extremely helpful in clarifying for me the position. It has confirmed that there is still a great deal of anguish among the independent intermediaries. Even if a commissions agreement is made — I endorse wht my hon. Friend said about the importance of that — as things now stand I do not believe that the present proposals will be satisfactory.

8.45 pm

I believe that equivalence can be achieved on the lines of the principle contained in the amendment, even if its exact wording may not be precisely right. What objections can be made to our proposal? A distinction is made between independent intermediaries and company representatives in respect of the law of agency. I accept that their positions are different, but that is beside the point — it need not prevent us from ensuring that better information is provided to the consumer and that there is a fairer system of competition between the two parts of the industry.

The second objection to complete equivalence between the two parts of the industry is contained in paragraph 77 of the latest MIBOC document. That shows that there are practical considerations that make that difficult. Very often the commission earned by the company representative is on an entirely different basis from that earned by the independent intermediary. That is a valid point.

My hon. Friend and I are trying to bypass that problem. We are focusing not on commission earned but on charges, costs or premiums. Those charges, costs or premiums are the same to the client whatever channel may be used to make the contract.

I have three letters from leading life companies on that point. One is from Allied Dunbar, which states:

"I confirm that none of the charges under our policies are geared to the introducing source."

Another, from Royal Life Insurance, states:

"the charges levied on my Unit Linked products are defined at the outset and are irrespective of the source of the introduction to the company be it on independent intermediary, a company sales person or a direct enquiry."

This is true also of with-profits policies. Another letter from Legal and General (Unit Assurance) Limited is on similar lines. We have the opportunity to obtain real equivalence by taking advantage of that fact.

I wish to say a little more about the question of a commissions agreement. When my hon. and learned Friend replies I hope that he will tell us what he feels are the prospects for obtaining such an agreement. MIBOC says that I cannot assume that there will be such an agreement. Many of those who were concerned about the matter during the Bill's Committee stage assumed that there was certain to be such an agreement.

One reason why we cannot be sure that there will be an agreement is that it will depend not on the independent intermediaries, who will be directly affected by whether or not there is an agreement, but on the decision of the life companies. furthermore, MIBOC says that it would feel it essential, if there is to be an agreement, that it should be supported by the vast majority of the life companies. But their interests may not be the same as those of the independent intermediaries. Incidentally, they will be members of different SROs so there will not be a common membership.

In recent years there has been a trend towards more and more direct sales, and it is quite legitimate for the life companies to aim for that. However, we would be wrong to create an artificial disadvantage for the independent intermediaries. That is really what is presently proposed. I am all in favour of fair competition, and so are the independent intermediaries with whom I have discussed the matter, but I believe that it would be wrong to have an artificial bias against the independent intermediaries.

The chairman of the MIBOC is the chairman of one of the principal life companies which concentrates on direct sales. He has had a distinguished and successful career and I make no criticism of him. I merely say that it will be unfortunate, bearing that in mind, if there is seen to be a lack of equivalence and a bias against independent intermediaries. It is important in that context that there should be real equivalence. Justice must be done and it must be seen by everyone concerned, including independent intermediaries, to be done.

We have raised two problems which it is important should be resolved. We have the question whether there will be a commissions agreement and there must be real equivalence between the two sides of the industry. When my hon. and learned Friend the Minister replies, I hope that he will give us some reassurance about the probability of there being an agreement. I hope also that he will be able to give us an undertaking that he will do what he can to ensure that there is proper equivalence either in the Bill itself, or by the use of the powers which are available to him under the Bill.

Mr. McCrindle: I shall take a very few minutes of the time of the House to add my voice to those of my hon. Friend the Member for Chichester (Mr. Nelson) and my right hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, South (Sir P. Blaker) in support of the amendments.

During the rather lengthy passage of the Bill through the House, much time has rightly been spent on investor protection. A good deal of attention has been paid also to creating a fair and competitive atmosphere within which different agencies and different types of person will have an equal opportunity of selling to the public. This approach to equivalence is justified and the amendment turns our attention yet again to this subject.

There is a good deal of confusion in the public mind, and probably in the minds of a number of Members, about commission and how it is paid. For example, there is an assumption that it must be cheaper to purchase product A direct from the company which produces it rather than by buying the same product through an independent intermediary. The aim of the amendment is to make it a requirement that it is communicated to the prospective purchaser that that is not so. It is the gross premium which is important, because that is what the purchaser of the policy will pay irrespective of the agency through which he purchases it, and in all instances it will be precisely the same. To require that some statement to that effect be made comes a great deal closer to the equivalence of which I have spoken.

Not surprisingly, there may be a tendency among insurance company representatives who are attempting to sell their products by approaching the public direct to imply, or even sometimes to state out of ignorance, that the price of the product is not always the same. I do not think that those representatives should be able to take advantage of being able to make statements of that sort. If the amendment were to be added to the Bill, they would be unable to do so.

A good deal of time was spent in Committee discussing disclosure, and I think that the Committee was wise to spend its time in that way. I have always been mildly sceptical about the use to which information on the commissions payable on a policy would be made, or could be made, by the prospective purchaser of a policy. Nevertheless, that element of disclosure is being required, and I accept that.

This is an appropriate juncture to ask, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, South has done, about the present status of the proposed industry agreement on commissions. The House will recall that the idea is that, if such an agreement can be reached and if an independent intermediary is not receiving more than the commission laid down within the agreement, specific disclosure will not be required. The assumption that there is something inevitable about the commission's agreement must be heavily discounted. The House will remember the register of life assurance commissions. That was a voluntary effort and the result was something on broadly the same lines as that which we are discussing when we talk about an industry agreement.

ROLAC was brought to life, but it limped for a long time. Even when it saw the light of day, many companies refused to become members of it. Let us assume that there are 150 companies on the British market. If no more than 30 of them were to come together to form a commissions agreement, does my hon. and learned Friend think that that would be acceptable? Is there a minimum level below which he would consider it would not be worth referring to such an agreement as an industry agreement? If it is impossible for the appropriate SRO to bring together a sufficient number of companies to create an agreement, could the SIB step in and require the SRO to take further steps, or could it take steps itself to create a commission's agreement?

We must contemplate the possibility that ultimately there will be no agreement and no possibility of reaching one. In the circumstances, we are entitled to know tonight, as we come close to the end of the consideration of the Bill in this place, just what would happen in the circumstances that I have outlined. Would we revert to no obligatory disclosure, which is the present position, or would there be, through some clause or subsection which I have overlooked, an automatic requirement for full disclosure, which is not the compromise that the MIBOC presented? It was wise of my hon. Friend the Member for Chichester to move the amendment and I hope that it will be added to the Bill. If that is not possible for some reason, I hope that my hon. and learned Friend the Minister will address himself to some of the important considerations to which I have referred.

Mr. Howard: My right hon. and hon. Friends have done the House a service in giving us the opportunity to discuss the important issue of the regulation of insurance intermediaries under the Bill. I hope that they will not press the amendment to a Division because, as I shall explain, it suffers from a number of defects. Nonetheless, I hope that I can offer them some comfort on the substance of it.

I am grateful to my right hon. and hon. Friends for the welcome which they gave to the MIBOC document. I take this opportunity of paying tribute to the MIBOC for responding so effectively and so quickly to the request which I made of it in Committee. I made that request at a time when it was anticipated that Report and Third Reading might take place at a rather earlier stage than they have. The MIBOC responded most energetically to my request and I am happy to have this opportunity of paying tribute to it.

Mr. Gould: As I do not propose to make any substantive contribution to the debate, I wish to associate the Opposition with the tribute which the Minister has paid to the MIBOC.

Mr. Howard: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman.

I shall explain briefly some of the problems with the amendment. Clause 41 is a general clause, the main point of which is to put appointed representatives — that is, essentially self-employed persons working for an authorised business under a contract for services — in the same position as employees of an authorised business. We expect that the majority of people who will become appointed representatives will be insurance and unit trust salesmen, but it is a clause of general application and representatives will be appointed outside the area of insurance.

If one considers that point one can see a real problem with the amendment. There may be all sorts of investment agreements that those appointed representatives may lead their customer into, and the cost or premiums payable could be very different if the same agreements were sold by authorised businesses. I am sure that the House would not want to require appointed representatives to make an untrue statement. There may indeed be no way in which the appointed representative could know what cost or premiums were payable under investment agreements offered by authorised businesses.

Apart from being in one sense too general for its purpose, the amendment is in another sense too specific. It relates only to appointed representatives. It would have no implications for salesmen employed directly by insurance companies. Yet I am sure that my right hon. and hon. Friends would agree that if there is merit in the proposal they are making, it should apply, to use MIBOC's jargon, to all company representatives, whether employed or self-employed. Depending on the particular wording of the statement to be made, there might even be a case for requiring independent intermediaries to make an equivalent statement.

Turning to the substance of the amendment, the issue of the rules to regulate insurance intermediaries, whether independent or company representatives, raises some difficult questions and has aroused a good deal of comment from interested parties. I expect that we shall have a fuller discussion on those questions when we come to the Government amendments to schedule 6, nos. 176 and 177, which were prompted by the useful discussion we had in Committee on the subject. However, let me make it clear that I consider it important that the different rules which are applied to the different functions of insurance broking and representing an insurance company do not in practice give one or the other an unfair competitive advantage in the market place. That was the basic point that underlines the observations made by my right hon. and hon. Friends.

It has been suggested that that could happen because company representatives might suggest that they do not receive commission and might imply that the customer thereby gets a better deal by acting through them. A representative who did this would, I suggest, have to be very careful not to commit a breach of the conduct of business rules, or even a criminal offence, by misleading the consumer.

My right hon. and hon. Friends have made an interesting proposal on the sort of statement company representatives should make. It is a proposal which I shall want to reflect on further and doubtless MIBOC shall want to do so also. As the comments I made earlier on the amendment suggest, this is a difficult area on which to draw up rules. As I understand it, although premiums of on policies are now generally the same whether policies are bought through company representatives or independent intermediaries — that point was made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, South (Sir P. Blaker) — there is no guarantee that this is always the case or that it will continue to be so.

One would have to consider what sort of statement might be made when the premiums paid differed depending on the particular sales outlet. One would also want to consider whether companies might seek to get round a rule of this sort by changing the premiums they charged to favour their preferred sales outlet. In the case of companies which specialised either in selling through independent intermediaries or company representatives, a comparison might be drawn up which could be misleading to the consumer. On the other hand, it is Government policy to leave companies' pricing policies to market forces and for them not to be Government controlled.

At first sight, the ideas of my right hon. and hon. Friends seem interesting, and I shall want to have them pursued. MIBOC is at the moment drawing up conduct of business rules on which it will be consulting. I shall ask it to consider whether there is a case for a rule to meet the concerns of hon. Members. May I stress that detailed rules of this sort are for the board to make. We in this House are unlikely to arrive at formulae in which practitioners will be unable to find loopholes.

My right hon. and hon. Friends raised the likelihood of a commissions agreement. My right hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, South asked what the chances were of a voluntary commissions agreement for independent intermediaries. In the White Paper on financial services, the Government clearly envisaged that, subject to the competition regime, there could be such an agreement, with disclosure by reference to it. Since then, MIBOC has considered the issue and has concluded that disclosure that commission is within a voluntary industry agreement is of more use to the investor than full disclosure, since under the latter the investor would not have a clear idea whether his agent was receiving more commission on a particular policy than was generally the case on competing policies.

We expect that the SRO for insurance companies and unit trusts will include a commissions agreement as a part of its rules, although members of the SRO would be free not to abide by the agreement. For those who did, disclosure would be by reference to it, and for those who did not full disclosure would be made. The Life Assurance and Unit Trust Regulatory Organisation (LAUTRO) which as hon. Members may know is seeking to become the self-regulating organisation in this area, has plans for such a system. In this it has the support of the majority of the life offices, which have already come together in the Registry of Life Assurance Commissions, with a view to establishing a voluntary commissions agreement.

Companies representing about 80 per cent. of the market have given their support to ROLAC. Apart from their concern for the impact of excessive competition in commissions on the impartiality of intermediaries' advice, they are also, of course, concerned by its impact on their finances. That concern would be shared by all insurance companies. We have grounds to expect that there will be a considerable incentive for those companies to enter into the type of agreement desired by all my right hon. and hon. Friends who have spoken. I hope that the totality of the matters to which I have referred will give a good deal of comfort to my colleagues. In those circumstances, I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Chichester (Mr. Nelson) is prepared to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. Nelson: I am obliged to my hon. and learned Friend the Under-Secretary of State for his important and helpful response. I was especially pleased that he emphasised at the beginning of his remarks the importance that he attaches, as do many of us, to the principle of equivalence. If he attaches importance to that principle and holds it paramount, as he appeared to do, I hope that, by inviting the MIBOC to consider this matter again, a way can be found to redress what some of us perceive to be a continuing problem.

My hon. Friend the Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. McCrindle) asked what will happen if there is no agreement. That question was not fully answered. If there is no commissions agreement, the basis of the polarisation proposal falls away. If there is no commissions agreement, there is no basis on which company representatives have to make a meaningful declaration. The principle is therefore substantially undermined.

Although I share the hope that there are sufficient incentives and time to reach such an agreement, we must bear in mind that it may not be reached, or it may not be reached adequately. In either event, there are urgent and compelling reasons for the MIBOC to consider writing into its rules and proposals a provision along the lines of the amendment. I take it that the endorsement in principle, rather than in drafting, that my hon. and learned Friend has given to the amendment will be taken fully into account. I have no doubt that we shall return to the matter in the later stages of the Bill. Many of us will keep a watching brief on that aspect.

I think that we have been given sufficient reassurances to allow me to withdraw the amendment. My hon. and learned Friend has responded fully and helpfully to the initiative. Therefore, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendments made: No. 70, in page 26, line 30, leave out 'exempt' and insert 'appointed'.

No. 71, in page 26, line 37, leave out 'exempt' and insert 'appointed'. [Mr. Butcher.]

Clause 42

MISCELLANEOUS EXEMPTIONS

Amendments made: No. 72, in page 27, line 7, at end insert

'(cc) the Accountant of Court when acting in the exercise of his functions in connection with the consignation or deposite of sums of money;'.

No. 73, in page 27, line 17, at end insert

'(gg) a sheriff clerk when acting in the exercise of his functions in connection with the consignation or deposit of sums of money;' [Mr. Butcher.]

Mr. Tim Smith: I beg to move amendment No. 74, in page 27, line 32, at end insert

'(kk) a person acting as an authorised insolvency practitioner within the meaning of section 3 or section 5 of the Insolvency Act 1985;'.

The amendment would add to the list of various people referred to in clause 42. The White Paper said that the functions of insolvency practitioners would be a type of activity that did not require authorisation to be obtained. It said that insolvency practitioners were "often obliged . . . to dispose of investments included among the assets under their control. They will be required to be licensed under the Insolvency Bill now before Parliament."

That is now the Insolvency Act 1985. The implication was that the legislation would regulate the activities of insolvency practitioners.

I raised this matter in Standing Committee with my hon. and learned Friend the Under-Secretary of State. He said that the matter was still being considered. What progress has been made in formulating an exception which could be introduced by the Government?

Mr. Butcher: I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) for raising this issue. I shall take this opportunity to explain some of the complexities of the points he has raised.

There are two main situations we need to consider. First, there is the position of an insolvency practitioner who is acting as liquidator or administrator for a company which is not an investment business but which may have to dispose of assets which include investments. In such a case the liquidator or administrator is in the same position as the former directors. Therefore, he would be covered by the exemptions for selling investments as a principal and would not normally need to be authorised.

Secondly, there is the position of an insolvency practitioner who is concerned with the winding up of an authorised investment business. That is a much more complicated issue and I am still considering the implications for the Bill of the various provisions of the Insolvency Act 1985 and the numerous problems which will arise if an authorised business has to be wound up. The position of insolvency practitioners has to be considered in this context. If the investment business is a company and the regulator decides to allow its authorisation to continue in order to be able to continue to use its intervention powers to protect investors, once again the liquidator or administrator will be in much the same position as the former directors and, like them, will not be required to be personally authorised.

If the business concerned is a partnership or sole trader, the position is more complicated. If investment business is to be continued — for example, to complete outstanding commitments — is it right to exclude the insolvency practitioner concerned from the authorisation requirement? Such a practitioner may have no relevant experience. We need to consider those points further and will, if necessary, table amendments in another place.

With those comments, I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield will feel that it would be timely to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. Tim Smith: This is the first time we have had a full explanation of the difficulties. It is helpful and it will be read with interest by those outside. On that basis, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 44

MISLEADING STATEMENTS AND PRACTICES

Amendment made: No. 75, in page 28, line 27, at end insert—

'(2A) In proceedings brought against any person for an offence under subsection (2) above it shall be a defence for him to prove that he reasonably believed that his act or conduct would not create an impression that was false or misleading as to the matters mentioned in that subsection.'.—[Mr. Howard]

Clause 45

CONDUCT OF BUSINESS RULES

Amendment made: No. 76, in page 29, line 32, leave out 'exempt' and insert 'appointed'.—[Mr. Howard.]

Clause 47

CANCELLATION RULES

Amendment proposed: No. 77, in page 31, line 25, after '(2)', insert

'Without prejudice to the generality of subsection (1) above,'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker With this it will be convenient to consider Government amendment No. 78.

Mr. Cash: I have had a communication from the Committee of London and Scottish Bankers with regard to the proposals contained in these amendments, with particular respect to the question of clients' money. Clause 50 provides for the Secretary of State to make regulations with regard to clients' money. It is a matter upon which the committee has written to the Minister in the past and I would particularly like to hear what he has to say because the banks feel that they will be placed in an invidious position if clause 50 is enacted without amendment.

The banks' difficulties arise from the uncertain state of the law in relation to the operation of trust accounts, including clients' accounts. I believe that there are many complicated legal matters which arise in that context, which I do not think it would be helpful to go into. I believe that at this stage the Minister is in full possession of the facts and, if he is not, I am sure that during the course of the proceedings in another place this matter could be looked into and a suitable opportunity taken to put things right.

The banks are seriously concerned that the bank holding the clients' account in an authorised firm could be held liable if the firm does not conduct the account in accordance with the rules, and losses result to its clients.

The banks seek statutory protection on the same lines as they already enjoy in respect of solicitors' clients' accounts. I understand that, although a letter has been written to the Department in respect of this matter, the Department has not yet replied. The indications are that the answer will be in the negative. I understand that if the Department does not produce a satisfactory outcome to this question, it is highly probable — indeed certain — that the committee will press the matter vigorously in another place.

Mr. Howard: I have heard with great interest what my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) has said on this matter. The representations to which he referred are being carefully considered. That is why no reply has yet been forthcoming from the Department to those who made the representations. Clearly, if the Department is persuaded by those representations, we shall introduce an amendment in another place. I understand the import of my hon. Friend's remarks to be that if we do not, others will, and we must look forward to the outcome of any debate in the other place with interest and expectation.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 50

CLIENTS' MONEY

Amendments made: No. 78, in page 34, line 1 leave out

'Regulations under this section may in particular'

and insert

'Without prejudice to the generality of subsection (1) above, regulations under this section may'.

No. 79, in page 34, line 17, leave out 'and interest thereon'.

No. 83, in page 34, line 27, leave out from 'retention' to end of line 28 and insert

', to such extent and in such cases as may be specified in regulations, of so much of clients' money as represents interest.'.—[Mr. Howard.]

9.15 pm

Mr. Tim Smith: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I rose to speak when you called amendment No. 79.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am extremely sorry, but I did not notice the hon. Gentleman. If he stood up, I apologise to him. We have now moved on to amendment No. 80, which is in his name.

Mr. Smith: I beg to move amendment No. 80, in page 34, line 18, leave out 'audited by an auditor' and insert 'examined by an accountant'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take the following amendments: No. 81, in page 34, line 20, leave out 'auditor' and insert 'accountant'.

No. 82, in page 34, line 23, after 'whether', insert 'in his opinion'.

Mr. Smith: I was a little concerned about the cavalier way in which the Government dealt with amendment No. 79, because it reversed an amendment made in Committee following a Division in which I was supported by my hon. Friend the Member for Chicester (Mr. Nelson). As the majority of the Committee wanted three words included in the Bill and as amendment No. 79 deletes them, some explanation would have been welcome. It is not worth making a great fuss about this, but a little explanation would have been pleasant.

I do not want to say much on amendment No. 80, because the Minister was very helpful on this matter in Committee. He said that he was sympathic to the three points contained in the three amendments. I hope that his sympathy may be converted into acceptance of them.

Mr. Cash: The word "accountant" is an expression which does not necessarily refer to a chartered accountant. I have already made that point and I do not want to labour it, but at this stage it is important to put it on the record again.

Mr. Howard: I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) will forgive me if I do not repeat the reply which I gave to the point which he raised earlier.

Regarding the first point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith), amendments Nos. 79 and 83, to which he referred, sought to incorporate into clause 50 more satisfactorily the amendment passed in Committee. We have always intended that Clause 50 should allow regulations to be made concerning interest on clients' money. That would include requiring accounts and records in respect of that interest to be kept. We accept that there is room for clarification and that has been done in two ways.

Firstly, as part of the general tidying up of rule-making powers in part V, we have made it clear that the list of powers in subsection (2) is without prejudice to the generality of subsection (1). Secondly, the new formulation of subsection (2)(f) makes it clear that the phrase "clients' money" embraces interest. Generally, regulations under clause 50 will, therefore, clearly be capable of being made in respect of interest. In view of this approach the amendment to subsection (2)(d) is unnecessary. That is why amendment No. 79 removes the change made in Committee at my hon. Friend's behest.

My hon. Friend is correct, regarding amendments Nos. 80, 81 and 82, in reminding the House that I expressed my sympathy for his argument in Committee and I am happy to——

Mr. Cash: Does my hon. and learned Friend take the point that the words "in his opinion" which are contained in those amendments would be going over the top in almost any circumstances? We could not have a matter of such importance being determined as a matter of law by the "opinion". I am sure that my hon. and learned Friend understands what the wording "in his opinion" means, and that he would find it unacceptable.

Mr. Howard: I hope that my hon. Friend is referring to the amendments that we have excised from the Bill and not to the amendments to which I have referred and which the Government are prepared to accept. If that is the case, and I believe that it is, I confirm that I am happy to accept the amendments.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 81, in page 34, line 20, leave out 'auditor' and insert 'accountant'.

No. 82, in page 34, line 23, after 'whether', insert 'in his opinion'.

No. 83, in page 34, line 27, leave out from 'retention' to end of line 28 and insert

Clause 81

INVESTIGATIONS

Amendment proposed: No. 144, in page 59, line 26, after 'operator', insert 'or trustee'. [Mr. Howard.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it may be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 145 to 148.

Mr. Cash: I have one question in regard to legal privilege in proceedings in the High Court. I notice that clause 81(5) may require a lawyer to furnish the name and address of his client. I do not wish to make a great deal of this but it raises matters which may prove to be worth pursuing in another place. My hon. and learned Friend the Minister will be familiar with the problems that arise. I understand, however, that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State is to reply. He is nevertheless a friend. I should be grateful if he could examine this matter in due course and perhaps drop me a note about it. It raises matters concerning the disclosure of information about clients.

Mr. Butcher: I am the only non-lawyer spokesman on the Front Benches. I shall look into my hon. Friend's anxiety and write to him. In the aftermath of that correspondence, we will no doubt be able to decide whether we should take further action in another place.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 145, in page 59, line 29, leave out from 'operator' to end of line 31 and insert 'or trustee of, any other collective investment scheme,'.

No. 146, in page 59, line 38, after second 'of', insert— ', or of the manager, trustee or operator of,'.

No. 147, in page 59, line 42, leave out

'Section 433(2) and sections 434 to 437 of the Companies Act 1985'

and insert—

'Sections 434 to 436 of the Companies Act 1985 (production of documents and evidence to inspectors)'.

No. 148, in page 60, line 10, at end insert—

'(5) A person shall not under this section be required to disclose any information or produce any document which he would be entitled to refuse to disclose or produce on grounds of legal professional privilege in proceedings in the High Court or on grounds of confidentiality as between client and professional legal adviser in proceedings in the Court of Session except that a lawyer may be required to furnish the name and address of his client.

[Mr. Butcher]

(6) Where a person claims a lien on a document its production under this section shall be without prejudice to the lien.

(7) Nothing in this section shall require a person carrying on the business of banking to disclose any information or produce any document relating to the affairs of a customer unless—

(a) the customer is a person who the inspector has reason to believe may be able to give information relevant to the investigation; and

(b) the Secretary of State is satisfied that the disclosure or production is necessary for the purposes of the investigation.

(8) An inspector appointed under this section may, and if so directed by the Secretary of State shall, make interim reports to the Secretary of State and on the conclusion of his investigation shall make a final report to him.'.—[Mr. Howard.]

POWER TO TRANSFER FUNCTIONS TO DESIGNATED AGENCY

Amendment proposed: No. 165, in page 71, line 41, leave out

'the Securities and Investment Board'

and insert

'a body corporate has been established which'.—[Mr. Howard.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it may be convenient to consider the following: Government amendment No. 166.

Amendment No. 167, in page 72, line 5, at end insert

'(1A) Upon the making of an order under subsection (1) above, the Securities and Investments Board shall cease to be a limited company and shall become a statutory body created under this Act.', Government amendments Nos. 168, 169, 171 to 173, 213, 253, 255, 256 and 258.

Mr. Gould: It may be as well to give you the opportunity to pause for breath, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I should like to speak in support of amendment No. 167.

The Government amendments in this group give effect to the solution at which the Committee arrived on the central issue of the Bill — the status and functions of the SIB. It is fair and proper to recognise that the Committee achieved a great deal in this respect. We named the board which had hitherto hidden coyly behind the description of "designated agency" and we increased its powers in respect of its ability to impose rule changes, to prosecute, to investigate unauthorised persons, to deal with matters such as insider dealing and even in regard to obtaining a warrant for powers of search.

None of that could have been achieved without the support, and often direction, of Conservative members of the Committee. It was an excellent example of a Committee working towards a constructive common purpose. It is perhaps not surprising that the paths of the two sides of the House diverge here as we regret, even now, that, for current ideological reasons, the Government have not been able to bring themselves to give the SIB proper status in the Bill. The Government will not accept that this is the obvious solution and that it has been adopted by virtually every other leading capital market in the Western world. The bulk of City opinion now accepts that it is a solution that is desirable, or at least inevitable. This solution would have enabled the Committee and the House to avoid many of the problems which have preoccupied us throughout our deliberations.

9.30 pm

I agree wholeheartedly with the arguments advanced some months ago by the Financial Times in a leading article, when it expressed the view that if we had begun with a statutory commission we could have spent our time making sure that it operated with proper flexibility and sensitivity, instead of starting at the other end with a body which was not propery constituted and did not have adequate powers. Consequently, we have had to spend our time attempting to increase those powers.

This evening we have had a short debate on the powers of the Securities and Investments Board which direct applicants to go to the appropriate self-regulating organisation. That board may have been more appropriate and commended itself to the Government and their supporters if we had begun with the clear understanding that the SIB, bearing in mind its delicate relationship with the SROs, was to be the dominant partner.

The Government's failure in this respect leaves the Bill inadequate to deal with its purpose. The Bill, and the Government's thinking which underpins it, simply do not grasp the scale of the change which will overcome the City. Many of the old safeguards over institutions are being swept away. Huge new conglomerates with powerful new players, enormous financial power — much more power than anything previously seen — will muscle into the City. Those people will be used to playing to the whistle, and it is vital that they are in no doubt as to who will blow the whistle, in what circumstances and with what effect.

The City will become a place of intense competition. The new, immensely powerful institutions will be competing with each other for a limited volume of business. When we have to endure an inevitable bear market, there will be a great deal of blood on the carpet. It will be at that moment that corners will be cut and rules broken. The structure of the Bill will be put to the test and, as it stands at the moment, it is inadequate to meet that test.

At present, we are asked to support a structure in which a private company supervises a range of self-regulating organisations, most of which have no experience or resources to undertake this task, and some of the organisations do not even exist. It is a complicated structure — a delicate balance which, in general terms, we have supported. It is asking too much to place all the weight on the self-regulating organisations when, at the apex of the structure, there is nothing more substantial than a private company, limited by guarantees.

The fact that we have a Securities and Investments Board which needs a special dispensation to drop the word "limited" from its title gives the wrong message to people in the City. It is a wrong psychological simile. It is a typically muddled British compromise. It shows that we have not yet grasped the scale of the task and duty that we face. It signals to those who operate in the City that we have not taken the problem seriously.

Mr. Cash rose

Mr. Gould: No, I will not give way; I am about to finish.

The City, without a proper regulatory authority at the heart of the system, will be at a disadvantage in comparison with other financial markets. That is the prime reason why, when we come to Third Reading, we shall be obliged to vote against the Bill. It is the same reason which will oblige us to legislate again on the matter when we return to government.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I wish to speak briefly to add my support to the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould). I feel extremely strongly about this matter, and I think that the Minister has totally misread public opinion. The Minister does not understand that the British public will never stomach a private policing operation in the City of London. A private company, no different from Securicor, will be responsible for policing City institutions.

We know that the measure of that organisation will come in the crisis in the City. All the signs are that the big bang will provide for excesses that the country will expect the City and its institutions to root out. The problem is that when the British people find out that it is impossible to root out these things, perhaps even with a publicly instituted form of control commission, they will blame whatever private arrangements have been made for City policing.

The Minister has it within his power, even at this late stage, to accept this amendment. As I understand it, it simply provides that he retains the right to substitute the limited company that is provided for in the Bill with some form of statutory body. This is a reasonable proposition. It gives the Minister the opportunity, without further legislation, to change the very nature of the structure that is being set up today. If he does not, he will find that, within a year or two, he will be standing at the Dispatch

[Mr. Campbell-Savours]

Box defending, or perhaps even the converse, attacking what has gone on in the City. He will be defending a private policing arrangement that has been set up to monitor the City, but that the public are unable to understand. He has it within his power, and he would be sensible, in his conduct of the debate, to take on board the comments that have been made by me and by my hon. Friend the Member for Dagenham.

Mr. Nelson: Unlike Labour Members, I believe that my hon. and learned Friend the Under-Secretary of State has moved in compliance with the wishes expressed by both sides in Committee and has come forward with proposals that will be durable and will enjoy the respect of the investing public. It is important that we seek to make the legislation work so that it can do what is intended. In seeking to achieve that objective, it is important that the SIB should have statutory recognition, the powers to investigate, to bring prosecutions in certain circumstances, to change the rules, if necessary, in the self-regulatory bodies, and to enjoy immunity, all of which have been conferred on it by the Bill.

The amendments moved in Committee were argued against because the SIB will be a private sector body, but they are extensive and important powers in terms of investor protection. As the SIB can enjoy the benefits of being a private sector body, not being subject to the public sector borrowing requirement, the state panoply of regulation, and so on, we may have the best of both worlds. Even if Labour Members suspect that we have not, it is at least worth a serious try.

I pay tribute to my hon. and learned Friend the Minister for the objective and sincere way in which he has sought to understand the objectives of those of us who have moved amendments. Without becoming entrenched, he has responded democratically and pragmatically to the interests of investors and of good and effective legislation. For those reasons, I warmly welcome the Government's amendments.

Mr. Howard: I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Chichester (Mr. Nelson) for his observations and I am delighted that I have been able to identify a solution to the problem on which we spent so much time in committee. We recognised the legitimate concerns expressed during our proceedings upstairs by my hon Friends the Members for Chichester and for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith), and others. We have still managed to retain the flexibility and effectiveness that are so crucial to the concept that we have sought to put in place in the regulatory structure.

It is uncharacteristically intellectually feeble of the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) to have failed to face up to the real difficulties that would flow in terms of restraints on public spending and borrowing, which would have inhibited the creation of an effective regulatory body. He has mouthed from beginning to end of our consideration of this matter the phrase "statutory commission" without ever coming clean and explaining precisely what it is that he had in mind.

At the risk of introducing a note of controversy into our deliberations, I have to say that I utterly reject any accusations of dogma or doctrine by the hon. Member for Dagenham. I accuse him of failing to face the central issues at the heart of this discussion. I am delighted to have arrived at a solution which meets the legitimate concerns of my hon. Friends.

Mr. Gould: I am listening with fascination to the Minister's diatribe. Presumably this embraces every other statutory body which this Government and other Governments have created in Britain, and applies to every other statutory body fulfilling precisely these functions in every capital market in the world in which Britain is competing.

Mr. Howard: It will not do for the hon. Gentleman to attempt to sidestep the argument in that way. We are considering a specific solution to a specific problem, and we have devised what I think is the most effective solution to that problem. I hope and expect that it will work. On that basis I commend the amendment to the House.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 166, in page 72, line 5, at end insert—

'(1A) The body to which functions are transferred by the first order made under subsection (1) above shall be the body known as The Securities and Investments Board Limited if it appears to the Secretary of State that it is able and willing to discharge them, that the requirements mentioned in paragraph (b) of that subsection are satisfied in the case of that body and that he is not precluded from making the order by the subsequent provisions of this section or Chapter XII of this Part of this Act.'.

No. 168, in page 72, line 7, leave out 'the' and insert 'a'.

No. 171, in page 72, line 17, leave out '79(1) or 81' and insert 'or 79(1)'.

No. 172, in page 72, line 19, leave out subsection (5).

No. 173, in page 72, line 41, at end insert

'and any transfer of a function under section 81, 92 or 93 shall be subject to such a reservation.'.— [Mr. Howard.]

Schedule 6

Principles applicable to Designated Agency's Rules and Regulations

Mr. Howard: I beg to move, in page 143, line 17, at end insert—

'including information as to any commissions or other inducements received or receivable from a third party in connection with any such transaction.'.

Mr. Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to take Government amendment No. 177.

Mr. Butterfill: In Standing Committee when we discussed the problems that arise from disclosure, our main preoccupation was with disclosure of commission. I and the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) voiced doubts in Committee that commissions were not the only things about which we ought to be concerned. We made the point that we ought to ensure that the public knew the totality of costs being charged to an insurance policy, and how these could affect the interests of a policyholder. We made it clear in that debate that it could be confusing or even misleading to focus exclusively on commission because insurance companies selling in a direct way might well incur substantial marketing costs through such things as television advertising and advertising in newspapers, and that all such costs would be loaded on to the policies.

We felt that there was a need for something more than mere disclosure of commission, and for that reason I tabled an amendment which was supported by a large number of my hon. Friends, and a similar amendment was tabled by the hon. Member for Dagenham which was supported by a number of his hon. Friends. It became quite clear in Committee that we enjoyed the support of my hon. and learned Friend the Minister, who undertook to consider the matter in detail and to bring forward an amendment at this stage. I am pleased to say that my hon. and learned Friend has been as good as his word and has brought forward two amendments which substantially meet the anxieties expressed in Standing Committee.

When these matters were discussed in Standing Committee I made it clear that I did not think it was right for us to try to lay down the detailed rules, but that we should merely lay down the ground rules. I am pleased to see that that is exactly what my hon. and learned Friend the Minister has done in his amendments.

9.45 pm

However, we must consider the amendments in the light of the proposals that have now been published by MIBOC for the regulation of salesmen and the general regulation of the marketing of life assurance and unit trusts which is contained in its latest document, "Life Assurance and Unit Trusts and the Investor", published in April this year.

Here we have some difficulty. First, I must say that I congratulate MIBOC on the way in which it met many of the other concerns of the Committee. In some cases it has met them most ingeniously, and, indeed, improved upon some of the suggestions that were made in Committee. But in the one area of disclosure it has failed to meet the concerns that were expressed in Committee. It is worth illustrating that by reference to some correspondence which I have had on the subject.

First, can we identify those areas where further disclosure ought to be available? Information should be available about what proportion of the payments for a premium will go towards the company's costs, which we have already identified, and what proportion will be invested on behalf of the policy holder.

Secondly, we should know what effective rate of interest is being offered by the insurance company in the case of the amount that will accumulate towards a given sum. In every other form of investment there is an indication of the interest which is being paid, but that is not done by insurance companies.

My concerns on this matter are not unique. Indeed, I have had a large number of letters from not only members of the public who are concerned in these matters, but also people throughout the insurance industry, not just one section of the industry, but a wide cross-section. For example, I have had correspondence from people engaged in computer systems relating to the analysis of policies. I have had letters from people who are involved in the marketing of insurance policies. I have had letters from people who are actuaries, engaged in the insurance industry. It may be worth quoting from some of the letters that I have received.

Let me read a letter that I have received from one of the leading Scottish companies involved in the personal and corporate financial services sector which is relevant to the view that we should take of the MIBOC document. It says:

"Dear Mr. Butterfill, We among others, forwarded our comments on the consultative document published by MIBOC earlier in the year. On that occasion there was time for a consultation, on this occasion, time is short, and I therefore hope that our observations on the latest document will assist you in appraisal.

Members of the standing committee are to be congratulated for grasping so quickly the complex subject and not allowing the wool to be pulled over their eyes by an industry expert on this practice. We were particularly impressed by the insistence on the disclosure of all marketing and administrative charges within a product, not just the commission.

The vested interests represented on the Board will continue to water down your proposals if possible. Perhaps there should be a statutory requirement for, at least, provision of estimated surrender values based on industry standard assumptions."

I am pleased to say that that aspect has been largely met.

The letter went on:

"We still feel that the commission system is the root cause of the industry's problems, but perhaps full disclosure of charges will persuade the industry to modify an indefensible system.

We still feel that MIBOC is still trying to fudge the issue. If it is possible to come up with a means of product disclosure for with-profits policies, then it is possible to devise a method of commissions disclosure for company representatives as well as independent intermediaries. The battle over polarisation appears to have been won, however, although the definition of 'introducer' is a possible loophole that should be plugged.

We thank you for helping to clean up such a rotten mess. Yours sincerely."

That puts it more strongly and colourfully than I would have put it, but it shows that many of those in the insurance industry are unhappy with the latest MIBOC proposals.

That letter was fairly typical of much of the correspondence that I received. It is worth quoting the view of the National Consumer Council. On 5 June it wrote to me saying:

"On 21 April SIB and MIBOC published their response to issues raised during Committee Stage on disclosure of commissions and charges and the status of salesmen. We welcome the proposal that those selling life assurance or unit trusts will have to be either independent intermediaries or company representatives (restricted to the selling of the products of one company or group). However, we do not believe that SIB-MIBOC proposals for the disclosure of commissions and charges go far enough. It is our view that there should be full disclosure of commissions by independent intermediaries whether or not there is an industry agreement on maximum commissions. We also feel that consumers purchasing policies from company representatives should be made aware of the amount of their premiums which are absorbed by selling costs. These are, in effect, a charge on the policy and should be included in the disclosure of charges, surrender values etc. so that consumers are able to assess the value for money of the investment they are being offered."

That is the point made in the amendments of my hon. and learned Friend the Minister.

All the controversy has provoked a quite extraordinary response from the Association of British Insurers, which produced a news sheet that I believe has been sent to the vast majority of hon. Members. Much of it is concerned with rubbishing the comments that I and other hon. Members made in Committee. It is worth taking up some of the points that it makes in the news sheet. It claims that we have unfairly stated its position and that as regards the right to share in profits there is some definition, because it is written into the articles of association of most insurance companies.

Earlier, I said that I had received correspondence from members of the actuarial profession. I have with me a letter that I received from a consulting actuary who is also a research fellow in actuarial studies at one of our leading universities. In his letter, he points out that that claim by the insurance companies is somewhat spurious. At the risk of boring the House, I shall quote from his letter. He writes:

"Around about the beginning of this century with-profits premium rates were approximately 10 per cent. higher than the equivalent non-profit rates. This with-profits policyholder was this taking a chance that he would get approximately 10 per cent. less than he was paying for. In practice, his reward for taking this chance was that he would get a little more than he paid for in the form of bonuses. Bonus additions were expected to form 10-20 per cent. of his final policy proceeds. This seems quite a sensible system really.

Since then, interest rates have increased dramatically. The result is that non-profit premium rates have reduced substantially over that period. On the other hand, for a given sum assured, with-profit rates have stayed fairly constant. The bonus rates have risen substantially to take up the slack. The result is that at present under a typical policy only approximately 40 per cent. or 50 per cent. of the eventual proceeds are guaranteed; the rest is bonuses. This has the advantage of being admirably flexible. For example, it allows the life offices to invest heavily in equities which they probably could not do under the old system.

However, one of the side-effects of this has been to increase substantially the share of the premiums which ends with the insurance company's shareholders. As I explained at our meeting, for a typical proprietary office, the surplus declared at each valuation might be split in the ratio 90 per cent. to policyholders and 10 per cent. to the shareholders. The ratio is fixed for each company. At the start of the century approximately 20 per cent. of a typical policy's proceeds consisted of bonuses which had been declared out of surplus. It may be seen that, at that time, the shareholders' share of the total policy proceeds was approximately 22 per cent. i.e. 10 per cent. of the 20 per cent. Under present conditions the shareholders might expect to receive approximately 6 per cent. of the policy proceeds, ie 10 per cent. of 60 per cent. 60 per cent. is the part of the policy proceeds which has emerged as surplus over the term, of a typical policy under current conditions."

This means that the return to the shareholders has trebled over that period.

"The position is further complicated by the type of valuation method required (a net premium valuation at an artificially low rate of interest which would tend, in general, to increase the proportion attributable to shareholders.)"

The Association of British insurers and MIBOC are saying that what we asked for by way of detailed disclosure is not reasonable, cannot be done at fair cost and would be confusing to the investor. All I can do is to say that some members of the industry — the better members — are already doing substantially what we ask.

I invite hon. Members to look at what the Scottish Amicable does at present. This is one of the better insurance companies with which, I am pleased to say, I have a policy. The Scottish Amicable booklet gives a bar chart entitled "What happens to your premiums". On that bar chart are shown the proportions as to commission, expenses and taxation. All this could be reasonably done by most members of the industry. Indeed, this example could be improved upon. I offer it as a model, and hope that my hon. and learned Friend will urge it upon MIBOC.

Mr. Howard: My hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) began by paying tribute to MIBOC and congratulating it on its latest document. Given those remarks, I confess that I was disappointed that he did not dissociate himself more robustly from the remarks of his correspondent who went on to accuse MIBOC of fudging the issue. I do not believe that MIBOC has fudged the issue. It is committed to full disclosure of charges wherever possible. It believes that disclosure of expenses on with-profits policies is not practicable. I have no doubt that, if it can be shown that such disclosure is practicable, MIBOC will carefully consider the matter and fully explore the material that has been made available to my hon. Friend.

However, the bar chart to which my hon. Friend referred, and which he held up for the edification of the House, if it is the same bar chart that he showed to me earlier, refers to the proportion of profits, expenses and so on in relation ot the whole of the fund of the insurance company concerned and not to any particular policy. That is, of course, an entirely different matter.

Mr. Butterfill: I am grateful to my hon. and learned Friend for pointing that out. I said that it was not entirely what I had hoped for, but that it gave an illustration of what could be done. I agree that it relates to the whole of the fund and that is its deficiency. Nevertheless, I am advised that a similar bar chart could be done for each product.

Mr. Howard: It does not follow from the fact that one has a bar chart for the fund as a whole that it can be done for particular policies. To say that one does not entirely meet the other leaves a fairly wide gap in the argument.

Schedule 6, as improved by the amendment, is deliberately flexible. It speaks in terms of the rules making proper provision. What proper provision is at any one time must take account of what is practicable at that time. Systems for allocation costs within insurance companies may well change and develop. What is not immediately practicable may later become so. There is, therefore, some scope for evolution in this area. Even if MIBOC is not capable fully of responding to my hon. Friend's concerns in its initial rules, it may be possible in the years ahead, as methods improve and one can identify the breakdown of premiums in the way that my hon. Friend would like to see, for the rules to be changed subsequently.

I commend schedule 6 as amended to the House, as conferring the flexibility that I think is needed and proper to provide the requisite degree of consumer protection in this area.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 177, in page 143, line 20, at end insert—

'6A. The conduct of business rules, or those rules and rules under section 47 of this Act, must make proper provision for requiring an authorised person who in the course of carrying on investment business enters or offers to enter into a transaction in respect of an investment with any person, or gives any person advice about such a transaction, to give that person such information as to the nature of the investment and the financial implications of the transaction as will enable him to make an informed decision.'.

It being Ten o'clock, further consideration of the Bill stood adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, the Financial Services Bill may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour.—[Mr. Durant.]

Financial Services Bill

As amended (in the Standing Committee), again considered.

Mr. Howard: I beg to move amendment No. 178, in page 143, line 31, at end insert

'Classes of investors

10. The conduct of business rules and other rules and regulations made under Chapter V of Part I of this Act must take proper account of the fact that provisions that are appropriate for regulating the conduct of business in relation to some classes of investors may not (by reason of their knowledge, experience or otherwise) be appropriate in relation to others.'

This amendment has been proposed in order to add a new principle to schedule 6 to the Bill. This would enable the Secretary of State to refuse to transfer rule-making functions to an agency if he did not consider that the rules made by the agency took proper account of the fact that different provisions are appropriate for the regulation of the conduct of business in respect of different classes of investors. Different provisions are needed depending on the characteristics of different investors.

This addition to schedule 6 provides a clear signpost to the designated agency to draw up its rules and regulations so as to reflect the differing skills, knowledge, resources and experience of different investors. The rules should, therefore, be flexible in the means by which they ensure adequate investor protection and the orderly conduct of the market. The variable should be not the entitlement to investor protection but the means whereby it is secured.

I am well aware of the concern that has been expressed in the City and elsewhere that the weight of regulation may drive business overseas. I do not share that pessimism. Certain basic safeguards, such as honesty and fair dealing, should apply to all investment business and are essential if the United Kingdom is to maintain and, indeed, enhance its position as one of the world's leading financial centres. At the same time, we fully recognise the dangers of over-regulation. That is why the regulatory framework encourages practitioner-based regulation through the recognised self-regulating organisations and professional bodies.

By virtue of clause 162, the Bill already enables different rules to be made for different cases. The new principle introduced in this amendment requires that the Secretary of State be satisfied that the designated agency has paid proper regard to the different means by which appropriate investor protection can be provided in respect of different categories of investor. For example, some categories of business or professional investor will not need the full panoply of the rules to protect their interests. The House will know that the draft rules which the Securities and Investments Board has been publishing during recent months already distinguish between what are defined as business investors and other investors, a category which will include the less sophisticated, private investor.

I welcome that approach. The principle to be incorporated in schedule 6 should, therefore, offer reassurance to those who have been concerned lest this approach might not be followed in future.

Mr. Gould: We accept that there are different categories of investors who possibly need different levels or mechanisms to protect their interests.

I ask the Minister to bear in mind two matters. First, I hope that the new provision in schedule 6 will not be allowed to operate as some sort of pretext to exempt, for example, the Eurobond market from effective regulation.

Secondly, will the Minister bear in mind that boundaries change between the professional investor and the smaller and less experienced investor, which require a great deal of flexibility in approach? Those boundaries must be watched carefully as the less experienced investor is tempted to move into new areas.

Amendment agreed to.

Schedule 7

DESIGNATED AGENCIES: STATUS AND EXERCISE OF TRANSFERRED FUNCTIONS

Amendments made: No. 175, in page 144, leave out lines 28 to 33.

No. 182, in page 145, line 36, after 'evidence', insert 'or, in Scotland, sufficient evidence'.

No. 183, in page 146, line 18, leave out sub-paragraph (2) and insert

'Consultation

12A.- (1) Before making any rules or regulations by virtue of functions transferred to it by a delegation order a designated agency shall, subject to sub-paragraphs (2) and (3) below, publish the proposed rules and regulations in such manner as appears to the agency to be best calculated to bring them to the attention of the public, together with a statement that representations in respect of the proposals can be made to the agency within a specified period; and before making the rules or regulations the agency shall have regard to any representations duly made in accordance with that statement.

(2) Sub-paragraph (1) above does not apply in any case in which the agency considers that the delay involved in complying with that sub-paragraph would be prejudicial to the interests of investors.

(3) Sub-paragraph (1) above does not apply to the making of any rule or regulation if it is in the same terms (or substantially the same terms) as a proposed rule or regulation which was furnished by the agency to the Secretary of State for the purposes of section 96(8) of this Act.'. [Mr. Howard.]

Clause 99

REPORTS AND ACCOUNTS

Mr. Ashdown: I beg to move amendment No. 184, in page 74, line 32, at end insert

'; and every delegation order in respect of a designated agency shall cease to have effect at the end of the period of 28 days beginning with the day on which a report relating to the discharge of the functions trasferred to that designated agency is laid before Parliament under this section, unless before the end of that period that report is approved by a resolution of each House of Parliament.'.

The purpose of the amendment can be stated quite briefly. It is to enshrine within the legislation the right of Parliament to debate a report — for which there is provision elsewhere in the legislation — that will be laid before the House on an annual basis. This is a matter of some importance, but it is one that can be dealth with briefly. I am seeking to probe and if the Minister will provide some useful words on the matter, I shall be satisfied.

We are dealing with a framework which has been changed substantially. It has already been said that there are no fewer than 278 amendments, of which 249 are in in the name of the Government. We all know that there are more amendments to come in another place.

[Mr. Ashdown]

The real effectiveness of the general and overall structure which conducts the important function of regulating the financial services industry will not be known from the Bill and cannot be known from that source. That is because much of the framework needs to be filled in by the rules. Until the rules are drawn and properly enacted, we shall not be able to judge what the effect of the legislation will be.

It is clear that we are moving into uncharted waters. As the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) said, nowhere else in the world have we set up a self-regulating body to regulate capital markets. I believe that it is the right solution in this instance, but I would rather see a stronger body than that which is proposed. It must be said that previous self-regulating bodies that have operated in the City, such as Lloyd's, have been manifestly unsucessful in regulating matters properly and effectively, and some would say that the same can be said of the stock exchange. Massive immunities are to be granted, and the stock exchange will now join the committee of Lloyd's, the Post Office, and the armed forces when fighting an enemy as the only bodies in Britain which have complete immunity from claims from ordinary members of the public for damages. That is an extremely significant immunity. My colleagues and I would say that it is too great an immunity, but that argument has been advanced already.

We are entering uncharted waters in another sense, because we know that ahead of us is the big bang. Indeterminate factors will come into play and no one can predict exactly what will happen after the big bang takes place. It will be important to create a structure which is flexible and capable of being able to respond to and meet the needs that may be created. There are many who believe —I am one of them and I suspect that there are others on the Opposition Benches, and even some on the Government Benches – that the balance that the Minister has sought to draw is to fight the last war, not the next one, against City corruption.

We must be flexible. The House has a right to comment yearly on what has taken place to ensure that the important institutions of our financial services industry, which have served Britain so magnificently in the past and are such an essential part of our economy, are regulated in a proper and appropriate fashion. I hope that the Minister recognises that we are moving into a difficult area and that it will be important to debate the issues that arise. He has gone a great deal towards allowing that to happen. In Committee, he said:

"The agency is required to submit an annual report which must be laid before Parliament, and which Parliament will no doubt wish to debate." — [Official Report, Standing Committee E, 6 March 1986; c. 534.]

I hope that the Minister will make a statement of equal clarity this evening. I hope also that he will say that he believes that it will be important, certainly in the early years, for Parliament to have the opportunity to debate the reports. If he says that it is important for the House to have that opportunity, I shall be satisfied. It is important that that should be so, especially in the early years of the development of such an important institution.

Mr. Howard: Many bodies are required to produce annual reports which have to be laid before Parliament. It would be extraordinary for legislation to require that all such reports be debated and approved if dire consequences were to be avoided. If we followed such an approach generally, there would be little time left for debates on other matters. It would be open to Parliament to debate a particular report of the agency if that were desired, and I am sure that it would often want to do so. It would not be sensible to provide that every report must be debated, regardless of whether such use of parliamentary time is justified. I invite the House to reject the amendment.

Mr. Ashdown: I do not wish to prolong the debate, but the Minister has dismissed the amendment with rather less care and consideration than we expect of him. He was more forthcoming in Committee. I hope that he will recognise that it is important that the House should have an opportunity to debate the annual reports, especially in the early years. The financial services structure which he is putting into place will be extremely important. In the light of his comments in Committee, rather than those which he has just made, and in the interests of getting on to Third Reading as soon as possible, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MODIFICATION OF S. 101 WHERE RECOGNITION FUNCTION IS TRANSFERRED

Amendment made: No. 185, in page 78, line 4, leave out from beginning to 'in' in line 3 and insert

'subsection (3) of section 101 above he may, notwithstanding the delegation order, himself exercise the power conferred by paragraph (a) of that subsection or direct the designated agency to exercise the power conferred by paragraph (b) or (c) of that subsection'. — [Mr. Howard.]

Clause 104

REPORTS BY DIRECTOR GENERAL OF FAIR TRADING

Amendments made: No. 186, in page 79, leave out lines 31 to 35 and insert

'the matter specified in the notice of which a copy is sent to him under subsection (3) above'.

No. 187, in page 79, line 38, leave out 'in' and insert 'before'.

No. 188, in page 79, line 39, after 'above', insert 'by reason of that matter'. [Mr. Howard.]

Clause 109

SUPPLEMENTARY PROVISIONS

Amendment made: No. 189, in page 83, line 21, after '109', insert—

'(1A) Before the Secretary of State exercises a power under section '01(3)(b) or (c) above, his power to refuse leave under section 102(2) above or his power to give a direction under section 102(4) above in respect of a self-regulating organisation, investment exchange or clearing house, or his power under section 103(3)(b) above in respect of a designated agency, he shall—

(a) give written notice of his intention do do so to the organisation, exchange, clearing house or agency and take such steps (whether by publication or otherwise) as he thinks appropriate for bringing the notice to the attention of any other person who in his opinion is likely to be affected by the exercise of the power; and

(b) have regard to any representation made within such time as he considers reasonable by the organisation, exchange, clearing house or agency or by any such other person.

(1B) A notice under subsection (1A) above shall give particulars of the manner in which the Secretary of State proposes to exercise the power in question and state the reasons for which he proposes to act; and the statement of reasons may include matters contained in any report received by him under section 104 above.'.—[Mr. Howard.]

Schedule 8

Regulated Insurance Companies

Amendment made: No. 190, in page 147, leave out lines 2 and 3 and insert—

'2.—(1) An insurance company to which section 21 of this Act applies shall not be an authorised person except by virtue of that section.

(1A) If an insurance company to which Part II of the Insurance Companies Act 1982 applies but to which section 21 of this Act does not apply becomes an authorised person by virtue of any other provision of this Act it shall be an authorised person only as respects the management of the investments of any pension fund which is established solely for the benefit of the officers or employees and their dependants of that company or of any other body corporate in the same group as that company.

(1B) An insurance company to which section 30 of this Act applies shall not, so long as it is an authorised person by virtue of that section, be an authorised person by virtue of any other provision of this Act.'. [Mr. Howard.]

Schedule 9

FRIENDLY SOCIETIES

Amendments made: No. 194, in page 151, line 27, leave out from beginning to end of line 14 on page 152 and insert

"PART I

SELF-REGULATING ORGANISATIONS FOR FRIENDLY SOCIETIES

Preliminary

1. In this Schedule

"a regulated friendly society" means a society which is an authorised person by virtue of section 22 of this Act as respects such investment business as is mentioned in that section;

"regulated business", in relation to a regulated friendly society, means investment business as respects which the society is authorised by virtue of that section;

"a self-regulating organisation for friendly societies" means a self-regulating organisation which is permitted under its rules to admit regulated friendly societies as members and to regulate the carrying on by such societies of regulated business;

"a recognised self-regulating organisation for friendly societies" means a body declared by an order of the Registrar for the time being in force to be a recognised self-regulating organisation for friendly societies for the purposes of this Schedule;

"a member society" means a regulated friendly society which is a member of an appropriate recognised self-regulating organisation for friendly societies and is subject to its rules in carrying on all its regulated business and, for the purposes of this definition, "an appropriate recognised self-regulating organisation for friendly societies" means

(a) in the case of any such society as is mentioned in section 22(1) of this Act, an organisation declared by an order of the Chief Registrar of friendly societies for the time being in force to be a recognised self-regulating organisation for friendly societies for the purposes of this Schedule; and

(b) in the case of any such society as is mentioned in section 22(2) of this Act, an organisation declared by an order of the Registrar of Friendly Societies for Northern Ireland for the time being in force to be such an organisation;

"the Registrar" means

(a) in relation to any such society as is mentioned in section 22(1) of this Act, or to any self-regulating organisation for friendly societies which has applied for or been granted a recognition order made by him, the Chief Registrar of friendly societies; and

(b) in relation to any such society as is mentioned in section 22(2) of this Act, or to any self-regulating organisation for friendly societies which has applied for or been granted a recognition order made by him, the Registrar of Friendly Societies for Northern Ireland.

Recognition

2. — (1) A self-regulating organisation for friendly societies may apply to the Chief Registrar of Friendly Societies or the Registrar of Friendly Societies for Northern Ireland for an order declaring it to be a recognised self-regulating organisation for friendly societies for the purposes of this Schedule.

(2) An application under sub-paragraph (1) above—

(a) shall be made in such manner as the Registrar may direct; and

(b) shall be accompanied by such information as the Registrar may reasonably require for the purpose of determining the application.

(3) At any time after receiving an application and before determining it the Registrar may require the applicant to furnish additional information.

(4) The directions and requirements given or imposed under sub-paragraphs (2) and (3) above may differ as between different applications.

(5) Any information to be furnished to the Registrar under this paragraph shall, if he so requires, be in such form or verified in such manner as he may specify.

(6) Every application shall be accompanied by a copy of the applicant's rules and of any guidance issued by the applicant which is intended to have continuing effect and is issued in writing or other legible form.

2A. (1) If, on an application duly made in accordance with paragraph 2 above and after being furnished with all such information as he may require under that paragraph, it appears to the Registrar from that information and having regard to any other information in his possession that the requirements mentioned in paragraph 2B below are satisfied as respects that organisation, he may, with the consent of the Secretary of State and subject to sub-paragraph (2) below, make an order ("a recognition order") declaring the applicant to be a recognised self-regulating organisation for friendly societies.

(2) Where the Registrar proposes to grant an application for a recognition order he shall send to the Secretary of State a copy of the application together with a copy of the rules and any guidance accompanying the application and the Secretary of State shall not consent to the making of the recognition order unless he is satisfied that the rules and guidance of which copies have been sent to him under this sub-paragraph do not have, and are not intended or likely to have, to any significant extent the effect of restricting, distorting or preventing competition or, if they have or are intended or likely to have that effect to any significant extent, that the effect is not greater than is necessary for the protection of investors.

(3) Section 104 of this Act shall apply in relation to the decision whether to consent to the making of a recognition order under this paragraph as it applies to the decisions mentioned in subsection (1) of that section.

(4) The Registrar may refuse to make a recognition order in respect of an organisation if he considers that its recognition is unnecessary having regard to the existence of one or more other organisations which are concerned with such investment business as is mentioned in section 22 of this Act and which have been or are likely to be recognised under this paragraph.

(5) Where the Registrar refuses an application for a recognition order he shall give the applicant a written notice to that effect specifying a requirement which in the opinion of the Registrar is not satisfied, stating that the application is refused on the ground mentioned in sub-paragraph (4) above or stating that the Secretary of State has refused to consent to the making of the order.

(6) A recognition order shall state the date on which it takes effect.

2B. (1) The requirements referred to in paragraph 2A above are that mentioned in sub-paragraph (2) below and those set out in paragraphs 2 to 7 of Schedule 2 to this Act as modified in sub-paragraphs (3) and (4) below.

(2) The rules of the organisation must take proper account of the Friendly Societies Act 1974 or, as the case may be, the Friendly Societies Act (Northern Ireland) 1970.

(3) In paragraph 3 of Schedule 2—

(a) in sub-paragraph (1) for the reference to Chapter V of Part I of this Act there shall be substituted a reference to paragraphs 4 to 11 below; and

(b) in sub-paragraph (2) for the reference to Chapter VI of that Part there shall be substituted a reference to the powers exercisable by the Registrar by virtue of paragraph 12 below.

(4) In paragraph 4—

(a) for the references to Chapter V of Part I of this Act there shall be substituted references to paragraphs 4 to 11 below; and

(b) in sub-paragraph (1A) for the reference to members of a recognised self-regulating organisation or recognised professional body there shall be substituted a reference to members of a self-regulating organisation for friendly societies.

Revocation of recognition

2C.—(1) A recognition order may be revoked by a further order made by the Registrar if at any time it appears to him

(a) that any requirement mentioned in paragraph 2B(1) above is not satisfied in the case of the organisation to which the recognition order relates ("the recognised organisation");

(b) that the recognised organisation has failed to comply with any obligation to which it is subject by virtue of this Act; or

(c) that the continued recognition of the organisation is undesirable having regard to the existence of one or more other organisations which have been or are to be recognised under paragraph 2A above.

(2) Subsections (2) to (9) of section 11 of this Act shall have effect in relation to the revocation of a recognition order under subsection (1) of that section but with the substitution for references to the Secretary of State for references to the Registrar.

Compliance orders

2D.—(1) If at any time it appears to the Registrar

(a) that any requirement mentioned in paragraph 2B above is not satisfied in the case of a recognised organisation; or

(b) that a recognised organisation has failed to comply with any obligation to which it is subject by virtue of this Act, he may, instead of revoking the recognition order under paragraph 2C above, make an application to the court under this paragraph.

(2) If on any such application the court decides that the requirement in question is not satisfied or, as the case may be, that the organisation has failed to comply with the obligation in question it may order the organisation concerned to take such steps as the court directs for securing that that requirement is satisfied or that that obligation is complied with.

(3) The jurisdiction conferred by this section shall be exercisable by the High Court and the Court of Session.

2E.—(1) If at any time it appears to the Registrar that the rules of a recognised organisation do not satisfy the requirements of paragraph 3(1) of Schedule 2 to this Act as modified by paragraph 2B(3) above he may, instead of revoking the recognition order or making an application under paragraph 2D above, direct the organisation to alter, or himself alter, its rules in such manner as he considers necessary for securing that the rules satisfy those requirements.

(2) Before giving a direction or making any alteration under this paragraph the Registrar shall consult the organisation concerned.

(3) Any direction given under sub-paragraph (1) above shall, on the application of the Registrar, be enforceable by mandamus or, in Scotland, by an order for specific performance under section 91 of the Court of Session Act 1868.

(4) A recognised organisation whose rules have been altered by or pursuant to a direction given by the Registrar under sub-paragraph (1) above may apply to the court and if the court is satisfied—

(a) that the rules without the alteration satisfied the requirements mentioned in that sub-paragraph; or

(b) that other alterations proposed by the organisation would result in the rules satisfying those requirements,

the court may set aside the alteration made by or pursuant to the direction given by the Registrar and, in a case within paragraph (b) above, order the organisation to make the alterations proposed by it; but the setting aside of an alteration under this sub-paragraph shall not affect its previous operation.

(5) The jurisdiction conferred by sub-paragraph (4) above shall be exerciseable by the High Court and the Court of Session.

(6) The fact that the rules of a recognised organisation have been altered by or pursuant to a direction given by the Registrar, or pursuant to an order made by the court, under this paragraph shall not preclude their subsequent alteration or revocation by that organisation.

2F.—(1) The Registrar or the Secretary of State may make regulations requiring a recognised organisation to give the Registrar or, as the case may be, the Secretary of State forthwith notice of the occurrence of such events relating to the organisation or its members as are specified in the regulations and such information in respect of those events as is so specified.

(2) The Registrar or the Secretary of State may make regulations requiring a recognised organisation to furnish the Registrar or, as the case may be, the Secretary of State at such times or in respect of such periods as are specified in the regulations with such information relating to the organisation or its members as is so specified.

(3) The notices and information required to be given or furnished under the foregoing provisions of this paragraph shall be such as the Registrar or, as the case may be, the Secretary of State may reasonably require for the exercise of his functions under this Act.

(4) Regulations under the foregoing provisions of this paragraph may require information to be given in a specified form and to be verified in a specified manner.

(5) A notice or information required to be given or furnished under the foregoing provisions of this paragraph shall be given in writing or in such other manner as the Registrar or, as the case may be, the Secretary of State may approve.

(6) Where a recognised organisation amends, revokes or adds to its rules or guidance it shall within seven days give the Registrar written notice of the amendment, revocation or addition; but notice need not be given of the revocation of guidance other than such as is mentioned in paragraph 2(6) above or of any amendment of or addition to guidance which does not result in or consist of such guidance as is there mentioned.

(7) The Registrar shall send the Secretary of State a copy of any notice given to him under sub-paragraph (6) above.

(8) Contravention of this paragraph shall not be an offence.

2G.—(1) A recognised self-regulating organisation for friendly societies shall not exercise any powers for purposes corresponding to those of the powers exercisable by the Registrar by virtue of paragraph 12 below in relation to a regulated friendly society unless it has given reasonable notice of its intention to do so to the Registrar and informed him

(a) of the manner in which and the date on or after which it intends to exercise the power; and

(b) in the case of a proposal to impose a prohibition or requirement, of the reason why it proposes to act and its reasons for considering that that reason exists and that it is necessary to impose the prohibition or requirement.

(2) A recognised self-regulating organisation for friendly societies shall not exercise any power to which sub-paragraph (1)(a) above applies if before the date given in the notice in pursuance of that sub-paragraph the Registrar has served on it a notice in writing directing it not to do so; and the Registrar may serve such a notice if he considers it is desirable for protecting members or potential members of the society against the risk that it may be unable to meet its liabilities or to fulfil the reasonable expectations of its members or potential members.

Prevention of restrictive practices

2H.—(1) The powers conferred by sub-paragraph (2) below shall be exercisable by the Secretary of State if at any time it appears to him that—

(a) any rules made or guidance issued by a recognised self-regulating organisation for friendly societies;

(b) any practices of any such organisation; or

(c) any practices of persons who are members of, or otherwise subject to the rules made by, any such organisation, have, or are intended or likely to have, to a significant extent the effect of restricting, distorting or preventing competition and that that effect is greater than is necessary for the protection of investors.

(2) The powers exercisable under this sub-paragraph are to direct the Registrar—

(a) to revoke the recognition order of the organisation;

[Mr. Ashdown]

(b) to direct the organisation to take specified steps for the purpose of securing that the rules, guidance or practices in question do not have the effect mentioned in sub-paragraph (1) above;

(c) to make alterations in the rules for that purpose;

and subsections (2) to (5), (7) and (9) of section 11 of this Act, as applied by sub-paragraph (2) of paragraph 2C above, shall have effect in relation to the revocation of a recognition order by virtue of a direction under this sub-paragraph as they have effect in relation to the revocation of such an order under sub-paragraph (1) of that paragraph.

(3) The practices referred to in paragraph (b) of sub-paragraph (1) above are practices of the organisation in its capacity as such; and the practices referred to in paragraph (c) of that sub-paragraph are practices in relation to business in respect of which the persons in question are subject to the rules of the organisation and which are required or contemplated by its rules or guidance or otherwise attributable to its conduct in its capacity as such.

(4) The fact that any rules made by a recognised self-regulating organisation for friendly societies have been altered pursuant to a direction given by the Secretary of State under this paragraph shall not preclude their subsequent alteration or revocation by that organisation.

(5) Subsections (3) to (6) of section 104 of this Act shall apply for the purposes of this paragraph as if

(a) the reference to a notice in subsection (3) included a notice received under paragraph 2F(7) above or 22A(4) below;

(b) the reference to the Secretary of State's powers in subsection (4) included his powers under paragraph 2H(2) above; and

(c) the reference to practices in subsection (5) included such practices as are mentioned in paragraph 2H(1) above.

Fees

21. (1) An applicant for a recognition order under paragraph 2A above shall pay such fees in respect of his application as may be required by a scheme made and published by the Registrar; and no application for such an order shall be regarded as duly made unless this sub-paragraph is complied with.

(2) Subsections (2) to (4) of section 94 of this Act apply to a scheme under subparagraph (1) above as they apply to a scheme under subsection (1) of that section.

(3) Every recognised self-regulating organisation for friendly societies shall pay such periodical fees to the Registrar as he may by regulations prescribe.

Application of provisions of this Act

22. (1) Subject to sub-paragraph (2) below, sections 89(1)(c), 106, 107, 108, 109(4), 149(1)(l), [Exemption from liability for damages] 152 and 156(4) of this Act and paragraph 3(3) of Schedule 5 to this Act shall apply in relation to recognised self-regulating organisations for friendly societies as they apply in relation to recognised self-regulating organisations.

(2) In its application by virtue of sub-paragraph (1) above section 108(1) of this Act shall have effect as if the reference to section 101(2) were a reference to paragraph 2H(1) above.

(3) In its application by virtue of sub-paragraph (1) above subsection (2) of section [Exemption from liability for damages] of this Act shall have effect as if—

(a) the reference in paragraph (a) to paragraphs 1 to 6 of Schedule 2 were to paragraphs 2 to 6 of that Schedule; and

(b) paragraph (d) referred to the powers of the organisation under paragraph 12(4) below.

(4) A direction under subsection (1) of section 152 of this Act as it applies by virtue of sub-paragraph (1) above shall direct the Registrar to direct the organisation not to take or, as the case may be, to take the action in question; and where the function of making or revoking a recognition order in respect of a self-regulating organisation for friendly societies is exercisable by a transferee body any direction under that subsection as it applies as aforesaid shall be a direction requiring the Registrar to direct the transferee body to give the organisation such a direction as it specified in the direction given by the Secretary of State.

(5) Subsection (4) of that section shall not apply to a direction given to the Registrar by virtue of this paragraph.
